an action to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders for a debt of the corporation. One Mrs. Blair, the indorser of said note, being called upon by the payee, but without being requested by said corporation to do so, paid the note in suit and took from the bank an assignment of said note "and all its rights and interests thereto and all moneys due or to grow due thereon and all rights of action which said bank had or held" against said corporation payor, "and against the stockholders of said corporation created or existing in favor of said bank by reason of said loan." In turn Mrs. Blair assigned and transferred the note and all rights and interests therein and all moneys to become due thereon to one Black, who brought an action against said corporation and recovered a judgment against it for the amount paid by her to the bank. Black and Mrs. Blair executed and delivered to Yule an assignment of all their right, title and interest in and to the judgment, to the note, and to any and all rights of action against the stockholders of said corporation payor, created or existing by reason of the loan made by said payee bank. Yule sued to enforce the statutory liability of the stockholders. Issue being joined, the court found as a matter of fact that with the note the bank's right of action against the stockholders had been assigned to Mrs. Blair. That finding was not assailed. The finding that was challenged by the plaintiff in his motion for a new trial and the one which received the particular consideration of the court upon appeal, dealt with the effect of the written assignment of Blair of the judgment and promissory note to Yule, whereby the court found that neither Black nor Mrs. Blair had assigned to plaintiff (Yule) any rights of action against the stockholders of the corporation upon account of the debt. The order appealed from was reversed with leave to either party to amend their pleadings if they should be so advised.

[3] The doctrine reannounced in the above-cited case as the law of this state is "that full payment and performance by the surety extinguishes the primary obligation; that new rights and liabilities then arise—upon the part of the principal, to reimburse the surety for the moneys expended, with legal interest, though not according to the terms of the primary obligation; and upon the part of the surety, the right to an action in assumpsit upon the implied promise of the principal to make him whole. * * * Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 49, 27 P. 40, is distinguished from the Yule Case by pointing out as the distinguishing features that the latter case was not a case of the payment of a debt by a surety, but the payment of a debt of a corporation by one of its stockholders, who asked to be subrogated to the rights of the original holder of the debt to enforce the stockholder's liability. In such a case, it is pointed out, a stockholder, not being a mere volunteer, by virtue of his relations to the corporation, has a right to take up the corporation's note and to hold it and the debt represented by it and enforce contribution amongst his fellow stockholders. Although Redington paid the indebtedness of the corporation of which he was a stockholder, it was held that the debt was not extinguished, while it is said in the Yule Case, supra, that payment on the part of the surety extinguishes the debt. The doctrine of assumpsit upon the implied promise of the principal to make the surety whole is, however, approved. In the instant case, although the pleadings are not framed on this theory, Marston was nevertheless not only a guarantor but a stockholder of the Central Alaska Fisheries Company.

[4] The assignment made by W. H. Marston to the W. H. Marston Company of his claim or right to reimbursement from the Central Alaska Fisheries Company was sufficiently specific to transfer his right to recover to another. "A thing in action is a right to recover money or other personal property by a judicial proceeding." Section 953, Civ. Code. "A thing in action, arising out of the violation of a right of property, or out of an obligation, may be transferred by the owner. * * *" Section 954, Civ. Code. "Property of any kind may be transferred, except as otherwise provided by this article." Section 1044, Civ. Code. No exception exists against the assignment of the right of reimbursement arising upon the implied promise of a principal to make his surety whole.

No transfer of the notes paid by the checks of W. H. Marston to the First National Bank of Berkeley on account of his guaranty obligations was made by said bank either to Marston or to the W. H. Marston Company. The assignment made by Marston to the W. H. Marston Company embraced all his "right, title, and interest in and to his claims and demands against the said Central Alaska Fisheries Company, including his claim and demand" on the several notes. As above noted no actual transfer of the notes was made, and that portion of each assignment made by W. H. Marston to the W. H. Marston Company, which concludes with the words "including his [Marston's] claim and demand on said note [giving date] to the W. H. Marston Company, * * *" was an attempt to transfer in addition to the rights and claims of action that had sprung into existence upon the extinguishing of the old liability all other possible rights and claims or demands that may have existed by reason of the original transactions. This is not strictly an action to recover upon extinguished obligations, but an action in assumpsit brought by the assignee of a guarantor for the amount paid out by the latter and founded upon new rights and liabilities which sprang up upon the extinguishment of the primary obligation by its performance by the guarantor—a right that has never been controverted and is expressly recognized in Yule v. Bishop, supra. The vital question presented by Yule v. Bishop, supra, a case involving the liability of stockholders, had to do with an action brought upon an assigned note which the indorser was compelled to pay. That action was brought to enforce all the rights and interest which the assignee indorser had in said note at the time the assignment was made, which was subsequent to its extinguishment by payment, and therefore there was nothing but a performed obligation assigned by the transaction.

We do not deem it necessary in the view that we take of matters presented to discuss the several equitable remedies open to a guarantor upon payment of his principal's debt. Nor do we deem it necessary to decide whether or not the rule announced in Yule v. Bishop, supra, to the effect that where a debt is extinguished by the surety's payment the debtor's liability thereby comes to an end, and neither the doctrine of equitable assignment nor of subrogation can transfer it as a live, subsisting obligation, has been abrogated by the negotiable instruments provisions of the Civil Code (sections 3201, 3202 et seq., adopted in 1917).

[5] We are of the opinion that the finding of the court to the effect that the W. H. Marston Company paid the indebtedness of which W. H. Marston was the guarantor, at his special instance and request, in the circumstances of the case, was equivalent to a finding that the relationship of creditor and debtor was thereby created, from which an implied promise at once arose on the part of W. H. Marston to repay the amount advanced by said company to meet his obligation. The evidence, however, without contradiction, shows that W. H. Marston drew the checks against his personal account that discharged the indebtedness owing by the Central Alaska Fisheries Company to said bank. If, on the other hand, Marston paid said indebtedness in his personal capacity, as he claims to have done, the assignment being sufficient would in either event entitle the plaintiff to a judgment for the full amount sued upon.

[6, 7] We think there is no merit in the claim that the court committed error in allowing a stockholder of defendant, Central Alaska Fisheries Company, to intervene as a party in interest. It is plain that unless he intervened no defense whatever would have been made by the corporation defendant or by any person on its behalf. Neither was it error to deny the intervener the right to continue as a party after a failure of proof to sustain certain allegations of the complaint in intervention charging collusion on the part of plaintiff and the directors of defendant corporation. This was a matter largely in the discretion of the trial court, and its discretion seems to have been wisely exercised in view of the importance of the issues involved in the action.

The portion of the judgment appealed from is reversed.

FITZGERALD et al. v. BADARACCO et al.

Supreme Court of California. Aug. 23, 1927.

Mandamus 113—Writ of mandate directing municipal tax levy sufficient to pay certain salaries was denied, since direction would nullify charter's tax limit provisions.

Where, under municipal charter, board of supervisors was to prepare the annual budget and tax levy, but board of public works was to fix compensation of its own employees, latter board's power held so limited as to be subject to control of supervisors, hence petition for writ of mandate directing supervisors to levy tax sufficient to pay salaries fixed by board of public works was denied; otherwise charter's tax limit provision would be a nullity.

Application by W. J. Fitzgerald and others for a writ of mandate compelling John B. Badaracco and others, as the municipal Board of Supervisors, to levy certain taxes. Writ denied.

Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., and F. A. Devlin, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioners, consisting of a considerable number of the employees of the department of public works of the city and county of San Francisco, have applied for a writ of mandate whereby they seek to have this court direct the board of supervisors of said city and county and the members thereof to adopt a tax rate and levy a tax for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, sufficient to pay the said petitioners certain amounts in the way of added compensation fixed by said board of public works by a resolution thereof adopted May 18, 1927, for the services performed and to be performed by said petitioners as the employees of said board during said fiscal year. The petition herein discloses that on the 6th day of June, 1927, the said board of supervisors, purporting to act pursuant to the provisions of section 3, c. 1, art. 3, of the charter of said municipality, adopted a certain ordinance providing for the sums, respectively, to be allowed to the various departments, officers, boards, and commissions thereof for said fiscal year, and making a budget of the same; that in so doing the said board made a budget of the amount estimated to be required to pay the expenses of conducting the public business of said department of public works for said fiscal year, including and itemizing the amounts to be paid by said board for the salaries and wages of its employees; that in so doing said board of supervisors failed to allow and provide for the amount required by said board of public works to pay the said added compensation of its employees, and that pursuant to said budget the said board of supervisors is about to levy the annual taxes to be imposed upon the inhabitants and properties within said city during said fiscal year; and that in so doing the board will not, unless so directed by this court, embrace in the tax levy a sum sufficient to meet and pay the said added compensation so provided and fixed for its said employees by the said board of public works. Wherefore, the petitioners apply for this writ. The return which the respondents have made to this writ is in the form of a demurrer to its sufficiency, and the questions presented thereby relate to the power with which said board of public works is invested under the terms of said charter with relation to fixing the compensation of the employees of said board, and to the limitations, if any, upon such power embraced in the other provisions of said charter. By the terms of section 3, c. 1, art. 6, of said charter, it is provided that:

"The board [of public works] may employ such clerks, superintendents, inspectors, engineers, surveyors, deputies, architects, and workmen as shall be necessary to a proper discharge of their duties under this article, and fix their compensation, but no compensation to any of said persons shall be greater than is paid in similar employment."

It is the contention of the petitioners that under the foregoing provision of the charter the board of public works is invested with plenary power to fix the compensation of those of its employees who are referred to therein, and that when said board has acted in the matter of fixing the compensation of its employees the amounts thus fixed are not subject to control or diminution through the action of any other department of said municipality, but must be provided for in the annual tax levy thereof. It is made to appear, however, by the terms of section 3, c. 1, art. 3, as the same read prior to the adoption of certain amendments thereto in the year 1924, that the board of supervisors of said municipality were charged with the duty of preparing and adopting an annual budget, which, when so prepared and adopted, should furnish the basis of the tax levy to be later made by said board. Said section read as follows:

"The supervisors shall meet annually between the 1st Monday of May and the 1st Monday of June, and by a vote of a majority of all the members thereof make a budget of the amounts estimated to be required to pay the expenses of conducting the public business of the city and county for the next ensuing fiscal year. The budget shall be prepared in such detail as to the aggregate sum and the items thereof allowed to each department, office, board, or commission, as the supervisors shall deem advisable."

It is also to be noted that by the provisions of sections 11, 12, and 13 of chapter 1 of article 3 of said charter it is provided that the tax levy to be made by the board of supervisors of said municipality "shall not exceed the rate of $1 on each $100 valuation of the property assessed." Certain exceptions to this limit of taxation are provided for in the sections of said article above referred to, but these do not affect the questions before us. It is the contention of the respondents herein that under the provisions of section 3, c. 1, art. 3, of said charter, relating to the annual budget and under the provisions of sections 11, 12, and 13 of said charter, relating to the limit of taxation, the power of the board of public works to fix the compensation of its employees is so limited as to be subject to the control of the board of supervisors in the fixation of the budget and in the levy of taxes conformably thereto, and that said board of public works in the exercise of its aforesaid power may not provide for the payment of the compensation of its employees in an amount exceeding the sums allowed to it by the board of supervisors in its said budget and provided for in the tax levy to be made conformably therewith. We are of the opinion that the contention of the respondents in the foregoing regard must be sustained, and that to hold otherwise would be not only to nullify in a large measure the provisions of the charter with relation to the preparation of the annual budget by the board of supervisors, but would also be to place it within the power of the board of public works and certain other departments of the city government to provide for expenditures within their several departments in excess of the tax limit provided for in the foregoing provisions of said charter and in so doing to be and act beyond the control of the legislative body of said city, whose duty it is to keep the expenditures of its government within such limit of taxation. It has been brought to our attention that in the year 1924 two certain charter amendments were proposed and adopted by the electors of said municipality relating to the duties imposed upon the board of supervisors in the matter of the preparation of the annual budget, and also in the matter of the classification of the wages and salaries of the officers and employees of said municipality to be accomplished by the adoption of certain ordinances of the board of supervisors to be passed in accordance therewith, but that such classification has not as yet been made or said ordinances adopted by said board. By the terms of the latter of these amendments it is provided that:

"Pending the adoption by the supervisors of classification and compensation schedules as herein provided, the existing salaries and compensations and charter salary and wage-fixing powers shall remain in force and effect."

Whatever may be the interpretation and effect of the foregoing amendments to the charter, or either of them, when put in operation, we are not called upon here to consider for the reason that we are of the opinion that prior to the adoption of said amendments the power of the board of public works in the matter of the fixation of the compensation of its employees was subject to the limitation imposed by the budget provisions and taxing limit of said charter as it existed prior to the aforesaid amendments thereof.

The application for the writ is denied.

BRIARE v. MATHEWS et al. (Sac. 3811.)

Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 184(2)—Rule of council prescribing qualifications of police appointees held not binding because limiting council's charter power over police department.

Where city charter gave council general authority to organize and maintain police department, council's rule placing age limit upon police appointees held not binding upon it, since such body could not limit the power conferred upon it by charter.

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 186(1)—Salary of police appointee over age limit could not be recovered in taxpayer's suit as paid in violation of rule.

Under charter giving city council authority to organize and maintain the police department, the council may make rules but is not bound by them, hence in taxpayer's suit salary paid police appointee over rule age limit cannot be recovered on ground that it was paid in violation of rule.

3. Municipal corporations $\S$ 186(1)—Police-man's salary payments held illegal and recoverable, where he accepted position within year after term as councilman at which compensation was increased.

By virtue of charter provision that no councilman should, within one year after his term, hold an office, the compensation of which had been increased during his term, policeman's appointment held illegal and salary paid him recoverable in taxpayer's suit, he having resigned as councilman and immediately become policeman, although police salaries had been increased during his term as councilman.

4. Municipal corporations $\S$ 1000(3)—Taxpayer's demand that city institute proceedings to recover salaries illegally paid should be made upon council, not city attorney.

Under charter investing city council with control of all city litigation, taxpayer's demand, precedent to his suit, that city bring action for recovery of salaries illegally paid city employees should have been made upon the council, and not upon the city attorney.

5. Municipal corporations $\S$ 1000(3)—Taxpayer's demand upon council to institute proceedings held not prerequisite, where useless.

Where one not qualified was appointed to police force, in taxpayer's suit to recover salary paid him, demand upon council to institute recovery proceedings held not prerequisite to taxpayer's suit; facts showing demand would have been unavailing.

6. Action $\S$ 48(1)—Taxpayer's suit to recover salaries paid two members of police force held improper joinder of causes, hence demurrable.

In taxpayer's suit to recover salaries illegally paid two members of police force, causes of action held improperly joined, hence special demurrer should have been sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Frank D. Briare against D. J. Mathews and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed with directions.

Warren H. Atherton and A. P. Hayne, both of Stockton, for appellants.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted by a citizen and taxpayer of the city of Stockton against the city auditor and his surety, the city treasurer and his surety, C. O. Smith, Madeline Fotheringham and her husband, John Doe Fotheringham, to recover certain amounts of money which said officers had paid to the said C. O. Smith and Madeline Fotheringham, respectively, as salaries during the time said Smith and Fotheringham were serving as members of the police force of said city of Stockton. It was alleged, and the court found, that the appointment of each of said persons was illegal, and that all money paid them as salaries was illegally paid, and directed that the same be repaid into the city treasury of said city. The ground upon which Smith's appointment and tenure of office was found to be invalid was that just prior to his appointment he was a member of the city council of said city, and while a member thereof said city council voted to increase the compensation of the members of the police force of said city, and, furthermore, that Smith was over the age of 35 years at the time of his appointment. The ground upon which Fotheringham's appointment was held to be invalid was that at the time of her appointment she was over the age of 35 years and had not at the time of her appointment been a resident of said city for the period of 2 years immediately prior thereto. From the judgment in favor of plaintiff, the defendants have appealed.

During all the times herein mentioned the city of Stockton has been governed by a freeholders' charter. It provides for what is commonly known as a commission form of municipal government. The city council consists of the mayor and four councilmen. One of said councilmen is designated and acts as commissioner of finance and is ex officio treasurer of said city; one is designated and acts as commissioner of audit and is ex officio auditor of said city; one is designated and acts as commissioner of public health and safety and one as commissioner of public works. The council by section 72 subdivision 5, of the charter, is given power "To organize and maintain police and fire departments." Section 48 of the charter provides that no member of the council shall be elected or appointed to any office, the compensation of which is increased by the council while he was a member thereof, until 1 year after the expiration of the term for which he was elected. By ordinance the council adopted certain rules and regulations for the government of the police department of said city. Rule 2 of said rules and regulations provided that:

"The police force is under the general control and direction of the commissioner of public health and safety, who has authority to appoint the chief of police and all members of the police department, subject to the provisions of the city charter and the approval of the city council."

By rule 30 it is provided that patrolmen shall be appointed by the commissioner of public health and safety and approved by the council.

"They are required to be between the ages of 25 and 35 years and not less than 5 feet 9 inches in height, sound of body and mind, of good moral character, and residents of the city of Stockton for a period of not less than 2 years."

It was plaintiff's contention at the trial, and the court evidently agreed with him, that the appointment of Smith was in violation of section 48 of the charter and of rule 30 of said rules and regulations adopted by the council, and that the appointment of Fotheringham was in violation of said rule 30.

We will first consider the validity of the appointment of Mrs. Fotheringham. It will be noted that it is not claimed that her appointment violated any provision of the charter. The only respect in which it is contended it is illegal is that she failed to meet the requirements of rule 30 as to her age and residence, rule 30 having been adopted by ordinance passed by said council. The question therefore is presented as to the binding effect of this ordinance upon the council and the commissioner of public health and safety. But as the charter gives to the council the power to organize and maintain the police departments, and the only authority under which the commissioner of public health and safety acts in reference to this department is derived from the ordinance, and, furthermore, as the power is reserved in said ordinance to the council to approve appointments to the police department made by said commissioner, the real question presented is the binding effect of said ordinance upon said council. Can the council by ordinance limit the power over the police department, given it in the charter, to such an extent that an appointment legal by the terms of the charter is rendered invalid and void by its failure to comply with the standards fixed by the ordinance? Somewhat of a similar question was before this court in the case of Higgins v. Cole, 100 Cal. 260, 34 P. 678. The board of trustees of the city of Fresno had appointed a chief of the fire department of said city. The city was then acting under the Municipal Corporation Act of 1883, p. 93, under which the board of trustees was given full authority over the fire department. At the time of the appointment of said fire chief there was an ordinance of said city, in effect, providing that the chief of the fire department should hold office for the term of 1 year or until his successor was appointed and qualified.

Some 3 months after the appointment of said chief of the fire department, the board of trustees passed a resolution declaring the position vacant and appointing another person to fill the same. It was claimed by the first appointee that the term of his office had been fixed at 1 year by the ordinance, and that the board of trustees was without power to declare the office vacant and appoint his successor until the expiration of said year. This court, on page 264 of the opinion (34 P. 680), said:

"The ordinance, in effect, provided that the chief should be appointed to hold office for one year, or until his successor should be appointed and qualified. This, as we understand it, must be construed as declaring only that the term of office shall continue until a successor is elected and qualified, and not necessarily for a full year. And under the statute providing that the trustees may 'appoint and remove such policemen and other subordinate officers as they may deem proper,' it would seem that they had no power to limit their right of removal. * * *

"As the term of office of the chief of the fire department was not fixed by the constitution nor declared by law, it must be held that appellant's term continued only during the pleasure of the appointing power, and that he was rightly removed."

In Thompson v. Board of Trustees of City of Alameda, 144 Cal. 281, 77 P. 951, the facts show that the board of trustees of the city of Alameda adopted an ordinance providing that whenever a petition signed by a certain per cent. of the voters of said city asked for the submission to the voters of said city of any proposition of local interest, the board of trustees should submit said proposition to said voters at the next general or municipal election to be held therein; that such a petition had been filed with said board of trustees and said board had refused to call said election, but was proceeding to act upon the matters set forth in said proposition without submitting the same to the vote of the people and before the next general or special election to be held in said city. It was the plaintiff's contention in said action that the board by said ordinance had suspended its legislative and discretionary powers to act upon the matter set forth in said petition until the next election to be held in said city, and he asked for a mandate directed to said board that it desist and refrain from acting upon said matter and comply with said ordinance. In denying relief to the plaintiff, this court, on page 282 of the opinion (77 P. 951), said:

"The position of the appellant is that the ordinance is mandatory, and that compliance with its provisions by the board of trustees is 'a condition precedent to their acting legislatively, in awarding or refusing franchises to railroad corporations.' But if this be the case, the effect of the ordinance would be in this and other cases where petitions may be filed, to suspend the legislative and discretionary powers of the board. The period of suspension, it is contended by respondents with apparent justice, would in all cases be until the next general or municipal election—that is to say, for a period that might be 2 years, and in the present case in fact is over a year. This, indeed, is contested by the appellant's counsel, who claims that the ordinance provides for special elections when deemed by the board desirable. But we deem it immaterial whether the longer or the shorter period be taken. In either case it is obvious that it was beyond the powers of the board by ordinance or otherwise to divest itself and succeeding boards, for a longer or a shorter period, of powers vested in it by the general law for the benefit of its constituents. For this would be to repeal pro tanto the general law. * * *

"But we do not think it necessary to give to the ordinance such a construction. The words 'the board of trustees shall submit to said voters,' etc., are not necessarily to be construed as mandatory (Bouvier's Law Dictionary, 'shall'; [Cairo & F.] Railroad Co. v. Hecht, 95 U. S. 170 [24 L. Ed. 423]); and in the present case there is no reason to suppose that they were so intended. It is more reasonable to suppose that the ordinance was intended as a mere rule of procedure for the guidance of the board, and as such to be observed or disregarded by the board in its discretion, as circumstances might require."

In addition to these expressions from our own court, we find the following statement from 28 Cyc. 412:

"To be eligible to office, one must possess such qualifications as may be prescribed by the constitutional and statutory provisions. No qualifications, however, other than those imposed by the Constitution or statute are necessary. Qualifications in addition to those imposed by charter cannot be imposed by ordinance."

[1] It seems clear from the foregoing authorities that the city council was without authority to limit by ordinance the power conferred upon it by the charter. It is conceded that except for said ordinance the appointment of Mrs. Fotheringham was legal and valid, or at least there was no evidence that she did not possess all the qualifications as required by the charter and general laws. It must be held, therefore, that her appointment was legal, it having been approved by the city council, which body was by the charter invested with complete authority over the police department.

[2] It is not to be inferred from what we have said that the council may not make reasonable rules and regulations for the government of the police department. Undoubtedly it may. But these rules are simply for the convenience of the council and to enable it to better direct the affairs of said department. They cannot be considered mandatory to the extent of divesting the council of any right or power conferred upon it either by the charter or by statutory or constitutional enactment. This disposes of the judgment in so far as it directs the repayment to the city of Stockton of the money paid to Mrs. Fotheringham. It also disposes of the contention that Smith's appointment was invalid by reason of his being over the age of 35 years at the time of his appointment. It in no way affects the finding, and the judgment based thereon, that Smith's appointment was illegal for the reason that he was a member of the city council at the time the compensation of the members of the police department was increased.

[3] By express provisions of the charter he was ineligible to appointment to any office, the compensation of which was thus increased, until 1 year after the expiration of the term for which he had been elected. The evidence shows, and the court found, that he resigned from the council and was immediately appointed to the police force. His appointment was therefore, illegal, and gave him no right to receive any salary for his services rendered thereunder.

It is contended further by appellants that plaintiff cannot maintain this action for the reason that the complaint fails to show that he made any demand upon the city council to institute proceedings to recover the money thus illegally paid before the commencement of this action. It is alleged in the complaint that such a demand was made upon the city attorney, and that this official refused to comply therewith.

[4] While the charter and an ordinance of said city authorize the city attorney to bring and prosecute all actions on behalf of said city, the charter invests the city council with control of all litigation of the city. Under these provisions of the charter we would question the power of the city attorney to institute litigation of this character without the sanction and direction of the council. By giving the council control of all litigation the charter has authorized it to determine what litigation shall be commenced as well as to how it shall be prosecuted thereafter. After the council has once determined that an action on behalf of the city shall be instituted, the charter then makes it the duty of the city attorney "to bring and prosecute" said action on behalf of the city, subject to the control thereof given by the charter to the city council. The demand, therefore, to institute this action on behalf of said city should have been made on the city council instead of on the city attorney.

[5] A demand, however, in our opinion, in this case was not necessary. We think the facts alleged in the complaint sufficiently show that such a demand would have been useless, and when it appears from the complaint that a demand would have been unavailing, it is not required. Mock v. City of Santa Rosa, 126 Cal. 330, 58 P. 826; Osburn v. Stone, 170 Cal. 480, 150 P. 367.

Appellants have argued that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding that the officers, the auditor and the treasurer, audited and paid the claims with knowledge of their illegal nature, and with knowledge that the persons to whom the same were paid were not legally entitled to payment thereof. While this argument might have some force when directed on behalf of the salary paid to Mrs. Fotheringham (which we have held to be legal for other reasons), it is entirely without weight in so far as the same affects the payment of the claims made to Smith. Both the auditor and the treasurer, as we have already seen, were members of the city council and must have had knowledge that the salaries of the police force were increased while Smith was a member of the council, and that immediately thereupon Smith resigned from the council and was appointed to a position in the police department. The contention, that the acts of the council in determining that Smith and Mrs. Fotheringham possessed the necessary qualifications as to age and residence cannot be legally attacked, need not be passed upon, as in our opinion the lack of these qualifications, which had been created only by ordinance, would not and did not render their appointment illegal.

[6] The complaint in this action contained two causes of action separately stated—one relating to the payments made to Smith, and the other relating to the payments made to Mrs. Fotheringham. Defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that two causes were improperly united in this action. These demurrers were overruled. The precise question was before the District Court of Appeal in the case of Hansen v. Carr, 73 Cal. App. 511, 516, 238 P. 1048, and the court held that the demurrer was properly sustained. We are convinced that the case was correctly decided, and, following it, we must hold that the court erred in overruling the special demurrers to the complaint in this action.

For the reasons given herein the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to sustain defendants' special demurrers with permission to plaintiff to amend his complaint as he may be advised.

UNITED STATES ex rel. HOLLINGS-

Rehearing Denied Sept. 14, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ☞458(1)—"Supersedeas" issues only when in court's judgment it is necessary to protect rights of parties on appeal.

"Supersedeas" does not issue as of right, but only when in court's judgment it is necessary to protect rights of parties on appeal.

2. Constitutional law ☞56—Supreme Court cannot by legislative enactment be deprived of constitutional power to issue supersedeas.

Supreme Court's power, under Constitution, to issue writ of supersedeas whenever necessary to protect rights of parties pending appeal cannot be abrogated by legislative enactment.

3. Appeal and error ☞1—Matter of appeal is statutory, and Legislature may impose any condition or restriction on granting stay of execution pending appeal.

Matter of appeal is purely one of statutory regulation, and Legislature may impose any condition or restriction on granting of stay of execution pending appeal.

4. Appeal and error ☞458(1)—Stopping of illegal sale of intoxicating liquor on filing of complaint held not cause for granting supersedeas to stay execution of closing order pending appeal (Wright Act; Code Civ. Proc. § 949, as amended by St. 1921, p. 95; Volstead Act [27 USCA]).

Fact that sale of intoxicating liquor in building was stopped on filing complaint, under Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), incorporating in law of state Volstead Act (27 USCA [U. S. Comp. St. § 10138½ et seq.]), or abatement of liquor nuisance does not require issuance of supersedeas to prevent enforcement of closing order pending appeal, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 949, as amended by St. 1921, p. 95.

5. Intoxicating liquors — 259—Procedure in intoxicating liquor cases in state courts, whether in name of United States or of people of state of California, must be based on state laws (Wright Act; Volstead Act [27 USCA]).

Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), incorporating Volstead Act (27 USCA [U. S. Comp. St. § 10138½ et seq.]) in law of state, did not adopt procedure of latter act, and authority for procedure in action concerning intoxicating liquors in state courts must be found in state laws, whether proceeding is brought in name of United States or in name of people of California, as authorized by Volstead Act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Edward Henderson, Judge.

Proceeding by the United States, on the relation of James C. Hollingsworth, District Attorney of the County of Ventura, against Gus A. Berg and others, to abate a liquor nuisance and to close certain premises. From a judgment closing a certain hotel, the named defendant and others appeal, and apply for supersedeas. Supersedeas denied.

Sheridan, Drapeau, Orr & Gardner, of Ventura, for appellants.

James C. Hollingsworth, Dist. Atty., of Ventura, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. Certain of the defendants in this proceeding have appealed from the judgment of the superior court closing the Ventura Hotel, in the city of Ventura, for four months, under the provisions of the National Prohibition Act (27 USCA; U. S. Comp. St. § 10138½ et seq.). Section 949 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for the stay of proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, as amended, declares that the perfecting of an appeal by the giving of an undertaking or making a deposit does not operate, as in ordinary cases, to stay proceedings, where the judgment adjudges a building or place to be a nuisance and, as a part of the judgment, orders and directs the closing of the building or place against its use for any purpose for any period of time. Stats. 1921, p. 95. A stay having been granted by the trial court for only a short time, the appellants have applied to this court for a writ of supersedeas staying the execution of the judgment pending the determination of the appeal. The respondent submits the matter on a general demurrer to the petition.

judgment of the lower court is the largest and most prominent hotel in the city of Ventura. It was opened for business on the 30th day of May, 1926, and, from the findings and from the oral statement made by the trial judge at the time of the rendition of the judgment, we may conclude that the management at all times consistently disregarded the provisions of the Prohibition Act. The complaint was filed January 7, 1927, and the court found that on certain dates during December, and for a long time prior thereto during the year 1926 and thereafter, the parties conducting and owning the hotel kept and sold, and were, at the time the abatement proceedings were instituted, keeping and selling, intoxicating liquors on the premises. In a brief review of the evidence, prior to pronouncing the judgment declaring the hotel a nuisance and ordering it closed for a time, the trial court said that the place had "had a bad reputation with relation to the sale of intoxicating liquor from May until December, and" that, "if as much interest had been taken in that hotel before this action was brought as there was after it was brought, there would not have been any necessity for the action at all, because any one who lives in this community can appreciate what the general reputation of that hotel was. So far as the * * * court is concerned, it feels that those who were in it were very lax indeed in their duties as landlords, or as those interested in the building." The court further stated that it had been fully determined to close the hotel for the period of time prescribed by law, but, "as there appeared to have been an honest endeavor to comply with the law since the institution of the abatement proceedings," it would order the premises closed for a shorter period of time.

[1] Because of the fact, alleged in the petition, and commented upon by the trial court, supra, that, coincident with the filing of the complaint, a complete change of management was made, since which time there have been no violations of the Prohibition Act in connection with the maintenance of the hotel, it is argued that it is not necessary that the place be kept closed pending the appeal, the purpose of the abatement proceeding having been indirectly accomplished. The trial court, in possession of all the facts, used its discretion in fixing the time during which the hotel should be kept closed and in passing upon the application for a stay of execution. The question for this court to determine is whether, with essentially the same facts before it, it should, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction issue a writ of supersedeas, which does not issue of right but only when, in the judgment of the court, it is necessary to protect the rights of the parties on appeal.

persedeas whenever it is necessary for such purpose and cannot be deprived of that power by legislative enactment, the matter of appeal is purely one of statutory regulation, and the Legislature has authority to impose any condition or restriction on the granting of a stay of execution. Foster v. Superior Court of City & County of San Francisco, 115 Cal. 279, 47 P. 58; Ex parte Queirolo, 119 Cal. 635, 51 P. 956.

[4] In making the application for the writ of supersedeas, appellants are apparently anticipating the main contention they will advance in support of their appeal from the judgment. They contend that the abatement provision of the Volstead Act (incorporated in the law of this state by adoption of the Wright Act) is valid only in so far as it tends to abate a nuisance, and that, if it be construed as warranting punishment or forfeiture of property as a penalty, it is open to grave constitutional objections, citing Schlieder v. United States (C. C. A.) 11 F.(2d) 345, 348; United States v. Chesebrough Mfg. Co. (D. C.) 11 F.(2d) 537; United States v. Pepe (C. C. A.) 12 F.(2d) 985; Key v. State ex rel. Hodge, 101 Okl. 211, 224 P. 549. The point they seek to make is that, as the nuisance caused by the sale of intoxicating liquor in the hotel has already been abated, the court is deprived of jurisdiction to enter a decree of abatement. While some of the federal courts other than the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases cited by petitioners, supra, lend color to the contention, they appear to have placed too little emphasis upon the fact that the proceeding for the abatement of a nuisance under the prohibition law is more than a mere equitable proceeding in the ordinary sense. It is a most important phase of the enforcement of the prohibition law, made so by the act itself. 41 U. S. Stats. at Large, 305. In this case, the proceeding was instituted against the keeper of the hotel and the corporation owning the building in which the hotel was conducted. The individual and the corporation appear to have been essentially identical. The judgment runs against both. There does not appear to have been any effort to correct the evil until some one was spurred into action by a report of the Ventura county grand jury. It is alleged that Berg, the hotelman, no longer owns any stock in the holding company, and that another is managing the hotel, and that the present owners and management were innocent of any infraction of the law. While the hotel premises are not being used as a place where intoxicating liquor is now sold, these facts were presented to and considered by the trial court. The petition does not disclose whether or not petitioners were willing, or offered, or were refused an opportunity to enter into an undertaking, as they might have done if the trial court deemed such procedure proper or safe, as a guaranty against further infraction of the law; but appellants appear to have stood on their plea of a lack of jurisdiction in the lower court to order the hotel closed. The opportunity was open to them under the act, and the giving of such an undertaking has been held to be an alternative to a judgment in abatement. Appellants now assert a willingness to give such undertaking, if a supersedeas be granted. We are of the view, however, that the situation should remain as it was determined by the action of the trial court.

[5] The state of California, in adopting the Wright Act (Stats. 1921, p. 79), did not adopt the procedural features of the Volstead Act. The authority for the procedure in such actions in our courts must be found in the laws of this state, whether the proceeding is brought in the name of the United States or in the name of people of the state of California, as authorized by the Volstead Act. Carse v. Marsh, 189 Cal. 743, 210 P. 257; Ex parte Brambini, 192 Cal. 19, 218 P. 569. Section 949 of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra, was amended for a purpose. In denying applications for writs of supersedeas pending appeals in other cases, the courts have held that the Legislature, by amending the section, has indicated as its opinion that there should be no stay of an action to abate a nuisance where the judgment orders the closing of the building for any period of time, and the court having jurisdiction of the appeal ought to be careful not to nullify the statute. People v. Jackson, 190 Cal. 257, 263, 212 P. 4; People v. Piazza, 59 Cal. App. 43, 45, 209 P. 1017.

In view of the declared policy of the people of California so plainly indicated by the amendment to the section, supra, and in the light of the allegations of the petition, we are of the view that we would not be justified in the issuance of the discretionary writ of supersedeas in this case. The application for such a writ is therefore denied.

We concur: CURTIS, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.

Justices PRESTON and LANGDON, being disqualified, do not participate in the foregoing opinion.

BLAKE v. CITY OF EUREKA et al.

Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 323(3)—Complaint to enjoin street improvement alleging improvement was laid out in places on private property, but not indicating places, held demurrable (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

In an action to enjoin proceedings to pave and to otherwise improve streets, under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, on the ground that the improvement was laid out upon private lands in various places, complaint alleging that improvement was laid out on private lands at various places, but not alleging where those places were, held demurrable.

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 318—Property owners cannot restrain street improvement on grounds not set forth in protest filed with council (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

A property owner who has duly filed protest against street improvement under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, on designated grounds, and whose protest has been overruled, cannot maintain an action to restrain the improvement on grounds not set forth in his protest nor in any way base a complaint of the overruling of his protest upon grounds not set forth therein.

3. Municipal corporations $\S$ 323(3)—Complaint to enjoin improvement alleging failure to hear evidence on objections, but not alleging offer or refusal to hear evidence, held insufficient (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

In an action to enjoin proceedings to pave and to otherwise improve streets, under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, complaint alleging that city council failed to hear evidence on objections to improvements, but not alleging that plaintiffs offered any evidence in support of their protests or that the city council refused to hear such evidence, held insufficient to state cause of action.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 917(2)—Where demurrer was sustained to complaint to enjoin street improvements failing to make necessary allegations, Supreme Court might assume that absence of allegations was urged at hearing on demurrer (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

In action to enjoin proceedings to pave and to otherwise improve streets, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, where the complaint alleged that the city council failed to hear evidence on objections, but did not make necessary allegations that plaintiffs offered evidence and that city council refused to hear it and trial court sustained demurrer to complaint, Supreme Court might assume that absence of necessary allegations was urged.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 917(1)—Where demurrer to complaint to enjoin street improvements was sustained with leave to amend and plaintiffs did not amend, Supreme Court might assume that they could not make necessary allegations (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

In action to enjoin paving and otherwise improving streets, under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, where the complaint failed to contain the necessary allegations that plaintiffs offered evidence and that the city council refused to hear it, and demurrer to the complaint was sustained with leave to amend, and plaintiffs failed to amend, the Supreme Court might assume that plaintiffs could not make the necessary allegations.

6. Municipal corporations $\S$ 298—Burden was on persons objecting to street improvements before council to prove objections (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

Property owners objecting to paving and to otherwise improving streets, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, had the burden of establishing truth of their objections, and where they offered no evidence the city council might overrule them without hearing evidence thereon.

7. Municipal corporations $\S$ 325—Overruling of objections to street improvement by council held not reviewable (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

Decision of city council overruling objections to paving and otherwise improving streets, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, that street was varying widths, that there were gulleys in it, that the land fronting it was sparsely settled, that buildings on either side would not exceed certain number, that market value of land in district would be depreciated, that improvement would cost at least specified sum, and that property owners could not pay this much held final and not reviewable.

8. Municipal corporations $\S$ 450(4)—Council's decision fixing boundaries of assessment district for street improvements held final (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

In proceedings to pave and to otherwise improve streets, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, decision of city council fixing the northern boundary of the assessment district at approximately 120 feet north of the street being improved and the southern boundary 2,640 feet south of the street, held final and not reviewable.

9. Municipal corporations $\S$ 450(4)—Presumption is that members of council fixing boundaries of assessment district were familiar with conditions and governed thereby (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

It must be presumed that members of the city council fixing the boundaries of an assessment district to pay for paving and other street improvements, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, were familiar with conditions prevailing in the proposed district and that in fixing the boundaries they were governed thereby.

10. Municipal corporations ⚡280(1)—That council disregarded its rule not to improve street in absence of petition therefor held not to affect validity of proceedings (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

In proceedings to pave and to otherwise improve streets, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, that the city council disregarded rule promulgated by it, but unauthorized by statute, that it would not improve a street in absence of petition for the improvement by a majority of the property owners, held not to affect the validity of the proceedings, the rule being repealable at pleasure by inconsistent action.

11. Municipal corporations ⚡442—Council cannot agree that property be assessed for street improvements in proportion to benefits or bear specified per cent. of cost (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

City council has no authority to agree with property owners or other persons that property shall be assessed for street improvements, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, according to the benefit the property receives, or that it will bear only specified per cent. of the cost of the improvement.

12. Municipal corporations ⚡293(1)—Council's agreement that improvement assessment should not exceed 60 per cent. of cost held not to affect validity of resolution of intention (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

Agreement of city council, if made in accordance with petition, for paving and other street improvements, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, asking that the assessment of the property fronting on the street should not exceed 60 per cent. of the cost of the improvement, held not to invalidate the resolution of intention to construct the improvements, the agreement being void.

13. Evidence ⚡65—Petitioners for street improvements are presumed to know that law renders property liable for cost of improvement proportionately to benefit if assessment district is formed (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

Court will presume that petitioners for street improvements, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, know that their property will be liable for the cost of the improvement in proportion to the benefit received, in case an assessment district is formed, they being presumed to know the law.

14. Municipal corporations ⚡434(1)—That public lands within assessment district were exempted from liability held not to invalidate street improvement proceedings (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended; St. 1911, p. 740, § 20, subd. 8).

In proceedings to pave and to otherwise improve streets, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, that the city council exempted public lands within assessment district from the payment of any part of the cost of improvement in pursuance of St. 1911, p. 740, § 20, subd. 8, held not to invalidate proceedings.

15. Municipal corporations ⚡79—City charter controls over conflicting statutes concerning improvements (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

Where the provision of the city charter conflicts with the statute dealing with improvement of the streets, such as the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, the charter provisions are controlling; the matter being purely municipal affair.

16. Municipal corporations ⚡266—Street Improvement Act held applicable to city of Eureka (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended; Charter of City of Eureka, §§ 43, 191).

Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, held applicable to the city of Eureka under its charter (section 191), there being no general plan or scheme of street improvement in the charter, particularly section 43, similar to that provided by the Street Improvement Act of 1911.

17. Municipal corporations ⚡293(1)—Proceeding by city of Eureka, under Street Improvement Act, by resolution rather than ordinance held expressly authorized (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended, particularly §§ 3, 10, 18; Charter of City of Eureka, § 191).

Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, particularly section 3, providing for resolution of intention to construct street improvement, section 10, providing for resolution ordering work, and section 18, authorizing resolution directing that work be done under supervision of city engineer, and Charter of City of Eureka, § 191, providing for improvement proceedings under statutes, held to expressly authorize street improvements proceedings under Street Improvement Act of 1911 by resolution rather than by ordinance.

18. Municipal corporations ⚡79—City amending charter to come within constitutional provision held not subject to general laws concerning municipal affairs except as charter provides (Const. art. 11, § 6, as amended in 1914; St. 1917, p. 1743).

The city of Eureka held not subject to general laws in matters concerning its municipal affairs, except as its charter provides, having amended its charter so as to come within the provisions of Const. art. 11, § 6, as amended in 1914, and the amendment to the charter having been approved by St. 1917, p. 1743.

19. Municipal corporations ⚡488, 489(6)—Objections that assessment district did not include lots fronting on street held not open, where not presented to council (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

Where objection to Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, that the assessment district did not include certain lots fronting on a street in which a sewer was to be laid in the course of the improvement, was not made by written protest to the city council, it might not be made to the Supreme Court.

20. Injunction ⇨ 22—Injunction to prevent council from considering bids for street improvements awarding contract held not to lie where these acts have been done (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

Where the city council had already entertained bids for street improvements, under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, and had awarded contract therefor, injunction to prevent doing of these acts held not to lie.

21. Municipal corporations ⇨ 323(1)—Injunction against street improvement proceedings held not to lie where contract had been awarded and supervision vested in city engineer (Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended).

Where the city council had awarded contract for street improvement, under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), as amended, and had directed the city engineer to supervise the work, leaving no authority over work in the city council except in a few unimportant respects, not made basis of complaint, held that injunction against city council to prevent further proceedings did not lie.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; W. V. Tryon, Judge.

Action to enjoin proceedings to construct street improvements by W. W. Blake and others against the City of Eureka and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. F. Coonan and G. A. Webb, both of Eureka, for appellants.

J. W. Henderson, of San Jose, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted for the purpose of obtaining an injunction restraining the members of the city council of the city of Eureka from further proceeding under resolutions 199, 1591, and 1592, theretofore passed by said council, or from considering bids or awarding a contract for the construction of certain improvements of three streets of said city, mentioned and described in said resolutions. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiffs in said action are the owners of land within the assessment district proposed to be formed for the purposes of paying the costs of said improvements, and that all of said plaintiffs with the exception of William Kehoe are taxpayers and residents of said city. The defendants, so it is alleged in the complaint, are the city of Eureka, the members of the city council thereof, and the Mercer-Fraser Company, a corporation, a construction company, who made the lowest bid for the construction of said improvements and to whom said city council awarded the contract for the improvement of said streets. The complaint sets up seven causes of action, all separately stated. The court sustained a general demurrer to each cause of action. It also sustained special demurrers to the first and sixth causes of action. The demurrers to the first, second, and sixth causes of action were sustained with leave to amend and the others were sustained without leave to amend. The plaintiffs failed to amend their complaint or any of the causes of action thereof within the time allowed by the court, and judgment was entered dismissing said action. From this judgment the plaintiffs have appealed. The three resolutions above mentioned were passed and adopted by the city council in furtherance of proceedings taken by said council under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730), and amendments thereto, to pave and otherwise improve three certain streets in said city of Eureka. Resolution 199 was the resolution of intention provided for by section 3 of said act. Resolution 1591 was the resolution ordering the work of said improvements to be done as provided for by section 10 of said act, and resolution 1592 was a resolution directing the work to be done under the direction of the city engineer and the assessment to be made by him as provided for by section 18 of said act.

[1] In passing upon the several demurrers filed herein it will be necessary to consider the points raised by the appellants somewhat in detail, and we will discuss them as they relate to the several causes of action in the order set forth in the complaint.

[2] First Cause of Action.—The ground of the special demurrer to the first cause of action was that the complaint alleged that the improvement mentioned in the resolution of intention in various places along Harris street (one of the streets to be improved) was laid out upon private lands, but that it could not be ascertained from said complaint where or in what places said improvement was to be made upon private property. The demurrer was sustained and 10 days given to amend. Plaintiffs failed to amend. There was no error in sustaining this demurrer. The only allegations in the first cause of action upon which an argument with any hope of success might be based in favor of plaintiffs' contention that said first cause of action states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action are that the cost of the improvement provided for in said proceedings would be in excess of the reasonable value of the land in the assessment district, and that the city council failed to hear evidence on the objections to said improvement, made in numerous protests, signed by some 254 property owners within the assessment district. We think, however, that a consideration of these allegations will show that their inclusion in the cause of action did not render the same invulnerable to a general demurrer.

We will first consider the allegation that the cost of the improvement exceeded the reasonable value of the land benefited by the improvement. Section 6 of the Improvement Act of 1911 provides that at any time prior to the hour set for the hearing of protests any property owner liable to assessment for said improvement may make written protest against the proposed work. Section 7 of the same act provides that if no protests or objections are presented to the clerk of the city council or when a protest is filed the city council shall have overruled the same "immediately thereupon the city council shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the proposed improvements." It does not appear from the complaint that any objection as to this excessive cost of said improvement was ever made to the city council, and the copies of the protests annexed to the complaint do not contain any such objection or any one similar thereto. Can plaintiffs now, in an action to enjoin the city council from ordering the improvement raise an objection which was not made by them or any of them in their written protests presented to the city council? If they can, then why the provision of the statute providing for the filing of written protests by the property owner with the city council? If a property owner at any stage of the proceedings to construct an improvement under said statute may by an action in court enjoin further work thereon without first complying with the statute providing for the filing of written protest, then the statutory provision requiring such protest is ineffective for any purpose whatever and can be disregarded with impunity by any property owner. As already mentioned, section 7 of the act provides that if no protests are filed, or if those filed are denied, the council immediately will be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the proposed improvement. It has been held by this court, in construing this statute, that:

"If it [the city council] has duly disposed of the protests then as to all the world it has the power to proceed." Farley v. Reindollar, 174 Cal. 703, 707, 165 P. 19, 21.

It is further held in that case that a property owner who had failed to protest cannot object to the disposition of protests to which he was not a party. We think it logically follows that a property owner who has duly filed a protest upon certain designated grounds, and whose protest has been denied, cannot thereafter, in a proceeding in court or otherwise, complain of the denial of his protest on other grounds than those set forth therein, nor can he upon grounds not stated in any protest maintain an action to restrain the work of said improvement. We think this question has been definitely settled by the following decisions of this court: Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 696, 76 P. 661; United Real Estate, etc., Co. v. Barnes, 159 Cal. 242, 244; 113 P. 167; Cohen v. City of Alameda, 183 Cal. 519, 191 P. 1110. In the case of United Real Estate, etc., Co. v. Barnes, supra, in construing a similar statute, this court said, page 244 (113 P. 168):

"No objections were made by the plaintiff, or by any other person, and after the time for the objections had expired the council ordered that the street be opened and appointed commissioners to assess the benefits and damages. The decision thus made by the council is conclusive upon the plaintiff. The case cannot be distinguished in this particular from Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 691 [76 P. 663], and the numerous cases there cited. In that case the court said with respect to a similar objection: 'It is enough for the local property owner that he has a right to be heard before the city council upon the question, by filing a petition of remonstrance in the proceeding prescribed by law, setting forth his reasons why the improvements should not be made. Upon this the council must decide the question, and its decision is final.' In the same case, speaking of an objection with respect to the size of an assessment district, it was further said: 'It must be held that the property owner, having this right, must avail himself of it, or be concluded by the decision of the council.' The 'right' here referred to was the right to make objections to the extent of the assessment district. This case, it is true, arose under the Vrooman Act [St. 1885, p. 147] in a proceeding for paving or macadamizing a street, and not under the Street Opening Act [St. 1889, p. 70]. But the legislative power of the state, exercised in both instances by the city council, is the same in one case as in the other, the provisions of the statute as to the proceedings in the council and the conclusive effect of its decisions are substantially the same and the same principles must apply."

We think the same reasoning applies to the construction of the Street Improvement Act of 1911, and that plaintiffs cannot raise any objection in this action which they could have raised before the city council at the time provided by section 6 of said act for the hearing of protests, and which they failed to make by means of written protests filed as provided in said act.

[3] The other objection to which we have already referred, made in support of appellants' contention that the court erred in sustaining the general demurrer to the first cause of action, is that the city council failed to hear evidence on objections to said improvement made in the written protests filed by interested property owners. There is no allegation that the city council refused to hear such evidence, nor is there any allegation that any of said protestants offered to produce any evidence before said city council in support of their protest and which said city council refused to hear. The copy of the resolution overruling protests annexed to the complaint shows that:

"All protests or objections were read to the council, and all of said protests or objections having been heard and duly considered by the council, and the council being fully advised in the premises and being required to pass upon said protests, it is hereby resolved by the council of the city of Eureka that all of said protests and objections against said proposed work or improvement be and the same are hereby overruled and denied."

Plaintiffs do not allege that this resolution failed to set forth the true action of the council taken at its meeting when said protests were considered by it, except that said city council "did arbitrarily and willfully determine, as plaintiffs are informed and believe, that said protests represented less than one-half of the owners of the property to be assessed for said improvement, and did then and there by resolution No. 1590 (a copy of which is annexed, marked Exhibit D, and made a part hereof) overrule and deny said protests."

[4, 5] Aside from any binding effect this resolution may have upon plaintiffs by reason of the allegations of their complaint in reference thereto, we think that the failure of plaintiffs to allege that they offered any evidence in support of their protests and objections and their failure to also allege that the city council refused to hear such evidence renders the first cause of action deficient in a material respect. We may assume that this point was urged upon the trial court at the hearing of the demurrer. It will be noted that the order of the trial court overruling said demurrer gave to plaintiffs 10 days within which to amend their first cause of action, and that the plaintiffs failed to file any amendment or any amended complaint. We may further assume that, had plaintiffs been able to cure this defect in this cause of action by alleging that they had offered to produce evidence in support of their protests and objections and that the city council had refused to hear such evidence, they would have done so by filing an amendment to their complaint alleging these facts. Having failed to so amend their pleadings, we feel that we are justified in concluding that they were unable to supply the missing allegations.

[6, 7] The burden of proof was upon the protestants to prove the truth of their objections, and without such evidence upon their part the city council was under no obligation to hear evidence before denying the same. Ahlman v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 40 Cal. App. 395, 403, 181 P. 238; Lambert v. Bates, 137 Cal. 676, 70 P. 777. There were further objections to said improvement alleged in the first cause of action which were also properly made before the city council by means of written protests. These were to the effect that Harris street was of varying widths along its course; that there were a number of gulleys in said street; that the land fronting thereon was sparsely settled. and that the total number of buildings on either side thereof would not exceed 45; that the market value of the property in said district would be depreciated if said improvement is made; that the cost improvement would be at least $218,184.47; and that this expenditure was more than the property owners could pay.

These protests were overruled by the city council and its decision thereon was final. "The theory upon which the district is established, upon which the cost of the work shall be apportioned, is that it will derive special benefits from the improvement. But some one must determine that question, and, as stated, the Legislature has seen fit to delegate such power to the city council. From this conclusion it follows that the allegations of the complaint, to the effect that plaintiffs' property will not be benefited by the proposed improvement, cannot be considered in aid of the statement of a cause of action, since as to such question no evidence in support thereof would be admissible upon the trial. Cake v. City of Los Angeles, 164 Cal. 705 (130 P. 723); Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686 (76 P. 661)." Beale v. City of Santa Barbara, 32 Cal. App. 235, 242, 162 P. 657, 660; Rutledge v. City of Eureka, 195 Cal. 404, 426, 234 P. 82. The first cause of action makes certain allegations of the other causes of action a part of said first cause of action by reference to said allegations appearing in other causes of action of said complaint. These allegations, or such of them as we deem of sufficient importance to discuss, will be considered in our discussion of the separate causes of action of said complaint containing said allegations.

[8] Second Cause of Action.—The objection to said improvement set forth in this cause of action is that the city council in determining the boundaries of said assessment district fixed the north boundary thereof at approximately 120 feet north of Harris street and the south boundary line 2,640 feet south of said Harris street. This objection was set forth in the protests filed with the city council. The right to fix the boundaries of the assessment district by section 4 of the act of 1911 is vested in the city council, and we see no reason why the same rule should not apply to the action of the city council in fixing the extent and boundaries of the district as we have already seen applies to its action in deciding whether the property of any certain owner will be benefited by the improvement. In the case of Beale v. Santa Barbara, supra, the court said, page 242 (162 P. 660):

"The position of counsel for appellants, as announced at the hearing, was to the effect that whenever a city council declares its intention to make street improvements, and likewise its intention to establish an assessment district upon which to apportion the cost of such improvement, any dissatisfied property owner therein, upon a claim that his property will not be benefited, may demand a hearing in court and thus obstruct the proposed improvement until a determination of such question by the court. As stated in Paulson v. City of Portland, 16 Or. 450 [19 P. 450, 1 L. R. A. 673], such a course would hardly be practicable, and would result in substituting in place of the judgment of the common council, who are selected on account of their supposed fitness for that duty, the opinion of a multitude of witnesses, many of whom would be personally interested in the controversy. Says Hamilton on Special Assessments, § 515: 'The determination of the assessing board as to what property is benefited and the extent of such benefit, when made in accordance with statutory requirements, is conclusive, in the absence of fraud or mistake.'

[9] There may have been good and sufficient reasons why the district was extended only 120 feet north of Harris street and was extended 2,640 feet south of said street. The relation of Harris street to the land situated on either side thereof may furnish a satisfactory and reasonable explanation for fixing the boundaries of the district so that the greater portion thereof would lie to the south of said street and a less portion to the north thereof. It must be presumed that the members of the city council were familiar with the conditions prevailing in the proposed assessment district and that in fixing its boundaries they were governed by such existing conditions. Some body or tribunal must determine the extent and limitations of the district, and, as we have already seen, the Legislature has provided that such power shall be exercised by the city council.

[10] Third Cause of Action.—The objection alleged in this cause of action as grounds for invalidating the proceedings taken by the city council to make said improvement may, for the sake of convenience, be divided into three classes:

First. Those allegations directed against the action of the city council to the effect that said city council had, prior to the adoption of said resolution of intention, promulgated a rule that it would not improve any street in said city unless petitions praying for said improvement were presented to it, signed by more than a majority of the property owners along said street or of the district to be affected thereby; that no petition had been presented for the improvement of the streets mentioned in said resolution of intention; and that, notwithstanding that no such petition had been presented to said city council, said city council passed said resolution of intention.

Second. Those allegations to the effect that an employee of the Mercer-Fraser Company circulated a petition for the construction of said work on Harris street in which petition there was contained the following clause: "We also request the city council to create a district to be assessed for the cost and expense of the improvement according to the benefit derived, the assessment against the property fronting upon Harris street not to exceed 60 per cent. of the cost of the improvement;" that said petition was signed by property owners representing about 46 per cent. of the property fronting on Harris street and was presented to the said city council; that the city council "approved said petition and granted the petition of said property owners without change or qualification and thereupon ordered plans and specifications to be prepared for said work, and thereafter in pursuance of said agreement, passed said resolution of intention No. 199."

Third. Those allegations exempting public lands within said district from the payment of any part of the cost and expense of said improvement, as provided by subdivision 8 of section 20 of said Street Improvement Act.

As to the allegations in class 1, we think but little need be said. Any rule that the city council might promulgate adopting a policy regarding improvement of streets may be repealed at the pleasure of the council. This could be done directly by the city rescinding its action adopting the rule or indirectly by taking any action inconsistent with said rule. The city council is given the power to order the streets of the city improved whenever, in the opinion of the city council, "the public interest or convenience may require" (section 2, Street Improvement Act 1911), and any rule promulgated by it, which by its terms would trench upon this power would have no binding effect upon the council. The statute makes no provision for such a petition, nor does it authorize the council to promulgate any such rule.

[11] As to the allegations in class 2, it will be observed that the petition of the owners of property fronting on Harris street, and which it is alleged was approved by the city council, and upon which the resolution of intention was passed, requested the creation of an assessment district, and that the cost and expense of the improvement be assessed according to the benefits derived, the assessment to property on Harris street not to exceed 60 per cent. of the total cost of the improvement. The Improvement Act of 1911 provides two plans by which the cost of improvements incurred thereunder may be paid; one, by assessment against the property according to its frontage on the street improved, and the other by the creation of a district, and the property therein assessed according to the benefits received by each piece of property situated therein. Evidently the signers of said petition desired that the district plan be adopted by the city council in the proceeding which it was proposing to take for the improvement of Harris and other streets in said city, and in the event this plan was adopted they requested that the property of said district be assessed to pay the cost and expense of said improvement according to the benefits derived. They also asked that the assessment against the property fronting upon Harris street should not exceed 60 per cent. of the cost of the improvement. Appellants insist that the city council in approving and granting said petition agreed that the cost of the entire improvement to the property owners on Harris street should not exceed 60 per cent. of the total cost of said improvement, and in pursuance of this agreement they passed the resolution of intention, being resolution No. 199. Appellants contend that this agreement on the part of the city council vitiated the resolution of intention and rendered all proceedings of the city council taken thereafter relative to the said improvement illegal and void. Referring to the copy of the resolution of intention attached to the complaint herein, we find it makes no reference to the petition filed by said property owners and contains no agreement or stipulation whatever relative to the amount or to the proportion of the cost and expense of said improvement which said property owners would be required to pay. It does not even provide that the cost of improvement shall be assessed against the property in the district in proportion to the estimated benefits to be received by each of the several lots or parcels therein situated. It does provide, however, for the formation of an assessment district and makes the expense of said improvement chargeable upon the property of said district, as provided in section 3 of said act. In all respects it complies with the requirements of said section 3 as to the matters and things which shall be contained in such a resolution of intention.

[12,13] The city council is without any authority at the time of the passage of the resolution of intention, or at any other time either before or after the passage of the resolution, to agree with any property owner or other person either that his property shall be assessed in proportion to the benefit it receives from the improvement, or that it will bear only 60 per cent. or any per cent. whatever of the cost of the improvement. The city council can determine that the cost of the improvement shall be chargeable against the property of a district, in which case it becomes the duty of the superintendent of streets, or city engineer, in the event that the last-named officer is designated by the city council, to make the assessment and determine the amount each property owner shall pay for said improvement. Any agreement or understanding between the city council and any property owner as to the cost of said improvement would be void and would be without binding effect either upon the city council or upon any official of said city charged with the duty of preparing said assessment. Assuming, therefore, that the allegations of this cause of action in the complaint are to the effect that such an agreement was made by the city council when it approved and adopted said petition of the property owners, such an attempted agreement was beyond the power of the city council to enter into. It did not bind any of the parties thereto, and, in our opinion, it could not affect the validity of the action of the city council in adopting said resolution. The property owners presenting said petition are presumed to know the law and to know that their property would be liable for the cost of said improvement, in case an assessment district was formed, in proportion to the benefit received therefrom. There is no allegation that the city council acted fraudulently in the matter. On the other hand, the allegations of the complaint show that the petition of these property owners was presented, and whatever action thereon was taken by the city council was in open session of the council.

[14] The allegations in class 3 regarding the exemption of public property require but little consideration. They show that the city council acted in pursuance of the provisions of subdivision 8 of section 20 of the statute, and that its action in that regard was perfectly legal. In our opinion, the facts alleged in the third cause of action were not sufficient to constitute a cause of action and the order sustaining the general demurrer thereto was proper.

[15] Fourth Cause of Action.—The ground upon which it is sought to invalidate said proceedings in this cause of action by proper allegations set out therein is that the city council should have acted by ordinance, and not by resolution in the proceedings taken by it for the improvement of said streets, and that having attempted to thus proceed by resolution and not by ordinance, such proceedings are without authority of law and are, therefore, illegal.

Section 43 of the charter of the city of Eureka provides that "the council shall have power to pass ordinances." Then follow 61 subdivisions of said section in which is enumerated every conceivable power or authority which the council might by any possibility be called upon to exercise. The first of said subdivisions is:

"To establish or alter the grades of, and to open, lay out, alter, extend, close, straighten, widen, or otherwise improve or regulate streets, alleys, lanes, and sidewalks upon the same; determine the width of sidewalks and streets, and the grade of the same, and to provide for acceptance of the streets when constructed and completed in accordance with such regulations as the council may adopt. Also to open, lay out, construct, alter, widen, extend, repair, and vacate walks, crosswalks, avenues, and thoroughfares in or over any plaza, park, or grounds belonging to or under the control of said city."

city could only enact a valid resolution of intention by the passage of an ordinance adopted with all the formalities required by said city charter for the adoption of ordinances of said city. It is conceded that the resolutions passed by the city council in the proceedings to improve said streets were not adopted as ordinances, nor were the charter provisions governing the adoption of ordinances complied with by said city council in the passage of said resolutions. The respondents concede that they proceeded solely under the provisions of the Street Improvement Act of 1911 and claim that they have complied with the terms of said statute in all respects and that the charter provision above referred to has no application to proceedings taken by the city council under the provisions of said improvement act. The charter of said city of Eureka contains no plan or scheme for the improvement of the streets of said city, unless it be held that subdivision 1 of section 43, above quoted, provides for such a plan or scheme. We think a mere reading of said subdivision would indicate that such was not the purpose of the framers of the charter in enacting said subdivision. On the other hand, we think it plainly appears therefrom that this provision of the charter was to govern said city council in its usual and ordinary care over the streets of said city and in the improvement thereof, but it does not purport to provide for a general scheme of improvement like that set forth in the Street Improvement Act of 1911 or in similar statutes which have been passed from time to time by our state Legislature. Section 191 of said charter provides that all improvements and proceedings not otherwise provided for in the charter shall be taken under and in pursuance of the provisions of the laws of the state applicable thereto in force at the time such improvements and proceedings are taken. Under this section of the charter the appellants concede that the city council might proceed under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 to construct a system of improvements such as are provided for in said act, but that where there is any conflict between said charter and said statute the provisions of the charter are paramount and control the proceedings to be taken by said city council. There can be no question that the improvement of the streets of the city is a municipal affair, and that where there is a conflict between the city charter and the general law in a merely municipal affair the provisions of the charter control. Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Com., 175 Cal. 441, 166 P. 351; City of Los Angeles v. Central Trust Co., 173 Cal. 323, 159 P. 1169. While subdivision 1 of section 43 of the charter of the city of Eureka, as already noted, authorizes the city council by ordinance to improve the streets of said city, it contains no provision for a general plan or scheme of street improvement like or similar to that provided for in the Street Improvement Act of 1911.

[17] The Improvement Act of 1911 was, therefore, by said section 191 of the charter, made applicable to the city of Eureka. By its provisions the city council is expressly authorized to proceed in improving the streets of said city in accordance with the plan or scheme provided in said act, and if said act provides that action may be taken by the city council by resolution and not by ordinance, then said city council may proceed in the manner provided by said Improvement Act. Section 3 of this act provides for the resolution of intention, while section 10 of the act directs that the city council shall pass a resolution ordering the work done, and section 18 provides that the "city council by resolution adopted" may provide that the work shall be done under the direction of the city engineer. It will thus be seen that the three resolutions passed by the city council in the street improvement proceedings before us, and concerning which appellants complain, were expressly authorized by the Street Improvement Act of 1911, and as the act was made applicable to the city of Eureka by the express provisions of the charter of said city, the action of said council in proceeding by resolution and not by ordinance was in pursuance of the provisions of said charter as well as in accordance with the terms of said act. Such action, was, therefore, regular and legal.

[18] Appellants call attention to the fact that the city of Eureka has amended its charter and comes within the purview of section 6, art. 11, of the Constitution, as amended in 1914. This amendment to the city charter was approved by the Legislature in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1743). Therefore appellants contend that in the manner of enacting ordinances or resolutions or in the manner of improving streets the council is dealing with municipal affairs and accordingly has the power to make and enforce any and all laws in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to restrictions and limitations of the charter, and, furthermore, that the city of Eureka is not subject to general laws in matters concerning municipal affairs. In the main these contentions of appellants must be conceded, and they are to a certain extent sustained by the following authorities cited by appellants: Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Com., supra; Morgan v. City of Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 301, 187 P. 1050; Heilbron v. Sumner, 186 Cal. 648, 200 P. 409. The true rule as stated in these authorities is set forth in Heilbron v. Sumner, supra, page 650 (200 P. 410), as follows:

"As a result thereof [the amending of a city charter so as to come within the terms of the Constitution as amended in 1914] the city is not subject to general laws in matters concerning municipal affairs except as the charter itself may provide."

We have already seen that the charter of the city of Eureka, by section 191 thereof, has expressly provided that the city of Eureka shall be subject to the general laws of the state applicable to the improvement proceedings in force at the time such improvement proceedings are taken and had. Except for this section of the charter appellants' position would be unassailable, but with this section an integral part of the organic law of the city, its provisions are controlling in the matters set forth therein and bring the city of Eureka within the exception mentioned in the above cases. This disposes of the only point made by appellants in support of the sufficiency of the allegations of the fourth cause of action of said complaint. The demurrer thereto was therefore properly sustained.

[19] Fifth Cause of Action.—The principal allegation of this cause of action is that the assessment district does not include lots adjacent to and fronting on a street in which a sewer provided for in the improvement proceedings is to be laid for a distance of 590 feet. This objection was not contained in a written protest filed with the city council at or before the meeting when the resolution of intention was passed and therefore cannot be now considered. Quoting again from Duncan v. Ramish, supra, the court says:

"It does not appear that any objection was made to the boundaries of the district, and hence it must be held that the decision of the council as to its extent was correct."

Furthermore, this same case lays down the rule, page 696 (76 P. 665), that:

"There is nothing in the law which requires the assessment district fixed by the council to include all the property fronting on the streets. The court cannot say that it might not be possible that some of the property fronting on the streets would not be benefited by the improvement."

This section of the sewer, 590 feet in length, may be merely an outfall sewer for the benefit and convenience of the property in the district and may not in any manner benefit the owners of adjoining land fronting on said street. It would therefore have been proper for the city council to have excluded the property fronting on the street in which said sewer was laid from the burden of paying for its cost of construction.

Sixth Cause of Action.—This cause of action, like the first cause of action, contains merely an allegation upon information and belief that there was included in the work provided for in the resolution of intention private property not deeded to the city nor dedicated to the public as a public street. A special demurrer, based upon the same ground as that set forth in the special de-murrer to the first cause of action, was sustained by the trial court, and upon appellants' failure to amend within the time allowed by the court judgment was entered dismissing said cause of action. There was no error in this action of the court.

Seventh Cause of Action.—Appellants apparently have abandoned this cause of action as they make no reference to it in their brief. It consists principally of restatements of objections to said improvement set forth in the previous causes of action, and which have been already fully discussed by us in considering the sufficiency of the allegations of said several causes of action.

[20] There was also interposed and sustained by the court a general demurrer to the complaint as a whole. If neither one of the causes of action stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the complaint as a whole would, of course be subject to a general demurrer. But independent of the sufficiency of the several causes of action the complaint shows upon its face that the appellants are not entitled to the relief prayed for therein. As already stated in the opening of this opinion, the complaint shows that the city council had initiated proceedings to improve certain streets of the city of Eureka under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 and had passed the three resolutions numbered 199, 1591, and 1592. The last of these resolutions to be passed by the city council was the resolution numbered 1592, passed on the 6th day of April, 1926. The prayer of the complaint is for an injunction enjoining and restraining said defendants, as members of said city council, from doing or performing any acts in their official capacity as the council of Eureka, in further proceeding under said resolutions numbered 199, 1591, and 1592, or in considering bids or in awarding a contract for the construction of said improvement, and for general relief. But it is further alleged in said complaint that the city council on the 27th day of April, 1926, did by resolution, after opening sealed bids for said work, award the contract to do said work to the said defendant, Mercer-Fraser Company, for the price of $218,144.47. In view of this allegation of the complaint, the respondents insist that the general demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained as, they contend, it appears from the face of the complaint that the principal if not all of the acts to be performed by said city council, and which it is sought by this action to enjoin and restrain, had prior to the filing of said complaint been performed by the said city council. It will be noted that plaintiffs ask in their complaint that the members of the city council be enjoined and restrained from doing any act under said resolutions "or in considering bids or awarding a contract for the construction" of said improvement, and for general relief. As the complaint shows that the bids were considered and the contract awarded before the commencement of this action, no injunction will lie to prevent the city council from performing either of said acts. "An injunction lies only to prevent threatened injury and has no application to wrongs which have been completed." Parkinson v. Bldg. Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 602, 98 P. 1027, 1036, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550. "The office of a writ of injunction, as its name imports, is peculiarly a preventive and not a remedial one; it is to restrain the wrongdoer, not to punish him after the wrong has been done or to compel him to undo it." Stewart v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. 543, 546, 35 P. 156, 158; Hatch v. Raney, 9 Cal. App. 716, 100 P. 886; Delger v. Johnson, 44 Cal. 182, 185.

[21] "The point principally urged by appellants is, that it was the duty of the board of trustees, in response to the notice given them by the property owners, to direct the street superintendent to let the contract to them. The work in question was being done under the Improvement Act of April 7, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730). * * * When the board of trustees made its award, its power and duties in respect of letting the contract ceased. It then became the duty of the superintendent of streets either to cause the contract to be entered into by the original bidder or with the property owners should they elect to take over the work. The statute confers this power and duty upon him, acting, of course, in his official capacity, and it was not necessary for the board of trustees to take further action unless there was a failure on the part of the original bidder to enter into the contract, in which case the city council, under section 13, was directed to 'again advertise for proposals or bids.' The notice given by the property owners to the board of trustees conferred no rights upon them nor did it impose any duty upon the board of trustees." Wentland v. Clark & Henery Const. Co., 37 Cal. App. 34, 37, 38, 173 P. 480, 481.

It is, therefore, apparent that no injunction will lie in this proceeding against the members of the city council to restrain them from doing that which the complaint shows upon its face they have already done. But the prayer of the complaint goes further, or at least attempts to do so, by asking that the city council be enjoined from taking any further proceedings under said resolutions and for general relief. Just what further proceedings said council threaten to take under said resolutions the plaintiffs do not specify in their complaint, except that in the seventh cause of action they allege:

"That if not stayed by the process of this court, defendants, as the council of Eureka aforesaid, now threaten to, and unless restrained by the court will, proceed with the construction of said work and the creation of an assessment district therefor."

As to the creation of an assessment district the Street Improvement Act of 1911, section 4 thereof, provides that this may be done in the resolution of intention and the copy of this resolution passed by said city council, a copy of which is attached to plaintiffs' complaint, shows that said city council in said resolution created said assessment district, defined its boundaries, and declared the properties within said boundaries to be benefited "by said work and improvements" and to be assessed to pay the cost and expense thereof. The assessment district had therefore been created prior to the commencement of this action. As to proceeding with the construction of said work there is little if anything that the city council has to do with the work of said improvement after the award of said contract. The improvement Act of 1911 provides that after the contract is awarded it then becomes the duty of the superintendent of streets to either cause said contract to be entered into by the original bidder or with the property owners, should they elect to take over the work. From there on the construction work of said improvement is under the exclusive direction and supervision of the superintendent of streets, or of the city engineer, in case the city council shall so provide, and in this proceeding the city council by said resolution No. 1592 has directed the work to be done under the supervision of the city engineer, and the city council is without authority over the same except in a few and unimportant respects, and it is not alleged that the city council is either acting or threatening to act in these respects, or in any of them. The general demurrer to the complaint was therefore well taken upon this ground, as well as upon the grounds first considered and discussed herein. For these reasons it appears that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENT CO. v. THOMPSON et al. (S. F. 11788.)★

Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 22, 1927.

4. Time ⇨9(4)—Notice of road district improvement, posted September 25, held to allow 20-day period before hearing of objections, set for October 15 (Road District Improvement Act 1907, as amended).

Notice of road district improvement, posted on September 25, held to allow sufficient time before hearing on objections, set for October 15, under Road District Improvement Act of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 806), as amended, requiring lapse of 20 days since posting and first publication; Code Civ. Proc. § 12, being inapplicable, since statute requires that 20 days must elapse after the posting and before the date of hearing.

2. Time ⇨11—Fraction of day is deemed entire day for purposes of computing time.

Law takes no notice of fractions of day, and any fraction is deemed entire day for purpose of computing time, unless in particular case it is necessary to ascertain relative order of occurrences on same day.

3. Time ⇨8—Where reckoning of time is from doing of particular act, day upon which act is done should be counted.

Where reckoning of time is to be made from doing of particular act, day upon which act is done must be counted as one day, especially where intention to exclude such day does not appear.

4. Highways ⇨113(2)—Pre-existing indebtedness against land in road district, under improvement act, held to justify officer's refusal to execute contract for further improvements (Road District Improvement Act 1907, as amended by St. 1921, p. 326, § 22).

Existence of outstanding indebtedness against land in road district, under Road District Improvement Act of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 806), as amended by St. 1921, p. 326, § 22, describing form of bonds to be issued as one of series which constitute only indebtedness of district, held to justify refusal of chairman of board of county supervisors to execute contract for further improvements under same act, notwithstanding St. 1921, p. 325, § 20, which provides no bonds or assessment shall be held invalid for defects in proceedings.

5. Constitutional law ⇨290(1)—Highways ⇨122—Provision for levy of taxes to satisfy bonded indebtedness for road improvements in same manner as county taxes held not unconstitutional (Road District Improvement Act 1907, as amended by St. 1921, p. 329, § 26).

Road District Improvement Act 1907 (St. 1907, p. 806), as amended by St. 1921, p. 329, § 26, which provides for levying and collecting taxes to pay installments of principal and interest on bonded indebtedness for road improvements in same mode as ordinary county taxes, held not unconstitutional as denying property owner knowledge of amount of special assessment tax, or because of fluctuations in assessed values, or possibility of inequality due to delinquent taxes.

6. Highways ⇨138—In absence of fraud, court will not determine effect of proposed paving improvement on abutting property, though cost is claimed excessive.

Where no fraud is alleged or proved in assessment proceedings for improvement of highway, court will not determine probable effect of paving on value of assessed property in determining validity of assessment, though cost is claimed to be excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by the Municipal Improvement Company against C. V. Thompson, Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of San Mateo County, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Franklin Swart, of Redwood City, John D. Willard, of San Francisco, James T. O'Keefe, of Redwood City, J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, and J. W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, for appellants.

Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This action was commenced in the superior court in and for the county of San Mateo to compel the chairman of the board of supervisors of said county to sign a contract awarded by said board to the plaintiff for the performance of certain street work in a proceeding had and taken under the Road District Improvement Act of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 806), as amended. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants have appealed. In their answer the defendants allege and now urge that the said proceedings are invalid for reasons which will be considered.

The resolution of intention was published on the 15th, 22d, and 29th days of September, 1923, and the "Notice of Road District Improvement" was posted on September 25. On October 15 the board of supervisors proceeded to hear such objections as were offered against the work, including those of the defendants other than the defendant chairman of said board, and on the same day the board adopted a resolution ordering the work to be done and fixing the time for the reception of bids on November 5. Notice to bidders was duly posted and published, the bids were received, opened, and examined, and on November 19, 1923, the board adopted a resolution awarding the contract to the plaintiff. Subsequently a form of contract was presented to the defendant chairman of said board for his signature. He refused to sign the contract on the ground that he had been advised by counsel for certain interested property owners that the proceedings were irregular, and that he thought, in the interest of all concerned, the legality of the proceedings should be tested in court. This action was accordingly commenced to compel the execution of the contract.

[1] It is first contended that the board of supervisors was without jurisdiction to hear the objections to the work at the time the same were heard and disposed of by reason of an alleged insufficient notice of the passage of the resolution of intention. Section 4 of the act provides that printed copies of the resolution of intention headed "Notice of Road District Improvement" shall be "posted along the line of the work described in said resolution * * * and published. * * * Affidavits in proof of such publication and posting shall be filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors. When, before the day of the hearing specified in the resolution of intention, twenty days have elapsed since the posting and the first publication (they need not be simultaneous) of the resolution of intention, the board of supervisors shall have acquired power to proceed with such hearing and to take all other action in the proceeding as is in this act authorized."

[2, 3] We think the notice of hearing of objections was sufficient. Under well-recognized rules, either September 25, the date of the posting, should be included in the computation of the 20-day period, or, if that day be excluded, October 15 should be included. In either case, the period of 20 days elapsed between the posting of the notice and the hearing of the objections. Under the peculiar wording of the statute the question would not seem to be determinable by the rule laid down in section 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is a re-enactment of section 307 of the original Practice Act (St. 1850, p. 455). If the statute had been made to read that the objections should be heard at least "twenty days after the posting of notices," section 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure would require that September 25 be excluded and October 15 be included and the 20-day period would intervene. But the statute requires that 20 days must elapse after the posting and before the day of hearing. Counsel for the defendants have misread the language of the statute in their argument where-in they urge that 20 days must elapse "after the day of posting." The statute reads "since the posting." The law takes no notice of fractions of a day. Any fraction of a day is deemed a day unless in a particular case it is necessary to ascertain the relative order of occurrences on the same day. It was early recognized as settled that:

"Where the reckoning is to be made from an 'act done' [here the posting of the notice on September 25], the day upon which it was done must, of necessity, be counted as one day, because if that day be excluded, then the count, instead of being from the act itself, is really from the day following the doing of the act, which would be a subsequent point of time." Price v. Whitman, 8 Cal. 412, 416; Iron Mountain Co. v. Haight, 39 Cal. 540.

This is true especially when, as here, there is no indication that the day on which the act was done was intended to be excluded. Derby v. City of Modesto, 104 Cal. 515, 522, 38 P. 900; 24 Cal. Jur. 577 et seq. It may also be noted that the first publication of said notice was on the 15th day of September, 1923, a full month prior to the date set for the hearing of the objections. In any event, the notice was sufficient.

[4] In their first affirmative defense the defendants alleged, and the court found, that on the 11th day of September, 1923, which was the date of the passage of the ordinance of intention, there was an outstanding indebtedness against the land in this identical district of $18,631.90, and that this indebtedness represented the balance unpaid and not yet due of a total indebtedness of $37,263.81 incurred for public work performed in a prior proceeding taken under said Road District Improvement Act of 1907 pursuant to a resolution of intention adopted October 16, 1917. It is the contention of the defendants that the board of supervisors was without authority to commence another proceeding under said act when there was a pre-existing indebtedness on the land in the same district created under said act. The contention is based on the language of section 22 of the Act of 1907 as amended in 1921. In that section the form of the bonds to be issued to represent the cost of the improvement is prescribed. Included in the required form is the statement that:

"This bond * * * is one of a series of bonds of like date and effect * * * issued in behalf of road improvement district number * * * of said county, which constitute the only indebtedness of said district."

It is argued that by including the statement that the said bonds "constitute the only indebtedness of said district," the Legislature has in effect prohibited proceedings under the act and the issuance of further bonds thereunder unless it be true that said bonds "constitute the only indebtedness of the district." We are persuaded that there is much of substance in this contention. The form prescribed by section 12 of the act as originally adopted contained no such requirement. In 1915 the section was amended (Stats. 1915, p. 1397) so as to require that the board of supervisors include in the form of the bond a representation that said bonds "constitute the only indebtedness of the district." This section was again amended in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 516), and the same requirement was repeated. The statute was revised in 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 311), and the identical language again employed. In this revision, however, the requirement as to the form of the bond is incorporated in section 22 (Stats. 1921, p. 326). We are not at liberty to disregard the requirement of the statute. Its obvious purpose was to assure property owners in the district that improvement bonds of this sort would not be pyramided upon the district by similar, successive, and contemporaneous proceedings and was further to assure the contractor and all purchasers and holders of said bonds that said bonds, when issued, would constitute the only indebtedness of the district. This purpose may reasonably be deemed to result in making the bonds a more marketable and stable security as well as having an influence on the bids for the work favorable to the property owners. If bonds be issued to represent the cost of the improvement in the present proceeding and the bonds issued to pay for a former improvement be outstanding, unpaid, and not yet due, as in this case, the statement to be incorporated in the bonds about to be issued and required by the statute, to wit, that there is no other indebtedness of the district, would be false. The statute requires the board of supervisors to make that representation in the body of the bond, and under the law the chairman of the board of supervisors must sign the bonds. Every consideration in law and equity demands that when the required representation be made it be the truth of the matter. We are not now dealing with the effect of the language in section 20 of the act that:

"No bonds and assessment or tax thereafter [after the acceptance of the work] levied for the payment of the bonds to be issued for said work and expenses shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality, omission or other defect in the proceedings where the resolution of intention has been actually published as in this act provided, before the said board shall have ordered the work to be done." Stats. 1921, p. 325.

We are dealing with a situation where no work has been done, and where it appears that the chairman of the board of supervisors has refused to sign the contract when it is made known to him that bonds must thereafter be signed by him to represent the cost of the work and that such bonds when so signed would contain a statement which to his knowledge would be false. In such case the so-called curative clause has no application and the proceedings may be halted until such time as the statutory requirement has been complied with. If it be suggested that the proceedings should not be declared void in toto, but only an abatement ordered until such time as the present outstanding indebtedness of the improvement district be paid off, it is at once observable that such a construction of the statutory provision might result in grave injustice either to the contractor or to the property owners. If the contractor has made his bid and the contract has been awarded to him and several years be required to elapse before he can proceed with the performance of his work, the cost of material and labor on which his bid was based may in the meantime have materially increased. On the other hand, if such cost units have materially decreased, the result would be that the property owners would be required to pay more for the work than would be just and proper at the time the work was done. Our conclusion is that it was the intention of the Legislature that improvement proceedings under the act of 1907 should not be instituted until all indebtedness outstanding against the district and incurred by reason of prior proceedings under said act has been fully paid. It was thus the duty of the board of supervisors under the law to refrain from piling one indebtedness of the district upon another of the same district, and the chairman of the board was justified in refusing to sign said contract. The plaintiff seeks to meet the present objection by urging that the installments of principal and interest on the bonds to be issued for the contemplated improvement and falling due before the retirement of the old bond issue may for aught that now appears be paid out of funds raised otherwise than by a special assessment tax on the lands in the district. But it does otherwise appear. Section 6 of the notice of award, attached as an exhibit to plaintiff's complaint, provides that a special fund for the payment of said bonds is to be raised by the levy of special assessment taxes upon all the lands in the district. It is further contended that if said bonds be issued they will, under the holdings in Woodill & Hulse Electric Co. v. Young, 180 Cal. 667, 182 P. 422, 5 A. L. R. 1296, and Barber Asphalt Co. v. Armstrong, 48 Cal. App. 70, 191 P. 954, be a superior lien and be in effect the only indebtedness of the district. The cases just referred to did not involve proceedings under the Road Improvement Act of 1907, but were concerned with proceedings under other street improvement acts where no such restriction is found. The plaintiff further relies on San Francisco Paving Co. v. Egan, 146 Cal. 635, 80 P. 1076, and Flickinger v. Fay, 119 Cal. 590, 51 P. 855. Those cases likewise are not in point for the reason that the proceedings involved therein were taken under street improvement acts which contained no restrictions such as found in the act of 1907.

[5] The defendants challenge the constitutionality of the act of 1907 under the state and federal Constitutions. Section 26 of the act (as amended by St. 1921, p. 329, § 26) provides that the tax to be levied to satisfy the bond obligation "shall be levied and collected in the same mode and manner and by the same officers as the ordinary county taxes, and all laws applicable to the levy, collection and enforcement of such county taxes, are hereby made applicable to said special taxes." By reason of this provision it is contended that the property owner may not know of the amount of the special assessment tax to be paid by him until the final installment on said bonds is to be paid (1) because of the fluctuations in assessed values from year to year, and (2) because the tax on some of the lots in the district may become delinquent and some of the landowners be required to pay an undue proportion in order to make up a sufficient fund to pay said installments. It is accordingly urged that the land of one property owner in the district may thus be impressed with a tax not properly chargeable to it, but chargeable against the land of the delinquent owner. We deem it not essential to the validity of the statute that the property owner be advised in advance of the precise amount he will be required to pay each year as the special assessment tax is levied to satisfy the installments of principal and interest on the bonds as they become due. The law requires the board of supervisors to levy and collect sufficient funds for that purpose. This requirement is mandatory. When the contract is let, the property owner does know the amount of the cost of the work which will be represented by the principal of bonds to be issued. The defendants herein were so advised, it is assumed, for they are objecting to the contract price. The nature of the proceedings is such that precision as to the exact amount of future levies as against each lot is impossible by reason of fluctuations in assessed valuations from year to year and delinquencies in payment of the tax on the part of some landowners in the district. These facts are not alleged in the answer, but they may be assumed. It would not follow therefrom that the method of ad valorem assessment would be invalid. If the value of a particular lot increase, it is reasonable to assume that the benefit and burden would increase proportionately. If the value decrease, a lessening of the assessment would result. If some of the special assessment payments become delinquent from year to year, it would not follow that the lands of the delinquent owners would be relieved from paying the charge. It would be merely postponed. With the penalties and costs accruing to the bond fund, it is reasonable to assume that the burden is equalized during the period that the bonds are outstanding.

The act of 1907 has received consideration in numerous cases in this state. Its validity on numerous grounds of attack has been declared. Thomas v. Pridham, 171 Cal. 98, 153 P. 933; Barber Asphalt Co. v. Bancroft, 167 Cal. 185, 138 P. 742; Dillingham v. Welch, 179 Cal. 656, 178 P. 512; Pierce v. County of Solano, 62 Cal. App. 465, 217 P. 545; Swall v. County of Los Angeles, 42 Cal. App. 758, 184 P. 406; Hunt v. Manning, 24 Cal. App. 44, 140 P. 39; McCray v. Manning, 22 Cal. App. 25, 133 P. 17. The ad valorem method of assessment has been upheld. Los Angeles County Flood Control District v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 169 P. 1028; Thomas v. Pridham, supra; Swall v. County of Los Angeles, supra. The method providing for the apportionment of the assessment on the lots in the district has been held to be a proper subject-matter of legislative discretion. Emery v. San Francisco Gas Co., 28 Cal. 345; Hendrick v. Crowley, 31 Cal. 471, 474; Mahoney v. Braverman, 54 Cal. 565, 568; Clute v. Turner, 157 Cal. 73, 81, 106 P. 240; Thomas v. Pridham, supra; Swall v. County of Los Angeles, supra. The defendants rely largely on Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 19 S. Ct. 187, 43 L. Ed. 443, and Spring Street Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 170 Cal. 24, 148 P. 217, L. R. A. 1918E, 197. The effect of these decisions has been discussed and their application limited in Thomas v. Pridham, supra. See, also, Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 691, 76 P. 661. We find nothing in those cases which brings the present case within the doctrine they declare. The defendants do not allege that no benefits will accrue to their lands. The court found that benefits would accrue, and expressions of the Supreme Court of the United States following the Norwood Case, especially those found in the case of Kansas City Ry. v. Road District, 266 U. S. 379, 45 S. Ct. 136, 69 L. Ed. 335, are to the effect that it is only when the legislative determination as to benefits is palpably arbitrary and therefore a plain abuse of power can it be said that it offends the due-process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 P. 71.

[6] Finally, it is contended by the defendants that the evidence shows that the cost of the proposed work is grossly excessive when compared with the value of the lots in the district. The engineer of the proposed work testified that the original cost of the work would be in the proportion of $566.92 for each 50-foot lot in the district and the total amount to be represented by the principal and interest on the bonds to be issued to represent the cost of the work would total $226,295.37. The average assessed value of the lots in the district is $150. The fair average market value of the lots in the district appears to be from $500 to $600. There are 384 50-foot lots in the district. It thus appears that the contract price is approximately equivalent to the market value of the lots in the district. As stated by the judge at the conclusion of the trial, the case presents a most unfortunate situation. There was evidence that the type of pavement provided for in the specifications is too costly for a district embracing property of such valuation. It may be that by reason of the improvement the values will be more than doubled in consequence of the pavement. Such may not be the case. These are not matters for our determination on this record. No fraud is alleged or proved. It is claimed that the bids were advertised for and the contract was awarded at a time when prices were at their peak. In a new proceeding, if one be commenced, either less costly pavement may be specified or more advantageous prices may be received. These are questions to be determined by the board of supervisors in the exercise of their sound discretion. For the reason only that said board was not authorized to institute and carry to completion the proceedings in question in the face of said prior and outstanding indebtedness of the district, the judgment is reversed.

WILLARD et al. v. GLENN-COLUSA IRR. DIST. et al. (Sac. 3674.)★

Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 1, 1927.

1. Trial $\S$ 396(2)—Court's finding wholly without issues made by pleadings had no place in action, and could not be considered (Irrigation District Act as amended).

Where plaintiffs alleged that rules of board of directors of irrigation district organized under Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended) were discriminatory, but failed to allege that defendants operating under rules discriminated against plaintiffs, finding that certain acts of defendants were discriminatory, unfair, and inequitable, was wholly without issues made by pleadings, and had no place in action, and could not be considered on appeal.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 878(1)—Plaintiffs, not appealing from judgment, could not complain of its effect as to them.

Where plaintiffs had not appealed from judgment, they were not in position to complain of its effect as to them.

3. Waters and water courses $\S$ 216—Irrigation District Act held not unconstitutional, because entire burden of maintaining irrigation system would be cast on landowners using water (Irrigation District Act, $\S$ 55, as amended by St. 1911, p. 516, $\S$ 11; Const. art. 11, $\S$ 13).

Irrigation District Act, $\S$ 55, as amended by St. 1911, p. 516, $\S$ 11, providing for collection of tolls or rates for use of water by landowners, enacted under authority of Const. art. 11, $\S$ 13, providing that Legislature has power to provide for regulation of affairs of irrigation districts, held not unconstitutional on ground that, if state board attempted to exercise limits of power, entire burden of maintaining and operating system would be cast on landowners using water.

4. Constitutional law $\S$ 48—Statute acquiesced in and acted on for long period should not be declared illegal, except after convincing demonstration of invalidity.

Statute which has been acquiesced in and acted on for a long period of time should not be lightly set aside or declared illegal, except after most clear and convincing demonstration of its invalidity.

5. Waters and water courses $\S$ 257(1)—Rules providing for ascending scale of rates for water used by landowners held not invalid (Irrigation District Act, as amended).

Rules of board of directors of irrigation district organized under Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended), providing for ascending or increasing scale of rates for water used by landowners, held not unreasonable or unwarranted, even though there was ample water in district to meet all requirements of users in district.

6. Waters and water courses $\S$ 257(1)—Rule requiring payment in advance of tolls for water used by landowners held not illegal (Irrigation District Act, $\S$ 39f, as added by St. 1917, p. 768, $\S$ 33).

Rule of board of directors of irrigation district, requiring payment in advance of tolls for water used by landowners under authority of Irrigation District Act, $\S$ 39f, as added by St. 1917, p. 768, $\S$ 33, held not illegal.

7. Waters and water courses $\S$ 257(1)—Irrigation District Act does not limit amount to be raised by tolls, but merely limits assessments (Irrigation District Act, $\S$ 39, as amended by St. 1917, p. 765, $\S$ 27).

Irrigation District Act, $\S$ 39, as amended by St. 1917, p. 765, $\S$ 27, limiting annual assessment to 2 per cent. of aggregate value of lands within irrigation district, does not limit aggregate amount to be raised by annual assessment, and also by means of tolls, but merely limits amount of annual assessment.

8. Waters and water courses $\S$ 257(1)—Irrigation district directors' determination that drainage machinery and construction of ditches should be paid from operation account was controlling on courts.

Determination of board of directors of irrigation district that drainage machinery and construction of drainage ditches to protect lands of district from seepage water should be paid from operation and maintenance account, where trial court found that it was necessary expense, was controlling on courts, and funds raised by tolls could be used to pay for same.

9. Waters and water courses $\S$ 257(1)—Finding of character of plaintiffs' lands assessed for water held not finding that particular part of lands was not loose or porous (Irrigation District Act as amended).

In action to have declared invalid certain assessments by irrigation district organized under Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended) against plaintiffs' lands for water, in which plaintiffs claimed that board discriminated in metering part of lands of district and not others, finding "it is not true that all lands of plaintiffs are loose and porous" was not finding that any particular part of plaintiffs' lands were not loose or porous.

10. Waters and water courses $\S$ 257(1)—Findings held not to show that irrigation district director's action in metering water was discriminatory (Irrigation District Act as amended).

Findings from which it could be reasonably inferred that plaintiff's lands, being loose and porous, were metered, but other rice lands known as typical rice lands, which required less water than loose and porous lands, were not metered, did not justify conclusion that action of board of directors of irrigation district organized under Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended) in metering part of lands and not others was either discriminatory or inequitable.

11. Judgment ¶256(1)—Where there was no finding on certain evidence, judgment could not be held to have been based thereon.

In action to have declared invalid certain assessments for water to extent that they included tolls, where there was evidence that in some instances board metered plaintiffs' lands only after protests had been filed by adjacent landowners against growing of rice in vicinity, but court made no finding on such evidence, judgment could not be held to have been based thereon.

12. Waters and water courses ¶257(1)—Where complaint contained no averment that plaintiffs paid any excess tolls for water, judgment providing for repayment thereby must be reversed.

In action to have declared invalid assessments for water against plaintiffs' lands to extent that assessments included charges other than regular annual assessment, where complaint contained no averment that plaintiff had paid any of excess tolls, and there was no finding that such payment had been made, judgment providing for repayment to plaintiffs of several amounts paid by them respectively on account of excess tolls must be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; E. P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by E. E. Willard and others against the Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hankins & Hankins, of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. L. Cowell, of Stockton, amicus curiæ.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and W. T. Belieu, of Willows, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted by certain landowners of the defendant irrigation district against the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district and its board of directors to have declared invalid certain assessments against the lands of plaintiffs to the extent that said assessments include any tolls or charges other than the regular annual assessment and to enjoin the enforcement of said assessment until said reductions are made. The complaint alleged the incorporation of the district, the names of the directors, the ownership of certain lands therein by the plaintiffs, and the use on said lands by plaintiffs of water during the assessment year 1922 for the purpose of irrigating said lands, and raising crops thereon, and that at all times during said year there was available to said district sufficient water for the irrigation for any purpose of the whole of the lands comprised in said district. Plaintiffs then allege in their said complaint that under the pretended authority of the California Irrigation District Act the board of directors of said district in March, 1922, adopted certain rules and regulations, among which were rules 6, 6 A, and 6 B, which are as follows:

"Rule 6. Measurements and Rates.—The district shall be entitled to place meters or other measuring devices and turnouts in such of the ditches, canals, and laterals as they may consider necessary or proper, or may compute the amount of water delivered by reading the electric meters of the water user where water is taken from the canal by electrically operated pumps. Such meters or measuring devices may be used for the whole or any part of the irrigation season or for the whole or any part of a lateral system, and the metered charges based upon the average seasonal use of water as shown by said meters or measuring devices for the period of their installation.

"Rule 6 A. Normal Quantities and Rates.—Water for the irrigation of general crops and orchards will be charged for at the rate of 75 cents per acre, for the use of an average of not to exceed two acre feet per acre irrigated.

"Water for the irrigation of pasture land or for the sprouting of water grass, or for other purposes where but one irrigation for the season is required, will be charged for at the rate of 50 cents per acre for the use of not to exceed one acre foot per acre irrigated. If more than one second foot of water is required for such purposes, the charge shall be the same as for general crops. Delivery of water for these purposes will only be made when water is available.

"Water for the irrigation of rice will be charged for at the rate of $4.00 per acre, for an average of not to exceed six acre feet per acre irrigated.

"Rule 6 B. Excess Quantities and Rates.—"Whenever the average use of water for either rice or general crops exceeds said normal quantities as specified in rule 6 A, such additional water as may be supplied will be charged for as follows:

"First acre foot in excess of normal, $.6666 per acre foot.

"Second acre foot in excess of normal, $1.00 per acre foot.

"Third acre foot in excess of normal, $1.75 per acre foot.

"Fourth acre foot in excess of normal, $2.50 per acre foot.

"Fifth acre foot in excess of normal, $3.25 per acre foot.

"All over five acre feet in excess of normal, $4 per acre foot."

Then are set forth in the complaint allegations 8 to 14, as follows:

"VIII. That said rule 6 is without the authority of the defendants and unlawful, in that it purports to create discriminatory methods of ascertaining the quantity of water distributed by said district to different tracts of land comprised in said district.

"IX. That said rule 6 A is without the authority of the defendants and unlawful, in that it purports to create discriminatory charges for water distributed by said district.

"X. That rule 6 B is without the authority of the defendants and unlawful, in that it purports to create discriminatory charges for water distributed by the district.

"XI. That said rules 6, 6 A, and 6 B are arbitrary and inequitable, in that they create discriminations and preferences between the landowners in said district.

"XII. That said rules 6 A and 6 B are respectively without the authority of the defendants and unlawful, in that the tolls and charges therein provided for are not required for any of the purposes for which tolls and charges are authorized to be made under the provisions of section 55 of said act, or otherwise howsoever.

"XIII. That said rules 6 A and 6 B are without the authority of the defendants and are unlawful, in that they are not charged to and collectable from all persons using the canal of said district for irrigation and other purposes, but are confined to persons using water for the purposes referred to in said rules 6 A and 6 B.

"XIV. That said rules 6 A and 6 B are without the authority of the defendants and are unlawful, in that they are not intended for any purpose of the district, but are intended solely to prevent the raising of rice on lands within said district."

It is then alleged that, acting under the pretended authority of these rules, defendants have caused the quantity of water used by plaintiffs to be ascertained by meter and have for said assessment year charged the plaintiffs with water according to tolls and charges provided for and set forth in rules 6 A and 6 B, and that on October 28, 1922, defendants caused the same to become a part of the assessment against plaintiffs' said lands for said assessment year; that said assessment is unlawful and invalid to the extent of the amount added thereto as aforesaid, and that plaintiffs have at all times been able, willing, and ready to pay the whole of any assessment, toll, or charge lawfully chargeable against them or against their lands.

The defendants in their answer denied that there was available for said district at all times during said year sufficient water for the irrigation for any purpose of the whole of the lands comprised in said district. They then deny that any of the rules and regulations set forth in plaintiffs' complaint is unlawful or invalid and admit that under the authority of said rules and regulations they caused the quantity of water used by plaintiffs to be ascertained by meter and for said assessment year have charged the plaintiffs with water according to the tolls provided for in rules 6 A and 6 B and that they caused the same to become a part of the assessment against plaintiffs' lands for said assessment year. As a further and separate answer the defendants allege that said district comprised an area of 103,000 acres of land, varying greatly in texture, character, presence of hardpan, and in other respects, and in particular in reference to the action of water thereon, the quantity of water necessary to raise crops thereon, and the loss of water by reason of seepage; that approximately 60,000 acres thereof are of such texture and character as to be what is called typical rice lands or lands upon which rice can be raised economically, profitably, and without unreasonable use or waste of water and without damage to surrounding land; that the balance of said lands of said district are of a loose and porous texture without hardpan and upon which rice cannot be raised except by the excessive use of water, and in which use the water is wasted, and damage to other lands occurs by reason of excessive seepage through said lands; that by reason of the difference in the use of water for general crops, rice raised on such typical rice lands and rice raised on the porous lands, it was necessary for the board of directors to make rules and regulations so as to provide for the use of water on all of said lands and to prevent damage to surrounding and adjacent lands through excessive seepage. The defendants then proceed to set forth the steps taken by the board of directors in the adoption of a set of by-laws, rules, and regulations, of which rules 6, 6 A and 6 B were and are a part; that plaintiffs had knowledge that said by-laws were being formulated; that copies thereof, after their adoption, were sent to the plaintiffs; that plaintiffs in compliance therewith made application for water to be used upon their respective lands during said assessment year and other facts which defendants claim estopped plaintiffs from objecting to said assessment against their said lands. The answer further alleged as separate defenses that plaintiffs' action was barred by the provisions of section 69 and also by the provisions of section 72 of the California Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended).

Upon the issues made by these pleadings the action went to trial and the trial court made findings and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiffs. The court found that at all times during said assessment year there was available to said district sufficient water for irrigation for all purposes of the whole of the lands of said district; that said lands consisted of 103,000 acres of land, each acre of which was entitled to its proportion of the amount of water distributed by said district for irrigation purposes based upon the ratio which the last assessment of the owners of said lands bears to the whole sum assessed upon the district; that rules 6, 6 A, and 6 B were without the authority of said board to adopt and were illegal in the respects specified in the complaint; that defendants have caused the quantity of water used by plaintiffs as found by the court to be ascertained by meter, and have for said assessment year charged the plaintiffs with said water according to the tolls and charges mentioned in rules

6 A and 6 B and have not caused the quantity of water used by other lands in said district for the growing of rice thereon or otherwise to be metered or otherwise ascertained; that the said actions of defendants are discriminatory, unfair, and unequal; that the assessment based upon said rules is unlawful and invalid to the extent thereto; that at a hearing of said board held on the 28th day of October, 1922, it was ordered that the unpaid balance of tolls and charges levied and charged for the use of water on the lands of plaintiffs should be added to and become a part of the assessment levied for the year 1922 upon such lands; that thereafter said amounts were purported to be duly ascertained and added to the said assessment, but the same were improperly and unlawfully added to said assessment and are not lawfully a part and portion thereof.

The court further found that approximately 60,000 acres in said district are of such texture and character as to be what is known as typical rice lands or lands upon which rice can be raised economically, profitably, and without unreasonable use or waste of water and without damage to surrounding lands; that the balance of the lands in said district are of a loose and porous texture without hardpan and upon which rice cannot be raised except by the use of large quantities of water, but it is not true that rice cannot be raised upon said last-mentioned land except by an excessive use of water, nor is it true that in using water for the cultivation of rice on said lands such water is necessarily wasted and damage to other lands occurs by reason of excessive seepage through the lands upon which the water is used; that by reason of the difference in the use of water for general crops, rice crops raised on said typical rice lands and rice raised on porous lands, it was necessary for the board of directors of said district to make rules and regulations so as to provide for the use of water on all of said lands and to prevent waste of water and to prevent damage to surrounding and adjacent lands through excessive seepage, but it is not true that said rules 6 A and 6 B in any way provide for the use of water on all of said porous lands or prevent waste of water or prevent damage to adjacent or surrounding lands through excessive seepage or otherwise. The court then proceeds to find, in accordance with the allegations of defendants' special defense, that the by-laws, rules, and regulations were adopted at meetings of the board of directors at which a large number of land-owners of said district were present, but that all of plaintiffs were not present at said meetings; that thereafter copies of said by-laws were sent to each of the plaintiffs, but that it is not true that said plaintiffs had knowledge of said by-laws, rules, and regulations and of the rates fixed by said board of directors at all times mentioned in the complaint.

It then finds that the plaintiffs were not estopped from objecting to the said by-laws, rules, regulations, or rates, or from objecting to the assessment based thereon, and that plaintiffs' cause of action was not barred by the provisions of section 69 or the provisions of section 72 of the California Irrigation District Act. The court further finds:

"It is not true that all of the lands of the plaintiffs are loose and porous. It is not true that any of such lands in raising rice thereon require an excessive use of water. It is not true that said lands do not hold and retain such water, or that same seeps through such lands and thereby wastes such water, or damages surrounding or adjoining lands through any waste or excessive use of water. It is not true that plaintiffs wasted any water or that by reason of any wasteful use of water by plaintiffs said defendant district was required to make additional expenditures in pumping additional water, or in protecting its canals from breaks or overflow by reason of additional water carried therein for any purpose aforesaid. It is true, in protecting the lands of the district from a high water table and seepage water, said defendant was required to and did purchase drainage machinery and did construct drainage ditches at a great expense to said district, but it is not true that such high water table and seepage was caused solely by plaintiffs or persons using water for the cultivation of rice. It is true that a portion of the expense of said machinery and ditches was intended to be paid by or out of the additional income to be derived from the tolls collected for the use of said water on the lands of the plaintiffs. It is true that defendant district did purchase machinery and construct drainage ditches at a great expense, but no portion of such expense is payable by or out of any tolls or charges collected for the use of water."

Upon these findings the court rendered judgment in plaintiffs' favor:

"That the assessments referred to in the pleadings on file herein be and the same are hereby declared void and invalid to the extent of the amounts added thereto in respect of the excess tolls and charges mentioned in rule B referred to in said pleading, and that the said assessments be and the same are hereby reduced accordingly." (Rule B. referred to is evidently intended to mean rule 6 B mentioned in the pleadings. Said rule is also referred to in the findings as rule B.)

The court further decreed that said assessment created no lien on any property of the plaintiffs; that defendants and their agents and servants and all persons acting on behalf of them or any of them be restrained from enforcing said assessment until after reduction as aforesaid and that plaintiffs have and recover from defendant district all payments made by them or any of them in respect of any excess tolls and charges aforesaid and for plaintiffs' costs of suit.

Before proceeding to a discussion of the legal questions arising upon this appeal, it might be well for us to consider the nature of the action as made by plaintiffs' complaint. In brief, the plaintiffs allege in their complaint that the defendants adopted rules 6, 6 A, and 6 B without any legal authority so to do, and accordingly said rules are illegal and void; that acting upon the pretended authority of said rules the defendants have metered plaintiff's lands and charged them rates or tolls for a portion of the water used thereon during the assessment year of 1922 and have added the amount of said tolls to plaintiffs' several assessments for said year and plaintiffs ask that the collection of said assessment be enjoined until the amount of said tolls are deducted therefrom. It will be noted that the only complaint plaintiffs make is that they were required to pay tolls or water rates for water used by them during said year instead of being furnished water for their said lands to be paid for by regular annual assessment. It will further be noted that plaintiffs do not complain of any discrimination against them in any manner whatever. There is no allegation in the complaint directly charging or from which it can be reasonably inferred that plaintiffs are treated any differently from other landowners of the district owning lands similarly to those of the plaintiffs or that they are charged any different or higher rates for the water used by them than the other landowners of the district are compelled to pay for a like amount of water used under the same conditions as plaintiffs have used the water for which they are charged. In other words, plaintiffs' sole contention, as made by their complaint, is that the district has no authority to charge tolls or rates for water used, but that the sole authority of the district to charge and collect for water used by the landowners is by an assessment against the property of said landowners situated in said district.

[1] By reference to the findings it will be seen that they are confined to the issues made by the pleadings in most instances, but not in all. In finding 12, for instance, it is found that defendants have caused plaintiffs' lands to be metered and have charged the plaintiffs according to tolls and charges mentioned in rules 6 A and 6 B and have not caused the quantity of water used by other lands in said district for the growing of rice or otherwise to be metered or otherwise ascertained; that said acts of defendants are discriminatory, unfair, and inequitable. This finding is wholly without the issues made by the pleadings and has no part or place in the action whatever, and cannot be considered herein. This must be so for the reason as we have already seen that the complaint contains no allegations that the defendants have discriminated against the plaintiffs by metering their lands and failing to meter lands of others similarly situated. It is true plaintiffs allege that said rules are discriminatory, and therefore illegal, but they fail to allege that the defendants operating under said rules have in any way discriminated against said plaintiffs.

[2] It will be further noted that, while the court purports to find that rules 6, 6 A, and 6 B were without the authority of said board to adopt and were illegal in the respects specified in the complaint, the judgment decrees that the assessments are void and invalid only to the extent of the amounts added thereto in respect to the excess tolls and charges mentioned in rule B (6 B), and such judgment directs that the assessment be reduced accordingly. By the judgment, therefore, that portion of the assessment levied in pursuance of rules 6 and 6 A is not affected. It will be remembered that rule 6 provides for the metering of the lands of the district in whole or in part and that rule 6 A provides for the "normal rates" to be charged for the use of water under the meter system, while rule 6 B provides for the "excess rates" charged under said system. It is apparent, therefore, that the only part of said assessments invalidated by the judgment is that portion thereof which includes the "excess rates" charged plaintiffs. The judgment, therefore, tacitly sustains the right of the district to meter the lands thereof and to charge the "normal rates" provided in rule 6 A for the use of water thereon under the meter system. The plaintiffs have not appealed from said judgment, and therefore are not in a position to complain of its effect as to them. The defendants have appealed and the only question raised by their appeal is to that portion of said judgment which decrees that the assessments are "void and invalid to the extent of the amounts added thereto in respect of the excess tolls and charges mentioned in rule B" (6 B).

Respondents, however, have raised the question of the power of the board of directors of said district to meter the lands thereof and to charge either the normal or excess tolls or rates provided in said rules. This argument is probably made upon the theory that, if the board is without such authority, then all that part of the said assessment made up of charges for normal or excess rates is invalid and void, and, if the whole is invalid and void, then that portion in respect to excess rates is invalid and void. Appellants have met respondents' arguments practically under the same theory. The brief filed by the amicus curiæ is evidently filed upon the theory that the question of the power and authority of the irrigation district to levy and collect tolls is one and probably the most important question presented on this appeal. We will therefore consider this question as one properly within the scope of this appeal and will attempt to arrive at the correct determination thereof. It is appellants' contention that the board of directors of said district under the California Irrigation District Act was clearly within its power in adopting said by-laws, rules, and regulations in which rules 6, 6 A, and 6 B were a part thereof and that rules 6, 6 A, and 6 B are legal and valid. If the board of directors of said district has the authority and power to adopt these rules to govern the charges for the use of water in said district by the landowners therein, then there can be no doubt of the validity of the assessment complained of. On the other hand, if these rules are beyond the power of the directors of said district to enact, then all proceedings thereunder leading up to said assessment are illegal and void.

By the adoption of these rules the board of directors of the district has attempted to provide a complete plan or scheme for the distribution of the water of the district among the landowners therein and for the payment by said landowners for the use of said water in the manner provided in said rules. This plan contemplates first a basic charge estimated at 60 cents an acre to be raised by annual assessment to cover "bond principal and interest, together with the balance of maintenance charges." By this we understand the district raises by assessment an amount estimated at 60 cents per acre to cover the principal and interest on the bonded indebtedness and to meet the balance of maintenance charged after applying to maintenance the amount received as tolls or rates for water used. These rates or tolls are fixed as follows:

Normal Rates.

Water for pasture land where but one irrigation for the season is required, 50 cents per acre.

Water for general crops not to exceed two acre feet per acre, 75 cents per acre.

Water for irrigation of rice for an average of not to exceed six acre feet per acre irrigated, $4 per acre.

Then follows the "excess rates" which provide for an ascending scale or charges increasing as the amount of water per acre increases, and, finally, the rules provide for the time when the tolls shall be paid. In this connection it might be stated that by this provision the tolls are made payable in installments, some of said installments being made payable and collected in advance.

Respondents contend in the first place that the board of directors of an irrigation district are without any authority whatever to impose tolls for the purpose of defraying the expense mentioned in section 55 (as amended by St. 1911, p. 516, § 11) of the California Irrigation District Act and that said section 55, in so far as it provides for the collection of tolls or rates for the use of water by the landowners, is unconstitutional. By section 13 of article 11 of the Constitution it is provided:

"That the Legislature shall have power to provide for the supervision, regulation and conduct, in such manner as it may determine, of the affairs of irrigation districts, reclamation districts or drainage districts, organized or existing under any law of this state."

Under this section of the Constitution this court has held that:

"It is settled in this state that the Legislature has plenary power over districts organized for reclamation purposes." Barber v. Gallo-way, 195 Cal. 1, 6, 231 P. 34, 35.

In this same case this court, on page 16 (231 P. 39) of the decision, also said:

"Furthermore, article XI, section 13, of the California Constitution confers upon the Legislature a very broad power with respect to the supervision, regulation, and conduct of the affairs of districts of this character." (Irrigation districts.)

In pursuance of these broad and plenary powers invested in the Legislature by the Constitution, section 55 of the California Irrigation District Act was enacted, which is, in part, as follows:

"For the purpose of defraying the expenses of the organization of the district, and of the care, operation, management, repair, and improvement of such portions of such canal and works as are completed and in use, including salaries of officers and employees, and installments of rental or consideration accruing under any lease or contract as hereinabove in this section mentioned, the board may in lieu (either in part or in whole) of levying assessments as herein provided for, fix rates of toll and charges, for irrigation and other public uses declared by this act, and collect the same from all persons using said canal for irrigation and other purposes."

In support of their contention that this section is unconstitutional respondents do not rely on any decision of the courts of this state. They have, however, cited a number of authorities from other jurisdictions which they contend bear out their claim that said section is unconstitutional. These authorities at best are only indirectly in point and in none of them is discussed the question of the power of the Legislature to invest the board of directors of an irrigation district with authority to levy tolls or rates for the purpose of defraying the expense of the operation and maintenance of an irrigation system. Of the cases relied upon by respondent, those most nearly in point, are Otis Orchards Co. v. Otis Orchards Irr. Dist. No. 1, 124 Wash. 510, 215 P. 23; Nampa & Meridian Irr. Dist. v. Bond (D. C.) 283 F. 569, and Colburn v. Wilson, 24 Idaho, 94, 132 P. 579. These cases involve the right of an irrigation district to levy an assessment upon all the lands within the district to pay for the maintenance of the system. For instance, it was contended in the Otis Case that one who is not using any water upon his lands in said district was not liable for any assessment to pay for the maintenance and upkeep of the system, and the court held:

"That the owner of irrigable land within a district must respond to the annual assessment for the operation and maintenance of the system, where the water is made available for his use, even though he does not use it."

The question of meeting this expense in whole or in part by means of tolls charged for the water used was not mentioned nor considered. Neither was it the subject directly or indirectly of the decision in either of the other two cases above referred to. We are of the opinion, therefore, that they are of slight, if any, value in determining the question of the validity of said section 55 which purports to confer such power upon the board of directors of an irrigation district. This question appears never to have been directly before the appellate courts of this state. Yet the authority of the district to levy tolls was discussed in at least two cases before this court and such authority, it seems, was not questioned on either of said occasions. These cases are Danley v. Merced Irr. Dist., 66 Cal. App. 97, 110, 226 P. 847, 852, 854, and Wores v. Imperial Irr. Dist., 193 Cal. 609, 632, 227 P. 181. In the first of these cases the court said:

"Section 55 of the California irrigation laws (Stats. 1911, p. 516, § 11) authorizes the board of directors of the irrigation districts, instead of levying assessments, to fix rates of toll charges for irrigation or other public uses declared by the act and collect the sum from all persons using the canal for irrigation or other purposes. As this is a legislative grant and a continuing power, we think the provisions of paragraph 8 purporting to waive the right to exact tolls without the power of the board of directors, and therefore void."

A hearing of that case in this court was denied. In the Wores Case this court, on page 632 (227 P. 189) said:

"This being so, the power of the board of directors to provide for the raising of such additional money for the needs of said district over and above that provided by the means of an assessment is to be found within the terms of section 55 of the General Irrigation Act, which provides that 'the board may in lieu (either in part or in whole) of levying assessments as herein provided for fix rates of tolls and charges for irrigation and other public uses declared by this act, and collect the same,' etc. The phrase in parentheses in the above quotation from said act plainly means that the board of directors may employ both methods of raising money for the purposes of the district as defined by law. In the fixation of tolls and charges for the use of its water by the various classes of users to whom it is to be supplied, the board of directors of the district is invested with a very large discretion by the general terms of the law giving that power, and which the courts ought not to interfere with in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of that discretion. The remedy of the land owner or water user for the imposition of an undue burden by assessments or tolls or both is that of effecting a change in the directory of the district by the means provided in the acts relative to the selection of those who are from time to time intrusted with the conduct of the affairs of the district."

[3] It is true that in neither of these cases was the constitutionality of the statute raised. Nevertheless, in the face of these clear pronouncements of this court upon the power of the district to charge tolls, we would hesitate to declare the statute unconstitutional without clear and convincing reasons therefor are presented. The only reason advanced by respondents against the constitutionality of this section is that, should the board attempt to exercise the extreme limits of the power given it by said section and raise all the costs and expenses of operating and maintaining the system by tolls rather than by assessments, then the entire burden of maintaining and operating the system would be cast upon the landowners using the water, and the other landowners of said district would escape taxation entirely in so far as the same was levied for maintenance purposes. It is not claimed that the defendants have in the proceedings now under consideration attempted to resort to any such extreme measures. On the other hand, the rules and regulations provide for a basic charge of 60 cents per acre upon all lands of the district, a portion of which is applied towards the expense of maintaining and operating the system. But suppose that the board of directors had attempted to raise by means of tolls the total cost of operation and maintenance? Would it necessarily follow that their action was illegal, this authority having been conferred upon them by the Legislature under the broad powers given to the Legislature by the Constitution? The system of charging rates or tolls for the maintenance and operation of water systems is used almost entirely in municipalities owning their own systems, and quite often in such municipalities not only the cost and expense of operation and maintenance, but the amounts due upon principal and interest on the bonded indebtedness are raised by tolls and rates. As to the lands in an irrigation district, it might be that some of said lands receive no benefit whatever from the irrigation system. In such a case would there be anything inequitable if the Legislature should provide in such a case that such lands might be excluded from the cost of maintaining the irrigation system from which they received no benefit? Would the constitutional rights of the landowners who are receiving the entire benefit of said system be invaded by such a statute? We think not. It is not to be presumed that the board of directors of the district is going to act arbitrarily in exercising any power with which they are invested. If the board of directors should unlawfully discriminate against any of the landowners in levying an assessment or should arbitrarily impose unjust tolls upon any of such landowners, the courts are open for the redress of any wrongs that may be suffered by said landowners from such arbitrary or illegal action by said directors. In our opinion there is but little that can be said against the reasonableness of the provisions of section 55 of the California Irrigation District Act, but much that can be said in favor of its provisions, especially when applied to a district situated as the Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District is situated. Evidently from the record before us the lands in said district vary greatly in their fertility, in their adaptation to different crops and in the amount of water required to produce crops thereon.

Respondents claim that the only fair and legal method of raising the necessary money with which to pay the cost and expense of maintaining the system is by an ad valorem tax upon all the lands within the district, in which event the water for irrigation purposes would be apportioned proportionately to each landowner upon the basis of the ratio which the last assessment of such owner for irrigation purposes within said district bears to the whole sum assessed upon the district. Section 18 (as amended by St. 1919, p. 661, § 3). Under the strictly assessment plan lands having high valuation and requiring only a small amount of water would, of course, pay a relatively large assessment, in which event the owner thereof would be entitled to receive a proportionate amount of water, possibly largely in excess of his needs. On the other hand, land of less value might require a large amount of water. Following the rule, however, as applied to the first piece of land, the amount of water this landowner would receive would be in proportion to the amount of assessment paid by him, based upon the value of his land. It would possibly transpire that he would be without sufficient water to meet the requirements of his land. It is true the first landowner with an excess amount of water may sell or assign his excess amount of water may sell or assign his excess water to his neighbor who is without sufficient water, but he is not obliged to sell it to any one. In case he should refuse to sell his excess water, the second landowner is without sufficient water to properly irrigate his land, while the excess water of the first landowner is permitted to run to waste. Such a situation is contrary to every principle of the law governing the use of water from the time when water was first applied for irrigation purposes in this state. It may be assumed, however, at least in most instances, that the landowner with an excess amount of water will be willing to sell the water which he will not require for his own land to the landowner whose supply is insufficient for his purposes. Yet it leaves the second landowner in an unsettled and uncertain condition. He has no permanent supply of water adequate for his needs. He may be able one year to purchase sufficient water for his land and the next year he may not. He is always dependent upon his ability to go out to those who have excess water and acquire sufficient for his own needs. If he fails in this respect his crops are a failure. The water he is entitled to, therefore, is of little or no value to him. It is needless to say that such an uncertainty is not conducive to the operation of a successful farming venture. On the other hand, by giving to the board of directors the power to raise the whole or a part of the cost of maintenance by tolls as has been done by the enactment of said section 55, every landowner of the district is given an opportunity to the extent of the water supply of the district of securing a definite, certain, and adequate supply of water for his lands. It appears to us that such a statutory provision is not only within the power of the Legislature under the Constitution to enact, but that it affords an elastic system under which the affairs of the district may be operated to the end that the objects and purposes of the statute may be fully realized. We are, therefore, of the opinion that section 55 is not subject to the criticism that it is unconstitutional.

There is nothing new in the provisions of this act regarding the power of the directors to raise by these two methods the cost and expense of operating and maintaining the irrigation system of the district. A similar provision to that contained in the present act is to be found in the original Irrigation District Act, commonly known as the Wright Act, passed in 1887 (Stats. 1887, p. 29). In section 37 of this act will be found the following provision:

"For the purpose of defraying the expenses of the organization of the district, and of the care, operation, management, repair, and improvement of such portions of said canal and works as are completed in use, including salaries of officers and employees, the board may either fix rates of tolls and charges, and collect the same from all persons using said canal for irrigation and other purposes, or they may provide for the payment of said expenditures by a levy of assessments therefor, or by both said tolls and assessments. * * *

It has, so far as our information goes, remained an integral part of every irrigation act adopted in this state since the enactment of the original statute. It has been upon the statute books of this state for over 40 years. While its constitutionality has never been passed upon by this court, this question, so far as our knowledge goes, has never been raised. It is hardly possible that, in all the litigation that has been before the courts of this state regarding irrigation districts in their various ramifications, the validity of this provision of the statute would not have been attacked had there been any question of its constitutionality. The fact that no proceeding prior to the present one has ever been brought before this or any of the appellate courts of this state in which the constitutionality of this provision of the statute has been questioned is most convincing proof that the profession as a whole has regarded its validity unassailable.

[4] It is unnecessary to call attention to the wide extent to which irrigation districts are now in use, as it is common knowledge that they are one of the principal agencies through which the waters of the state are conserved and made profitable for irrigation and domestic purposes. Many of these districts are no doubt providing for either the whole or a part of the cost of maintenance and operation by means of tolls as provided by this section of the act. To now hold that these districts are without power to fix rates of tolls and charges to meet either the whole or a part of the cost of operation and maintenance would no doubt cause the greatest confusion to exist in the business affairs of these districts and might possibly in some instances disrupt the districts themselves. A statute which has been acquiesced in and acted upon for so long a period of time should not be lightly set aside or declared illegal except after the most clear and convincing demonstration of its invalidity. No such a showing has been made in this case regarding those provisions of section 55 complained of. For this reason, as well as those already stated, we are not disposed to declare invalid any of the provisions of said section.

[5] This disposes of the question as to the power of the board of directors to adopt rules and regulations providing for the levying and collection of tolls to pay in whole or in part the cost of maintenance and operation of the system. Respondents further contend, however, that conceding this power to be in the board of directors, yet the rules so adopted and particularly certain portions of rules 6, 6 A, and 6 B are invalid for other reasons. The first contention made by respondents in this respect is that said rules are invalid in so far as they provide for an ascending or increasing scale of rates for water used. No authority is cited in support of this contention. The only argument advanced against such a rule is that the court found that there was ample water of the district available to meet all the requirements for the users of water in the district. Therefore, if the purpose of said rule was to discourage the excessive use of water or to prevent waste, respondents contend that under the finding just referred to such a rule was unnecessary and therefore invalid. We are not impressed with this argument. It is obvious that such a rule would tend to encourage the economical use of water by the landowners of the district. The fact that there is ample water available for the needs of the district furnishes no excuse for the excessive use or waste of water, nor would that fact relieve the directors of the district of the duty to adopt all reasonable measures to prevent the excessive use and waste of water. Many of the government projects have adopted this method of fixing charges for the use of water under governmental control and we have not been cited to any instance in which it has been held to be illegal or an unreasonable requirement upon those to whom water is furnished. It has always been the policy of the law of this state to discourage an excessive use of water or a waste thereof by those entitled to its use. We are not prepared to say, therefore, that this provision of the rule is unreasonable or is an unwarranted exercise of power on the part of the directors.

[6] It is next objected that the rule requiring the payment of tolls in advance is illegal. By reference to rule 6 B it will be seen that the rates or tolls charged for water used during the year are payable in installments over a period of time from May 1st to August 15th of each year and that for any water used after said last-named date the charges therefor are made payable on the 15th day of each month thereafter. The authority to make such a rule is admittedly given to the board of directors by section 39f of the act (as added by St. 1917, p. 768, § 33). We have carefully read and reread respondents' argument in support of their contention that this section of the act is invalid, but we must admit our inability to agree with it or to give it the force and effect claimed for it by respondents. It appears to us that this contention of respondents is without any merit whatever.

[7] The claim is further made that the assessment is illegal, in that it exceeds the limit fixed by section 39 of the act (as amended by St. 1917, p. 765, § 27). This section provides that the board of directors may levy an annual assessment not exceeding 2 per cent. of the aggregate value of the lands within the district according to the last duly equalized assessment roll thereof for any of the purposes of said act. The amount of the assessment levied by the directors for the assessment year 1922 was 1.1 per cent. upon the assessed value of said lands. Respondents claim that there is evidence that the amount raised by the district by means of tolls and the annual assessment exceeds this 2 per cent. limit provided for by the act, and it is respondents' contention that this shows a violation of the provisions of section 39 and renders the assessment invalid. The act in plain terms provides that these expenses and charges may be raised by tolls or by an annual assessment or by both tolls and an annual assessment. It then provides that the limit of the annual assessment shall be 2 per cent. upon the assessed value of the property in the district. Had the Legislature intended to limit the aggregate amount to be raised by these two methods to the 2 per cent. mentioned in the section, it would have been a simple matter to have so provided. As the limitation applies simply to the amount of taxes to be raised by the annual assessment, there is no authority to extend it to include additional amounts of money raised by other methods.

[8] It is further contended by respondents that, assuming that rules 6, 6 A and 6 B are valid, yet the board of directors had no authority to use the money raised thereby to pay in whole or in part for a drainage system constructed in said district. The trial court found that, in order to protect the lands of said district from seepage water, the district was required to and did purchase drainage machinery and did construct drainage ditches at great expense and that a portion of the expense of said machinery and ditches was intended to be paid out of the additional income to be derived from tolls collected from the use of water on the lands of plaintiffs. It is respondents' claim that the cost of installing said machinery and constructing said ditches should be paid entirely from the construction fund of the district and that such charges cannot be construed as part of the cost of maintenance and operation of said district. The trial court took the same view of the law and accordingly held that no part of said expense could be lawfully charged to operation or maintenance or paid from funds raised by tolls or water rates. In this we think the court erred. This identical question was before the courts of the United States in the case of Nampa & Meridian Irr. Dist. v. Bond, 268 U. S. 50, 53, 45 S. Ct. 383, 384 (69 L. Ed. 843). In that case the court said:

"Expenditures necessary to construct an irrigation system and put it in condition to furnish and properly to distribute a supply of water are chargeable to construction; but when the irrigation system is completed, expenditures made to maintain it as an efficient going concern and to operate it effectively to the end for which it was designed are, at least generally, maintenance and operating expenses. The expenditure in question was not for extensions to new lands or for changes in or additions to the system made necessary by faulty original construction in violation of contractual or statutory obligations (Twin Falls Co. v. Caldwell [C. C. A.] 272 F. 356, 369; [Id.] 266 U. S. 85 [45 S. Ct. 22, 69 L. Ed. 173]), but was for the purpose of overcoming injurious consequences arising from the normal and ordinary operation of the completed plant which, so far as appears, was itself well constructed. The fact that the need of drainage for the district lands, already existing or foreseen, had been supplied and the cost thereof charged to all the water users as a part of the original construction, by no means compels the conclusion that an expenditure of the same character, the necessity for which subsequently developed as an incident of operation, is not a proper operating charge."

Prior to the decision of this case it had been before the United States Circuit Court (288 F. 541), and on this occasion the court said:

"In other words, the expense of preventing injury by seepage resulting from operation is a proper operation charge, or, at least, the determination of the Secretary of the Interior to that effect is controlling upon the courts."

As the court found that this was a necessary expense and the board determined that it should be paid from the operation and maintenance account, we feel in the language of the Circuit Court of Appeals that such determination is controlling upon the courts.

[9, 10] The next contention of appellants is that the action of the board of directors of the district under said rules was discriminatory and inequitable. In this regard respondents claim that the board had no authority to meter a part of the lands of the district and not others. This court apparently has held to the contrary. Sheward v. Citizens' Water Co., 90 Cal. 635, 641, 27 P. 439; Waterworks v. San Francisco, 82 Cal. 286, 22 P. 910, 1046, 6 L. R. A. 756, 16 Am. St. Rep. 116. But there is no finding to the effect that the board of directors has metered certain lands and refused to meter others of the same character. The court found, as we have before stated, that there were two kinds of rice lands in the district, one known as typical rice lands upon which rice could be raised profitably without an excessive amount of water and the other whose soil was of a loose, porous texture without hardpan and upon which rice could not be raised except by the use of large quantities of water. The court found that, while the board of directors had caused respondents' lands to be metered, it had not caused "the quantity of water used upon other lands in said district for the growing thereon of rice, or otherwise, to be metered or otherwise ascertained." As to respondents' lands the court found:

"It is not true that all of the lands of plaintiffs are loose and porous."

This is not a finding that any particular part of plaintiffs' lands is not loose or porous. In so far as this finding attempts to define the character of plaintiffs' lands, practically all of said lands may be loose and porous. Taking these two findings together it may be reasonably inferred therefrom that respondents' lands, being loose and porous, were metered, but the other rice lands, those known as typical rice lands which required a less amount of water than loose and porous lands, were not metered. It is obvious, therefore, from the findings that the court found no facts which would justify the conclusion that the action of the board of directors in the respect just considered under said rules was either discriminatory or inequitable. In this connection we might consider the claims of respondents that the evidence shows that lands were metered by the board only when and after protests had been filed with the board against the supplying of water thereto for the purpose of growing rice upon said lands. It appears that in many parts of said district there was opposition to the growing of rice for the reason that its cultivation required a large amount of water to be brought and kept standing upon the lands used for that purpose. The seepage of water from these lands tended to damage adjacent and surrounding lands and for that reason the owners of these adjacent lands would protest against the growing of rice in the vicinity of their own lands.

[11] While there is evidence in support of the claim of respondents that in a number of instances the board metered lands only after such protests had been filed by adjacent land-owners, yet the court failed to make any finding predicated thereon. Just what effect this evidence had upon the court we are left to conjecture, but evidently it did not impress the court as of sufficient importance to warrant a finding based upon it. It may be, as there were allegations in the complaint directed against the board of directors in this respect, that the trial court was of the opinion that it would not be warranted in finding a fact which was not responsive to the pleadings. As there was no such finding, the judgment of the court cannot be held to have been based thereon, and therefore the mere presence of this evidence in the record cannot have any controlling effect upon the final determination of this action. The objection that the board of directors had no authority to add the amount of the unpaid tolls to the regular assessment and make them a part of the annual assessment for the year is answered by the terms of section 39f of the act, which expressly authorizes such action to be taken by the board.

[12] This disposes of all the important questions raised against the validity of said assessments. It follows from what we have said that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings upon which rests the judgment decreeing that said assessments are invalid to the extent of the excess tolls charged under said rule 6 B. The judgment should be reversed for this reason. It should also be reversed for the further reason that it provides for the repayment to respondents of the several amounts paid by them respectively on account of said excess tolls. The complaint contains no averment that the respondents, or any of them, had paid any of said excess tolls or any part thereof, and there is no finding that any such payment had been made. This part of the judgment, therefore, even should it be assumed that such tolls are invalid, would not be justified by the pleadings nor supported by the findings.

For the reasons hereinbefore given, the judgment is reversed.

85 Cal. App. 87

MERKLE v. MERKLE et al. (BIERWAGEN et al., Interveners). (Civ. 3288.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 13, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 10, 1927.

1. Wills ⌘114—Document signed and acknowledged, but without attesting witnesses, held ineffective as will (Civ. Code, §§ 1276, 1277, 1288).

Document signed by testatrix, although her signature was acknowledged before notary public, in view of lack of attesting witnesses, was not valid as will, under Civ. Code, §§ 1276, 1277, 1288.

2. Reformation of instruments ⌘45(4)—In action to reform deed, evidence held to support finding that deceased agreed to give her daughter and daughter's husband land for support.

In action to reform deed to land, given for support of grantor, evidence held to support finding that deceased mother had agreed to give plaintiff and her husband land for support.

3. Specific performance ⌘85—Oral agreement to give land, supported by adequate consideration, held specifically enforceable, even if deed were fatally defective (Civ. Code, § 3391).

Even if deed from mother to daughter and her husband for support were fatally defective, oral agreement to give land, supported by consideration adequate, within Civ. Code, § 3391, would be enforceable in equity.

4. Reformation of instruments ⌘17(1)—Mutual mistake or mistake which one party knew and other knew or suspected should not be required as prerequisite to reforming written instrument, unless manifest justice requires (Civ. Code, § 3399).

Civ. Code, § 3399, relating to reformation of written contract for mistake, should not be so strictly construed as to require mutual mistake or mistake of one party which other at time knew or suspected, unless manifest justice of case so requires.

5. Reformation of instruments ⌘19(2)—Mistake in description of land in deed for support, never seen or read by one grantee until after death of grantor, held "mutual," justifying reformation; "mutual mistake" (Civ. Code, § 1577, subd. 2, and § 3399).

Where daughter, who, with husband, was granted land by her mother for support, was not present at execution of deed and never saw or read it until after death of mother, mistake in description of land was "mutual mistake," within Civ. Code, § 1577, subd. 2, and section 3399, warranting reformation of deed, although complaint and court's finding stated mistake was that of deceased, in view of amended complaint and other findings setting forth facts culminating in making of deed showing mistake was mutual.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mutual Mistake.]

6. Reformation of instruments ⚡36(1)—Complaint for reformation of deed for mistake in description of land held sufficient on general demurrer (Civ. Code, § 3399).

In daughter's action to reform deed given for support of mother, amended complaint alleging mistake held to state facts sufficient as against general demurrer incorporated in answer, under Civ. Code, § 3399.

7. Judgment ⚡256(2) — Special findings by court held to support judgment reforming deed given for support (Civ. Code, § 1577, subd. 2, and § 3399).

In daughter's action to reform deed given by mother for support, facts found by court substantially in language of complaint held to support judgment reforming deed on theory of mutual mistake in description of land, within Civ. Code, § 1577, subd. 2, and section 3399.

8. Deeds ⚡56(2)—Delivery depends on intent.

Question whether deed has been delivered is one of intention.

9. Deeds ⚡58(1)—Putting deed in hands of third party instructed to deliver it, even after grantor's death, in absence of showing of his intention to recall it, is good "delivery."

Putting deed in third party's hands with instructions to deliver it, even if it is delivered after grantor's death, in absence of indication of intention of grantor to recall it, is good "delivery"; determining fact being grantor's intention.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Delivery.]

10. Deeds ⚡208(5)—Evidence that mother gave deed for support to daughter with instruction to deliver it to grantee after grantor's death held to show delivery.

In daughter's action to reform description of land in deed for support of mother, evidence that mother gave deed to another daughter with instructions to deliver it after mother's death to plaintiff, grantee therein, held to show delivery of deed.

11. Reformation of instruments ⚡44—In action to reform deed, parol testimony is admissible to complete description of land (Civ. Code, §§ 3399, 3401).

In action to reform deed for lack of complete description of land, admitting parol testimony to supply deficiency in description held proper, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 3399, 3401.

12. Frauds, statute of ⚡142—Equity courts will reform both executed and executory contracts regardless of statute of frauds.

That equity courts will reform both executed and executory contracts irrespective of statute of frauds is thoroughly established.

13. Reformation of instruments ⚡45(5)—Reforming error in description of land in deed for support held proper, under evidence (Civ. Code, §§ 3399, 3401).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3399, 3401, which merely follow equitable doctrine of reformation of instruments, where description of land in deed for support was partly correct but township and range were omitted and its location as in certain park was erroneous, in view of evidence clearly showing grantor intended property in dispute to be described in deed and attempted in good faith to do so but was defeated by carelessness of scrivener, reforming deed according to parol evidence was proper, especially in view of fact that valuable and adequate consideration was given.

14. Appeal and error ⚡110, 782—Order denying motion for new trial is not appealable.

Order denying motion for new trial is not appealable, and appeal therefrom may be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by Minnie Merkle against Carl F. Merkle and another, executors of the estate of Elizabeth Bierwagen, deceased, to reform a deed, in which Michael Bierwagen and others intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff and orders denying the interveners' motions for a new trial and to vacate the judgment, they appeal. Appeal from the order denying a new trial dismissed. Judgment and order denying the motion to vacate it affirmed.

Hennessey & Kelly, of Grass Valley, for appellants.

Lee Gebhart, of Sacramento, and Nilon & Nilon, of Grass Valley, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to secure a decree reforming and correcting a certain deed, purporting to convey to her certain real property situated in the county of Nevada. Elizabeth Bierwagen, the owner and purported grantor of said property, was the mother of the plaintiff.

The amended complaint (verified) alleges that on or about the 8th day of January, 1923, the said Elizabeth Bierwagen died in the county of Nevada, and that Carl F. Merkle and Christian Bierwagen "have been, and they are now, the duly appointed, qualified and acting executors of the last will and testament of said decedent"; that in the year 1911, Elizabeth Bierwagen, deceased (to be hereinafter referred to as "deceased") entered into an agreement with plaintiff, whereby she promised and agreed that if plaintiff and her husband, Carl F. Merkle (one of the defendants herein), would care for the real property then owned by deceased, and care for, nurse, and protect her (deceased) during the remainder of her lifetime, the latter would convey to plaintiff herein the real property hereinafter described, which said real property was then owned by said deceased. The complaint proceeds:

"That subsequently, and on or about the — day of December, 1915, the said Elizabeth Bierwagen, deceased, further agreed to and with this plaintiff that if she, the said plaintiff, and Carl F. Merkle, her husband, one of the defendants herein, in consideration for what work, labor, and services they had theretofore performed for the said decedent in caring for her real property, and in the caring for said decedent personally, and in addition thereto, that if they would use, lay out, and expend money sufficient to repair the dwelling house upon said premises, and would care for and protect the said decedent during the remainder of her lifetime, that she, the said decedent, would then and there convey to said plaintiff, Minnie Merkle, all of the said real property by deed.

"That the said plaintiff herein, in pursuance of said agreement above set forth, did during the years 1915 and 1916, pay, use, lay out, and expend a large sum of money, to wit, more than $2,000 of moneys belonging to this plaintiff and Carl F. Merkle, her husband, one of the defendants herein, in rebuilding, repairing, and putting in proper condition the said dwelling house upon said premises, and did care for, assist, and protect the said decedent during the remainder of her lifetime.

"That on the 7th day of February, 1916, the said decedent made and executed a certain deed, of which the following is a copy:

"This indenture, made this twenty-second day of December, A. D. 1915,

"Between Mrs. Elizabeth Bierwagen, Chicago Park, Nevada county, California, the party of the first part, and Mrs. Minnie Merkle, Chicago Park, Nevada county, California, the party of the second part;

"Witnesseth: That the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of ten 00/100 dollars, in gold coin of the United States of America, to me in hand paid by the said party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do by these presents grant, bargain, sell, convey and confirm unto the said party of the second part, and to her heirs and assigns forever, all those certain lots, pieces or parcels of land situate, lying and being in the county of Nevada, state of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: southeast one fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of the southeast one fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of the northeast one fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) and the northeast one fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of the northeast one fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of the southeast one fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) situated in Chicago Park, Nevada county, California, containing twenty (20) acres." * * *

Said deed was signed by the deceased and duly acknowledged and recorded in the office of the county recorder of Nevada county on the 25th day of December, 1923.

The amended complaint proceeds, paragraph 7:

"That at the time of the execution of said deed and the delivering of the same to the said Elizabeth Bierwagen, it was the intention and the purpose of Elizabeth Bierwagen to convey to this plaintiff the following described premises, to wit:

"Southeast one-fourth (S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the southeast one fourth (S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the northeast one fourth (N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) and the northeast one fourth (N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the northeast one fourth (N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the southeast one fourth (S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) of section sixteen (16) township fifteen (15) north, range nine (9) east, Mt. Diablo Base and Meridian, situated in Nevada county, state of California, containing twenty (20) acres.

"That it was the intention and purpose of said Elizabeth Bierwagen, deceased, to insert in said deed the description of said premises in this paragraph above described, and to insert the description as above set forth in said deed. The said description contained in said deed as actually executed does not express or incorporate the purpose and intention of the said grantor therein; that said grantor thought and believed when she executed said deed that the deed contained the description of the property in this paragraph described; that by a mistake on the part of said grantor the description contained in said deed actually executed does not set forth or describe the section, township, or range in which the said real property is situated, and also the said description, by a mistake on the part of said grantor, states that said property is in Chicago Park; that said property was, and is, not situated in Chicago Park; that the only real property owned by said grantor at the time said deed was executed was the real property in this paragraph described, and the said grantor intended to convey to plaintiff by said deed the said real property.

"That the said omission on the part of the grantor to insert the said section 16, township 15 north, range 9 east, Mt. Diablo Base and Meridian, in said deed above set forth was not discovered by this plaintiff until the — day of December, 1923.

"That this plaintiff has performed all of the obligations on her part to be performed, and has paid to said decedent for said premises the consideration expressed in said deed, and other considerations as well."

It was stipulated by the parties that the answer of the defendants (executors of the estate of deceased) to the original complaint might stand as the answer to the complaint as amended, and in said answer they allege:

"That the knowledge, information, and belief of defendants upon and as to the facts alleged in plaintiff's complaint are such as to preclude defendants from denying, under oath, the allegations of said complaint; allege that the defendants are unwilling to deny, either of their own knowledge or upon their information or belief, the allegations of plaintiff's complaint herein."

It was also stipulated that the complaint in intervention and the answer of interveners to the original complaint might stand in the same relation to the amended complaint. The averments and denials are numerous, and we will therefore state in a general way what they contain. The following averments of the complaint are denied: That plaintiff executed the deed as originally framed, as shown by the complaint, or intended to execute the deed as reformed by the decree of the court; that deceased intended to convey the real property in question to the plaintiff and her husband; that deceased made the agreement with the plaintiff and her husband, as alleged in the complaint; that (upon information and belief) the discovery by plaintiff of the omission to describe the property correctly in the deed was not until December, 1923; that the deed was delivered to plaintiff; and that the plaintiff and her husband paid or performed the consideration for said deed, as averred in the complaint. It is alleged that deceased, at her death, left no surviving husband, but that there survived her, upon the happening of that event, ten children, the plaintiff and the five interveners being of that number; that said interveners, ever since the death of deceased, have been and are the owners and entitled to the possession and are in the possession of an undivided five-elevenths interest in and to the property in controversy; that plaintiff has no estate, interest, right, or title whatever in and to said five-elevenths interest, part, or share in and to "all of said above-described property" (naming the real property in dispute); allege (upon information and belief) that the purported deed referred to in the complaint does not bear the signature of the deceased; that the "plaintiff claims and asserts an interest in, or the ownership of, the whole of said five-elevenths interest, adverse to said interveners," and that said claim is without right; that deceased "never conveyed the above-described property (meaning the real property in question), nor any part or portion thereof, to said plaintiff, nor to any other person," but up to the time of her death, was the owner, in possession; and entitled to the possession of all said property; that, on the 13th day of February, 1923, the superior court in and for the county of Nevada, in the matter of the estate of deceased, made an order admitting to probate a writing, dated June 1, 1917, purporting to be the last will and testament of the deceased, and appointed said defendants Carl F. Merkle and Christian Bierwagen executors of said purported will, and that they duly qualified as such executors and entered upon the discharge of the duties of their said office, and ever since have acted as such executors; that the real property involved herein "was not disposed of by said will"; that (lastly) "the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The prayer of the complaint in intervention and answer to the amended complaint is that plaintiff be required to expose the nature of her claim, and that all adverse claims of plaintiff and the interveners, and each of them, be determined by a decree of the court, and also that interveners be adjudged the owners of an undivided five-elevenths interest or estate in and to all the real property referred to in the complaint; that plaintiff has no interest of any kind whatever in said five-elevenths interest in said real property, and she, her agents, successors, and assigns be forever debarred from asserting or claiming any interest in or title to said undivided five-elevenths interest in said property, etc.

The trial of the cause was by the court sitting without a jury.

The findings are substantially in the language of the complaint, except as to the allegations of the complaint in intervention, which would, if found to be sustained by the proofs, entitle the interveners to a judgment establishing their asserted interest in the said property, which allegations the court found were untrue. Judgment passed for the plaintiff in accord with said findings, decreeing a revision of the deed in accord with the correct description of the property as given in the amended complaint.

The interveners moved for an order vacating the judgment on certain specified grounds, and also for a new trial. Both motions were denied, and the interveners appeal from the judgment and the orders denying said motions.

The assault upon the judgment presents the question whether the material findings do or do not derive sufficient support from the evidence to uphold them. This general proposition involves these questions, to wit: (1) Did the deceased make the agreement with the plaintiff and her husband, as said agreement is set forth in the complaint? (2) If so, did the plaintiff and her husband perform the agreement upon their part to be performed? (3) Did the deceased, in and when making the deed set out in the amended complaint, intend to describe therein and so convey to the plaintiff the real property, consisting of 20 acres, upon which she had for many years resided and was residing when said deed was prepared and signed by her, and which property is described in the seventh paragraph of the amended complaint? (4) Was there, legally, a delivery of the deed to the plaintiff? In addition to these propositions, there are some others involving an attack upon rulings by the court with respect to the admissibility of certain testimony.

The several points above stated are so far correlated that a statement of the facts of the series of transactions eventuating in the present litigation will, from the nature of the situation, embrace the particular facts by the light of which we are to be guided in the consideration and determination of each of said points.

It appears that the real property in controversy was acquired, with another and different tract of land, by Ludwig Bierwagen, the husband of the deceased, on the 25th day of September, 1902, from one Mabel Briot; that the two tracts of land, each of which consisted of 20 acres, were conveyed by said Briot to said Ludwig by means of a single instrument or deed; that the husband of the deceased passed out of this life either on the 7th or the 8th of January, 1903; that his wife (the deceased) succeeded to the ownership of both tracts of 20 acres each, and during all her years, from the date of the acquisition of said property by her husband, resided on the 20 acres here in controversy. At the time of the death of her husband, the deceased was about 69 years of age. In the early part of April, 1904, the plaintiff, who was a daughter of the deceased, and Carl F. Merkle intermarried. From the 4th day of April, 1904 (as will be noted, subsequent to the death of the deceased's husband), up to the date of the death of deceased, the plaintiff and her husband resided with deceased on the premises and in the house involved in this litigation. Merkle assisted in taking care of the place—attending to the cows and looking after and caring for such fruit crops as were produced on the premises—and the plaintiff assisted in the housework. Merkle had entire charge of the work on the premises from 1904 until and including the year 1909. From the last-named year, Christian Bierwagen, a son of the deceased and a brother of the plaintiff, had charge and took care of the premises and continued in that capacity until the year 1911, Merkle, however, continuing to reside at the home of deceased and assisting Christian in such work or labor as was required to be done on the premises. This situation continued until the year 1911. In the meantime the health of the deceased began to fail. In fact (Merkle testified, as did his wife and other members of the family), the deceased was ill much of the time from and after the time the Merkles went to the premises to reside with the former. By the year 1911, the deceased had become so enfeebled, physically, by reason of illness and her venerable years, that she became incapacitated for the performance of any kind of labor. In the year just mentioned, the deceased, realizing that her physical condition was such that she could not take care of herself or her property, proposed to her son, Christian, that if he would assume and discharge that responsibility during the remainder of her life she would give the property to him (Christian), the transfer to take effect upon her death. This proposition, which was made in the presence and hearing of plaintiff, her husband, and Miss Elizabeth Bierwagen, daughter of the deceased, Christian declined to accept, saying that, while he could take proper care of the ranch, he, being a single man (meaning that he was unmarried), was himself incapable of giving his mother the personal care and attention which her physical condition and advanced age required. Thereupon the deceased made a like proposition to the plaintiff—that is, that if plaintiff and her husband would remain at her house and take care of her and attend to the affairs of the ranch during the remainder of her life, she (deceased) would give the ranch and her home to plaintiff, the latter, however, upon receiving the property upon the deceased's death to pay to the latter's son, Christian, and her daughter, Elizabeth, the sum of $1,500 each. After some reflection, the plaintiff and her husband accepted the proposition, and from that time until the passing of the deceased, the Merkles continuously remained on the ranch of the deceased, the husband, as above stated, giving his entire time and attention to the work required to be done on the premises, and the plaintiff attending to the domestic affairs of the home and the personal needs of her mother.

[1] It appears that, on the 5th day of June, 1911, the deceased attempted to execute a last will and testament, whereby she sought to make a testamentary disposition of her estate. This document or paper was signed by her, and following her subscription thereto was her acknowledgment before a notary public that she executed the same. There were no attesting witnesses to the instrument, a formality essential to the validity of every last will, except an olographic and a nuncupative will. Civ. Code, §§ 1276, 1277, 1288. Furthermore, the property was not correctly described therein. By this purported will the deceased undertook to devise to plaintiff the real property in dispute with the proviso that the plaintiff should pay to her son, Christian, and her daughter, Elizabeth, the sum of $1,500 each.

It further appears that the house situated on the real property in question, and which had been occupied as a residence by deceased from the time her husband acquired the property until her death, and in which plaintiff and her husband, with the deceased, resided under the agreement referred to, was an old structure—in fact, an old building at the time of the purchase of the premises by the husband of the deceased—and had, by the winter of 1914 and 1915, become so dilapidated that it was necessary to repair it to make it a suitable or a reasonably comfortable place in which to live. During the winter mentioned—whether the latter part of December, 1914, or the first part of January, 1915, is not definitely shown—a portion of the roof of the house was blown off by the wind. This circumstance brought up a conversation at that time between the deceased and the plaintiff and her husband with regard to the matter of repairing the house, and thereby putting it in a condition for comfortable use as a dwelling house. In that conversation the deceased declared to the plaintiff and her husband that "she had no money on land and would spend no money any more to rebuild, because," testified plaintiff's husband, "she didn't know how long she would have the use of it, and after her demise the property would belong to us anyway, so we should fix it to suit ourselves and pay the expenses." Deceased, either on the occasion of which we are now speaking or a short time thereafter, stated that, if the Merkle's made the repairs which were necessary to put the house in proper condition, she would give them a deed to the premises "for security's sake, in case something should turn up that there would be disharmony or trouble with the will, so we would have the deed anyway, and be safe for the money that we have invested in it." (Carl Merkle's testimony.) The Merkle's agreed to repair the house and did so at an expense to themselves of approximately $3,000.

In the latter part of the year 1915—in the fall of that year (thought the witness, Miss Elizabeth Bierwagen)—the deceased said to Miss Elizabeth and Carl Merkle that she (deceased) desired to make a deed conveying the real property in question to the plaintiff, and requested Carl to call at the office of C. H. Barker, a notary public at Grass Valley, in Nevada county, and instruct him to prepare such deed. Within a few days thereafter Carl called at Barker's office and informed the latter of the wishes of the deceased regarding the preparation of a deed to the property in dispute. Barker called for a description of the property to be inserted in the deed. Carl did not have the description with him, but stated that he would furnish the same later. A few days subsequently, Miss Elizabeth, at the request of the deceased brought to the latter the Briot deed conveying to Ludwig Bierwagen the two 20-acre tracts, and, after examining said deed and comparing the description contained therein of the 20-acre tract in dispute with her tax receipts, deceased requested her daughter to mark in brackets with a pencil in the Briot deed the 20 acres described in the seventh paragraph of the amended complaint (the real property which is the subject of this controversy), and then take the Briot deed as so marked to Barker and state to him that it was her wish that he prepare a deed in accord with the description in the Briot deed as indicated by the pencil marks, so that the deed, as so prepared, would, upon its being executed by her, convey to plaintiff the real property in dispute. A few days before Christmas of the year 1915, Miss Elizabeth, following the instructions of her mother in that particular, took the Briot deed to Barker, and, handing it to him, called his attention to the marked description in said deed and "told him," so she testified, "that that part in brackets (made by pencil, as explained) was the property that she (the deceased) wanted to deed to Mrs. Merkle. Barker said he would attend to it. * * * He (Barker) brought the deed he prepared out to the house some time in February, 1916. * * * He said to my mother that he had brought the deed which mother asked him to make for her to sign. I interpreted to my mother what Barker said to her (the deceased being a German by birth and unable intelligibly to speak or understand the English language). I saw my mother sign this paper" (referring to the deed which the witness inspected while testifying). Miss Bierwagen testified that Barker, as a notary, took her mother's acknowledgment of the deed. The deceased later delivered the deed into the possession of her daughter, Elizabeth, and instructed her to hold possession of it until after her (deceased's) death, and then deliver it to plaintiff. Miss Elizabeth thereupon took the deed to the Nevada County Bank, where she and Carl Merkle jointly rented and maintained a safe deposit box, and deposited the deed in said box. In this immediate connection it may be stated that Miss Elizabeth testified that the deceased never had a key or any access to the deposit box in which the deed was placed. In fact, that witness testified that her mother had not for many years been at the bank where said safe deposit box was maintained by herself and Carl Merkle; that she and said Merkle shared the expense of maintaining said box; and that she paid her share out of her own money.

On June 1, 1917, the deceased made and executed (at least attempted to do so) a new will. This instrument changed, and consequently in that particular was different from, the will of 1911 with respect to certain bequests and also as to the disposition of the residue of the estate after the payment of the bequests as so changed. It contained, however, the same provision by which the deceased attempted to dispose of the real property in dispute as was contained in the will of June 5, 1911, to wit: That the said real property should go to the plaintiff, but she to pay to Christian and Miss Elizabeth Bierwagen $1,500 each. In said will Christian Bierwagen and Carl F. Merkle were nominated and appointed the executors thereof. The instrument was signed by Christian Bierwagen and Carl F. Merkle as witnesses, and acknowledged by the deceased before a notary public. (This will, for reasons not necessary to state herein, is of doubtful validity.) Besides, having been copied, except as to the bequests mentioned, from the will of 1911, the description of the property therein was incorrect. Said will was by the deceased delivered into the possession of Miss Elizabeth, with the request by deceased that she keep possession of it until after the latter's death. Within a brief time thereafter, Miss Elizabeth deposited the will in the safe deposit box above referred to, where it remained with other papers, including the deed of deceased attempting to grant the real property in question here to the plaintiff, until the death of the deceased in January, 1923. About a week after the death of deceased, Elizabeth Bierwagen took the said deed and the purported will of June 1, 1917, to the law office of Messrs. Nilon & Nilon, in Grass Valley, and turned the documents over to that firm of lawyers with instructions to inaugurate and pursue to a final conclusion such legal proceedings as said lawyers might conceive to be necessary to carry out the intention of the deceased with respect thereto, if legally it could be done. Examining the documents, the lawyers advised that the deed as it then stood was fatally defective, in that it did not contain a sufficient or complete description of the real property that it appeared to have been the intention of the deceased to convey to plaintiff, and that it was doubtful whether the will of 1917 involved a valid testamentary disposal of the estate of the deceased. It was, however, suggested that the deed should nevertheless be delivered by Miss Elizabeth to the plaintiff, named therein as the grantee. The plaintiff was thereupon sent for, and, upon appearing in the office of the lawyers named, Miss Elizabeth gave the plaintiff possession of the deed by a manual delivery thereof to her (plaintiff). The plaintiff, after reading the deed, handed it to a member of said law firm with the request that he (the lawyer) cause it to be recorded in the office of the county recorder of said county. The deed was accordingly recorded on the 29th day of December, 1923.

On the 17th day of January, 1923, a petition was filed in the superior court, in and for the county of Nevada, by Christian Bierwagen and Carl F. Merkle, executors therein named, for the probate of the will of the deceased, dated and purporting to be executed on the 1st day of June, 1917. On the 13th day of February, 1923, an order was made by said court admitting said will to probate, and thereupon letters testamentary were issued to said Bierwagen and Merkle.

The above statement of the facts is taken from the testimony of Carl F. Merkle and Miss Elizabeth Bierwagen. The testimony of those witnesses was corroborated by C. H. Barker, the notary public, the plaintiff, and Christian Bierwagen upon the several material matters coming to their knowledge, respectively.

Barker testified to the fact of the preparation of the deed by his stenographer. He stated that Miss Elizabeth Bierwagen brought to him the Briot deed, called his attention to the fact that the description of the land which was to be conveyed by the deed he was to prepare was contained in the Briot deed within brackets made with pencil; that he later dictated the description to his stenographer, but inadvertently omitted to insert in the description the township within which the fractional sections are situated, and also the range; that the error in placing the property in "Chicago Park" was solely due to his own carelessness. (This latter error in the deed may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that the land in dispute was situated near a tract of land known as and commonly called "Chicago Park." All the witnesses, when testifying, referred to said real property as being at "Chicago Park.") Barker further testified that he personally took the deed to the home of the deceased; that the contents of the instrument were translated to deceased by her daughter, Elizabeth, before she (deceased) signed it; that he saw deceased subscribe her name to the deed; and that he took her acknowledgment.

The plaintiff testified to the fact of the making of the agreement and the terms thereof; that the real property which the deceased agreed to give to her upon the death of the former was the real property involved herein and described in the seventh paragraph of the amended complaint; that she and her husband repaired (in fact, practically rebuilt) the house on the premises, as stated by her husband in his testimony, at an expense of approximately $3,000; that both continuously resided on said premises, performing the services which they, respectively, agreed to perform from the year 1911 until the death of her mother; that neither she nor her husband (and the last-named likewise testified) ever received from the deceased any remuneration whatsoever for their said services, except the consideration for which they agreed to live with and take care of the deceased and the premises in question. She testified that she was not present when her mother signed and purported to acknowledge the execution of the deed, and never saw the deed or read the contents thereof until after her mother's death, when it was delivered to her in the law office of Nilon & Nilon by Miss Elizabeth Bierwagen, but that she understood, and in fact knew, from the agreement referred to and conversations with the deceased it was the intention of her mother to convey to her (plaintiff) the property upon which they resided from 1911 until the death of the deceased, and which is described in the seventh paragraph of the amended complaint. Plaintiff further testified that prior to the time that the deed prepared by Barker was signed by the deceased she heard the latter say to her daughter, Elizabeth, that she (deceased) "wanted her (Elizabeth) to see Barker and have him make a deed conveying the real property in dispute to her (plaintiff). It is not necessary to refer to the testimony of Christian Bierwagen further than to say that it supports in all vital respects the testimony given by the plaintiff Carl Merkle and Miss Elizabeth Bierwagen.

There is in the record testimony to the effect that, when the purported deed was executed by the deceased, she owned no real property in Nevada county other than that described in the seventh paragraph of the amended complaint. Mrs. Catherine Tucker, a professional searcher of records at Nevada City, county seat of Nevada county, testified that she had searched the public records of said county, and from such investigation found that at no time in the year 1915 was there any other real property on record in the name of the deceased than the 20-acre tract and improvements involved in the present controversy.

It is perfectly plain from the foregoing statement of the testimony presented by the plaintiff that the trial court, believing said testimony, was warranted in finding, as in effect it did find, these facts: (1) That the deceased made the agreement with the plaintiff and the latter's husband which is set forth in the amended complaint. (2) That the plaintiff and her husband performed the services for which deceased agreed to convey or transfer the said real property to plaintiff. (3) That, in pursuance of her purpose to perform, on her part, said agreement, she intended and attempted to convey to the plaintiff, by means of the deed set out in the amended complaint, the real property described in the seventh paragraph of said pleading. (4) That, when she signed the deed prepared by Barker, she believed and understood that the instrument contained a correct description of the real property involved in this dispute, and that the instrument as signed by her would convey and transfer to plaintiff said real property. (5) That the plaintiff believed and understood that, by the deed, the deceased intended to convey said property to her, and believed that the same would be and was correctly described in said instrument. (6) That the deceased delivered the deed to her daughter, Elizabeth, with instructions to hold it until after her (deceased's) death and then deliver the instrument to the plaintiff, and that said Elizabeth did, after her mother's death, hand the same to plaintiff.

[2, 3] As stated, the finding that the agreement by and between the deceased on the one hand, and the plaintiff and the latter's husband on the other, as alleged in the complaint, is abundantly supported by the evidence. Indeed, the intervener made no substantial showing contradictory of the testimony disclosing the making of the agreement. The deed in question constituted the mere conduit through or by means of which the deceased attempted, inter vivos, to perform her part of the agreement, and even if it were necessary to hold that the said deed was for any sufficient reason fatally defective—if, for instance, in fact or in law there had been no delivery—still the agreement, as alleged, proved, and found, being supported by an adequate consideration (Civ. Code, § 3391), would be enforceable in equity and the plaintiff thus vested with title to said real property, notwithstanding that it rests in parol (Pomeroy on Specific Performance, p. 268; McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 81, 70 P. 1008; Stewart v. Smith, 6 Cal. App. 152, 91 P. 667; Barry v. Beamer, 8 Cal. App. 200, 96 P. 373). We are, however, not concerned here with or about the proposition last suggested. As seen, the relief which the plaintiff seeks by her action is a reformation of the deed in question so that it will express the intention or purpose of the deceased in executing that instrument. And, since as shown above, it is established by the well-buttressed findings of the trial court that the agreement referred to was made as alleged in the amended complaint, and that the deceased endeavored, in consonance with said agreement, to convey to plaintiff the real property set out in said complaint, there are left for consideration but two propositions, to wit: (1) Whether the mistake or error involved in the failure to insert in said deed a complete or proper description of the property thereby attempted to be conveyed was a "mutual mistake of the parties," in the sense contemplated by section 3399 of the Civil Code. (2) Whether there was a valid delivery of the deed to the plaintiff, the named grantee.

"When, through fraud or a mutual mistake of the parties, or a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected, a written contract does not truly express the intention of the parties, it may be revised on the application of a party aggrieved, so as to express that intention, so far as it can be done without prejudice to rights acquired by third persons, in good faith and for value."

Given a strict or literal construction and application, it would perhaps be necessary to hold that, within the meaning of the above section, the "mistake" which it is the purpose of this action to correct by a revision of the deed was neither a mutual mistake nor "a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected," for it is obvious that the plaintiff, not being present when the deed was executed by the deceased, and never having seen or read the deed until after the death of her mother, was without opportunity to hear and know, and was, therefore, without reason to suspect, that the instrument did not contain a correct description of the property which it was the intention of both parties thereby to convey. The section, however, has never been subjected to so strict a construction, and, since the remedy it affords in the cases to which it was and is designed to apply is of an equitable nature, or peculiarly conversant with the practice of courts of equity, it should never be so construed and applied unless the manifest justice of the case imperatively requires it.

[5] We think that the circumstances of the instant case, as disclosed by the evidence, justify the conclusion that, within the meaning and intent of section 3399 of the Civil Code, the mistake was mutual, or the mistake of both the deceased and the plaintiff. A mistake of fact consists, among other things, in a "belief in the present existence of a thing material to the contract, which does not exist, or in the past existence of such a thing, which has not existed." Civ. Code, § 1577, subd. 2. It is undoubtedly true that the plaintiff, although not present when the deceased signed and acknowledged the deed, and never saw or read it until after the death of the deceased, knew that the latter intended to make the instrument, knew that it had been made and consequently of its existence, and knew, from her conversations with deceased, the verbal agreement referred to and the wills she attempted to execute, that the deceased intended by the deed to convey the real property in dispute to her (plaintiff). The evidence clearly shows that the deceased up to the time of her death, and that plaintiff up to the time that the instrument was delivered to her, believed that the deed contained a correct description of and conveyed to plaintiff the real property described in the seventh paragraph of the amended complaint.

The case of Cleghorn v. Zumwalt, 83 Cal. 155, 23 P. 294, involved an action to reform a deed by which a larger interest in the land would be conveyed than the owner supposed she owned therein. An agreement previously made by and between the parties for the sale and purchase of the land called for the transfer of the owner's entire interest in a larger tract of land, which the latter believed consisted of only a one-fifth interest therein, whereas, as the owner discovered after the deed was executed and delivered to the grantee and the latter had paid the consideration for the transfer, she owned, without knowing it at the times of the agreement and the grant, and therefore, unintentionally had conveyed to the grantee, by the general description of the land contained in the deed, a three-fifths instead of a one-fifth interest in the larger tract. The trial court refused to decree a revision of the deed, "not on the ground," as the court in that case states it, "that it would be inequitable, or would not make the deed conform to the purchase as actually made, but on the technical ground that at the time of the actual execution and delivery of the deed there was not a mutual mistake of fact as to what it conveyed." Reversing the case and referring to the position of the trial court as just indicated, the court said:

"In this we think the court erred. There is no doubt whatever that at the time the minds of the parties met and the bargain was actually made, the mistake was mutual. Both then understood and believed that what the one was selling and the other was buying was the undivided one-fifth, and the price was fixed on that basis. The execution and delivery of the deed afterward was but the carrying into effect of the agreement already made. The mistake relates to the time of the agreement, not merely to the time of the carrying of the agreement into effect. But even if it be held that the cause of action must relate solely to the condition and understanding of the parties at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed, the case is one which comes within the provisions of section 3399 of the Civil Code, and entitled the plaintiff to the relief demanded."

It is true in this case that the amended complaint did not expressly allege, nor did the court likewise find, that the fact that the deed did not fully or completely describe the property was due to the mutual mistake of the plaintiff and the deceased. On the contrary, both the allegations of said complaint and the court's finding in this respect are that the mistake was that of the deceased. The amended complaint and the findings, however, set forth and find the facts of the several transactions (including the making of the verbal agreement between the deceased and the plaintiff) culminating in the making of the deed, and from that statement and those findings of the facts the necessary implication is that the mistake was mutual as between the parties. In other words, from the facts stated in the complaint and as found by the court is plainly deducible the fact that the deceased mistakenly believed when she signed the deed, that she was thereby conveying to plaintiff the real property described in the seventh paragraph of the complaint; and from the facts so stated and as found by the court is likewise deducible the fact that the plaintiff, as to said deed, erroneously believed the same thing. Indeed, in the very nature of the situation as disclosed by the facts stated in the complaint and as found by the court, relative to the several transactions leading to the making of the deed, neither the plaintiff nor the deceased could have entertained any other supposition or belief as to the purpose and the intended effect of the deed as executed by the deceased.

[6, 7] The amended complaint, as to the matter of the mutuality of the mistake, stated facts sufficient to withstand the force of the general demurrer, which, as seen, was incorporated in the answer, and the facts found by the court are sufficient to support the judgment upon the theory that the failure fully or properly to describe in the deed the property thereby intended to be conveyed involved a mutual mistake as between the parties, within the intent or contemplation of section 3399 of the Civil Code. This construction of the complaint and the findings is peculiarly proper under the circumstances of this case, for, as seen, in point of fact, the defective description of the property was due to the carelessness of the scrivener who drafted the instrument, the deceased's actual mistake (which in the very logic of the situation also became that of plaintiff) being, as has been declared, in assuming and believing that he (the scrivener) had prepared the deed in accord with deceased's instructions as communicated to him through her daughter, Elizabeth, as to the description of the property which she thereby intended to convey to plaintiff.

[8, 9] The point that there was not a legal delivery of the deed to the plaintiff (the grantee) derives no support from the record. The question whether a deed has been delivered is one of intention; and this question is always one of peculiar importance where, as here, the deed is given by the grantor into the possession of a third party with unconditional instructions to deliver it to the grantee at some future time. The rule is thus stated in Crozer v. White, 9 Cal. App. 612, 621, 100 P. 130, 134:

"We think that it is well settled in this state that where a grantor has placed the deed in the hands of a third party, with instructions to deliver it to the grantee, even where the same is to be delivered after the death of the grantor, if there be nothing to indicate an intention on the part of the grantor to recall the same, such deed has then passed beyond the control of the grantor for all time. Manifestly, the question must be determined by the grantor's intention in the matter, and is one of fact to be solved by the light of all the circumstances surrounding the transaction. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 451 [33 P. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186]; Whittenbrock v. Cass, 110 Cal. 1 [42 P. 300]."

[10] There is not a particle of evidence in the present case tending to show that, when she committed the deed to the custody of her daughter, Elizabeth, with instructions that she (the daughter) should hold it until after her (deceased's) death and upon the happening of that event to deliver it to the plaintiff, the deceased did not then and there intend to part with all control or dominion over said deed. To the contrary, all the circumstances show that her intention was to make the transfer of the property to plaintiff by said deed absolute. The deceased, when giving the deed into the possession of her daughter, with the instructions as explained, said nothing or used no language or made no expression indicating, or which could be construed as, an intention on her part to qualify such delivery or that the delivery was to be contingent upon the happening of some condition. Nor did she at the time say anything which could even be construed or understood as the manifestation of an intention in her not to part with all control and dominion over the deed and the property. To the contrary, the evidence shows, as the court found, that her intention was to make the conveyance absolute or unconditional. The testimony of Miss Elizabeth Bierwagen (uncontradicted as to this matter) is to the effect that the deceased handed the instrument to her (Elizabeth) with instructions that it be retained by her until her (deceased's) death, and that thereupon she (Elizabeth) should deliver it to the plaintiff; that neither then nor thereafter did deceased make any other statement or declaration regarding the delivery of the deed, nor did she ever after its delivery ask for or recall or have possession of the deed. Hayden v. Collins, 1 Cal. App. 259, 263, 264, 81 P. 1120, cited by appellant. As has been before stated, it is clear from the verbal agreement (proved to the satisfaction of the trial court by the testimony of several witnesses), the conversations between deceased and others relating to said agreement, and the attempted testamentary devise of the property to plaintiff on two previous and different occasions that the deceased, in pursuance of her previous agreement to transfer the property to plaintiff, intended by the deed to make an absolute or unconditional conveyance of the property to plaintiff; that, in other words, it was her intention that the deed should become effective upon her delivery of the instrument to her daughter with the instructions above indicated; that, in brief, she intended, when she delivered the deed to her daughter, a present transfer of the property.

The cases cited by counsel for appellants to support their claim upon the question of delivery present situations, as to the facts, materially different from that presented here.

In Nelson v. Thomas, 36 Cal. App. 433, 172 P. 398, it is merely held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding that the deed therein involved was never delivered.

In Jeffers v. Hulen, 52 Cal. App. 590, 199 P. 350, it is held in an action to quiet title and involving the question of the legal effect of an instrument in the form of a grant, bargain, and sale deed, that the evidence was sufficient to support the finding that the instrument was intended to operate as a mortgage and not as an absolute conveyance of the property therein described. In that case it is properly held that the statement of the grantor accompanying the delivery of a deed that the grantee was to have the property described in the instrument, "if anything happens to the grantor," "indicates that a present transfer of travel was not intended, but rather a testamentary disposition of the property."

In Stone v. Daily, 181 Cal. 571, 185 P. 665, the wife executed a deed conveying her separate real property to her husband, and deposited the instrument, inclosed in an envelope, with a bank. On the envelope the grantor and her husband, the grantee, signed written instructions to the bank to the effect that the latter should keep the deed "so long as we may live"; that during such time the bank was not to deliver the deed to "either of us nor to any other person, * * *; upon the death of either of us to deliver the same to the survivor on demand." Thus it will be seen, as Justice Olney stated in the opinion, the grantee was to receive title to the property only upon the condition that he survived the grantee, but that the deed was to be returned to her if her husband predeceased her. It is obvious that in that case there was no intention in the grantor when she deposited the deed with the bank to effect "a present transfer" of the property to her husband. The vesting of title in him was made contingent upon the condition that the wife (grantor) predeceased him.

It is obvious that the above cases are not in point here. The other cases cited by appellant on the question of delivery are no less inapplicable here.

Upon the question whether the mistake in the description of the property was mutual as between the parties, the cases called to our attention by appellants are different in material respects from the instant case. We will not review them herein.

[11, 12] The contention, that, the deed in question being invalid because the real property purported thereby to be conveyed was not completely described therein, it was improper to admit parol testimony to supply the deficiency of the instrument in that particular, is untenable. One of the thoroughly established rules in equity is that said courts will reform contracts, both executed and executory, irrespective of the statute of frauds. "In other words, the statute does not prevent a court from reforming the written evidence of a contract within the statute, by enlarging or restricting the terms or the subject-matter of the contract, so as to make it express the real agreement whenever it is clearly shown that, by reason of fraud or mistake, either the terms or the subject-matter of the contract, as it was intended and understood by the parties to it, is not embraced in the writing. * * * A contract required by the statute to be in writing cannot, of course, be enforced, until it is in writing; * * * but the statute does not interfere with the power of a court of equity to reform deeds or other instruments in which the parties intended to comply with the statute, but were prevented by fraud, accident, or mistake." Williams v. Hamilton, 65 Am. St. Rep. 501. See, also, 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. (2d Ed.) §§ 845, 862, and 866; House v. McMullen, 9 Cal. App. 664, 100 P. 344; Mitchell v. Whitford, 49 Cal. App. 46, 192 P. 457; Civ. Code, § 3401.

[13] There are innumerable cases in which reformation of deeds has been allowed to correct a misdescription therein of the property intended to be conveyed, whereby (in some such instances) property has been included in or excluded from the grant or conveyance contrary to the intention of the parties. And generally, in such cases, it is impossible to establish the fact of the wrong description or the fact that the description does not correspond with the intention of the parties as to the particular land to be conveyed without a resort to parol evidence. Indeed, the practice in courts of equity with reference to the revision of written agreements, as is true of sections 3399 and 3401 of the Civil Code, which merely follow the equitable doctrine of reformation long existent prior to the adoption of said sections, presupposes the necessity for invoking the aid of parol evidence to support the plea for such relief, and this upon the equitable consideration that, while equity courts fully recognize the validity and efficacy of statutes of frauds, they will not permit such statutes to stand as a shield to wrongs which it is their specific purpose to prevent. In the present instance, however, it is claimed, as we have seen, that the case here is not one of mere misdescription of specific real property, but one where there is no particular real property at all described in the deed, that for that reason the instrument is invalid, and that the insertion therein of a description of the property in dispute through or by means of the remedy of revision, as provided by section 3399 of the Civil Code, would amount to the making of a deed when none as to said or any property had ever existed. But it is perfectly clear that the deceased intended to cause to be described in the deed the property in dispute, and that there was an attempt in good faith to do so, but that such attempt, through the carelessness of the scrivener who prepared the document, was abortive. The description was partially correct, and the incompleteness of the description and the erroneous location of the property within the boundaries of "Chicago Park" constituted it a misdescription.

It must be borne in mind that the deed does not involve a voluntary transfer of the property, but is supported not only by a valuable, but, according to the evidence, an adequate consideration.

[14] The order denying a motion for a new trial is not appealable. The appeal from said order is therefore dismissed. The judgment and the order denying the motion to vacate the judgment are affirmed.

COCKE et ux. v. MacLEOD. (Civ. 5648.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 12, 1927.

1. Reference $\hookrightarrow$ 49—Power of referee appointed by "interlocutory judgment" held not to cease because judge appointing him retired (Code Civ. Proc. § 184).

Powers of referee held not to terminate on the retirement of the judge appointing him by decree providing that defendant held title to west half of property in trust for plaintiff, that referee should fix boundary between west half of property and east half thereof, that on referee's report court would enter a further and additional decree confirming or modifying the report and in accordance therewith enter judgment in favor of defendants "for a sum equal to —," and that the second decree should provide for payment thereof prior to vesting of title, especially under Code Civ. Proc. § 184, though decree was "interlocutory judgment," appointment not being personal to the judge making it, but by the court itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interlocutory Decree or Judgment.]

2. Courts $\hookrightarrow$ 50—Authority of court over action in which receiver or referee has been appointed is undisturbed by transfer from one department to another.

Transfer from one department of the court to another of an action, in which a receiver or referee has been appointed, does not disturb the authority of the court over the action.

Application by Robert Virgil Cocke and wife for a writ of prohibition to be directed to A. D. MacLeod, as referee, to restrain him from proceeding with the hearing in an action to establish a trust in real property. Alternative writ discharged.

Fredericks & Hanna and Lyon, Fleming & Robbins, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Seth B. Smith and William & Guy Lewis, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. [1] In this proceeding petitioners pray that respondent, as referee appointed by a judge of the superior court, be permanently restrained and prohibited from proceeding with the hearing in an action pending in said superior court, in which action respondent was appointed referee.

The facts appear to be that in a suit brought for the purpose of having a trust declared in favor of the plaintiff as to a one-half interest in and to certain real property described in the complaint, the court made findings of fact and drew conclusions of law therefrom and thereupon rendered judgment to the effect that the plaintiff was the owner of the west one-half of said property, subject to a lien and the payment thereof by plaintiff of one-half of a certain mortgage thereon; that defendant held the record title to the said one-half of said property in trust for the plaintiff;

"that the defendant, Robert Virgil Cocke, account to the plaintiff, Joseph Richard Cocke, for the income, rents, and profits of the said west one-half (W. $\frac{1}{2}$) of the said real estate, belonging to Joseph Richard Cocke, from and after the 1st day of January, 1924, and also the one-half of the interest, amortization payments, and taxes paid by said Robert Virgil Cocke, accruing and paid since the 25th day of January, 1921; and that the defendant, Robert Virgil Cocke, pay to the plaintiff, Joseph Richard Cocke, the excess, if any, of the aforesaid income, rents, and profits, over and above the amount of the aforesaid interest, amortization payments, and taxes paid by him, and in the event of the aforesaid payments for interest, amortization, and taxes exceed the aforesaid income, rents, and profits, the plaintiff, Joseph Richard Cocke, pay to the defendant, Robert Virgil Cocke, the amount of such excess."

The judgment also provided that:

"A. D. MacLeod is hereby appointed as referee to take evidence and find and determine said amounts, and the difference between them, and to report such findings to the court."

Of the conclusions of law which were drawn from the findings, and upon which conclusions, with others, the judgment is based, the following are deemed material to the question here involved, to wit:

"That a decree should be entered herein providing that A. D. MacLeod be appointed referee herein to fix and determine the boundary line separating the westerly one-half from the easterly one-half of said property. * * *

"That said decree should further provide that said referee shall report his findings to this court, and that this court shall thereupon enter a further and additional decree confirming or modifying the report of said referee, and, in accordance with said report as modified or confirmed, enter judgment in favor of defendants against the plaintiff for a sum equal to —."

"That said second decree shall provide that all sums found to be due therein to the defendants from the plaintiff shall be paid prior to the vesting of the title. * * *"

After the judgment was rendered, but before any action had been taken by the referee, the judge who rendered the judgment retired from office as judge of the superior court, since which retirement he has been neither appointed nor elected to such position.

In such circumstances, it is contended by petitioners that the judgment which was rendered was interlocutory only, and that because of the fact that the judge who rendered such judgment no longer holds a judicial position on the bench of the superior court, such court is without jurisdiction to render a final judgment founded upon the interlocutory judgment, and consequently that the referee appointed by the court is also without jurisdiction in the premises.

In the case of Connolly v. Ashworth, 98

Cal. 205, 38 P. 60, where the authorities are cited, it is held that when the term of office of a judge expired before a decision in an action pending before him had been filed, his successor was without jurisdiction to render judgment on the decision which had been signed by the former occupant of the office prior to his retirement. To the same effect is Broder v. Conklin, 98 Cal. 360, 33 P. 211, in which it is also held that (syllabus):

"In an action to declare the defendant guilty of fraud in the matter of an insolvent's estate, and that he holds certain property in trust for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and for an accounting of the moneys received by him under the trust, a finding by the court 'that the plaintiffs herein are entitled to judgment,' but leaving the principles of the accounting to be determined and other matters to be adjudicated, is not a sufficient determination of the cause to authorize the entry of judgment thereon by the clerk."

The case of Clement v. Duncan, 191 Cal. 209, 215 P. 1025, was one for the dissolution of a partnership. The trial court caused an "interlocutory decree" to be entered which dissolved the partnership, ordered an accounting between the partners and appointed an expert accountant to examine into and "report on all the affairs of the said copartnership, and to return the same to the court."

The court said:

"The interlocutory decree 'was based upon findings which determined none of the questions at issue except the fact of partnership and the existence of mutual and undetermined claims and demands, and upon a conclusion of law which declared no more than that an accounting was necessary. The decree, declared by the court itself to be "an interlocutory decree," appointed a referee to state an account, the settlement of which was essential to the fixing of the relative rights of the parties in the partnership property. Under all the authorities such a decree is not final.' Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 453, 114 P. 579, 581, and cases therein cited. See, also, Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 636, and Gianelli v. Brisco [Briscoe], 40 Cal. App. 532, 181 P. 105."

In the case of Pomper v. Superior Court of State of California in and for Los Angeles County, 191 Cal. 494, 216 P. 577, it appeared that the lower court had rendered an "interlocutory judgment and decree" by which title to real property was quieted in one of the parties to the action, but reserved for future determination by the court the question of the amount of the rents, issues, and profits to be paid by the respective defendants to the plaintiff therein. The court said:

"While it is true that the so-called interlocutory judgment purported to settle the basic issue involved in the case, it expressly left for future determination the rights of the parties with relation to the rents, issues, and profits, which was one of the issues raised by the complaint, as the plaintiff prayed for judgment for the value thereof.

"The general rule is that where a decree is made fixing the liability and rights of the parties which refers the case to a master or subordinate tribunal for a judicial purpose, such, for instance, as the statement of an account, upon which a further decree is to be entered, the decree is not final. 2 Cal. Jur. §§ 19, 20, p. 142; California Nat. Bank v. Stateler, 171 U. S. 447, 19 S. Ct. 6, 43 L. Ed. 233, see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes; Clement v. Duncan, ante [191 Cal.] p. 209 (215 P. 1025); Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 453 (114 P. 579)."

Although the ruling and general trend of the opinion in the case of Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 138 P. 696, would appear to be not entirely consistent with the decision as hereinbefore indicated in the two cases to which reference has been had herein, in view of the facts in the instant case as disclosed by the conclusions of law therein, it was intended that the referee was to be charged with the duty of fixing and determining the boundary which would show the dividing line between the properties of the respective parties to the litigation; that upon the report of the referee being filed the court would render an additional decree confirming or modifying such "report" and thereupon enter judgment "in favor of defendants against the plaintiff for a sum equal to —"; and that said second decree should provide that said sum should be paid by plaintiff to defendants "prior to the vesting of title"—together with the additional fact that by the interlocutory judgment which was actually rendered in the action the referee was authorized to take evidence and find and determine the state of the accounts existing between plaintiff and the defendants—we are constrained to hold, in accordance with the principle announced in Pomper v. Superior Court of State of California in and for Los Angeles County, 191 Cal. 494, 216 P. 577, that the judgment which was rendered was interlocutory only.

[2] Such conclusion, however, is not necessarily decisive of the question of the power of the referee to act under his order of appointment. It is clear that the order is not one merely personal to the judicial officer of the court, but is an order by the court itself and as such unaffected by the retirement of the judge who made it. Were it otherwise, no judge, other than the one making the appointment of a receiver or a referee, even in a condemnation proceeding, would be authorized to receive and act upon the report of such appointee; and a similar situation might result in an action, arising from the death or retirement of a judge who theretofore had made an order appointing a notary public or commissioner to take a deposition. In the county of Los Angeles, as well as in other counties of this state having several judges of the superior court, where for the expedition of the business of the court, cases may be and frequently are transferred from one busy department thereof to another department temporarily open for the transaction of business, it may and does often happen that an action therein pending in which a receiver or a referee theretofore has been appointed is transferred from one department of the court to another department thereof. In such circumstances, so far as concerns the judge presiding over the department from which such cause has been transferred, he occupies a position similar to that occupied by the judge in the instant case, in that he is no longer connected with the cause. The authority of the court, however, is undisturbed by such circumstances. Cudd v. Williams, 39 S. C. 452, 18 S. E. 3; Pratt v. Timmerman, 69 S. C. 186, 48 S. E. 255. No authority has been presented which would indicate that after such transfer, because a judge other than the one making the appointment of a receiver or a referee would have charge of the proceedings in the action, the order of appointment would become a nullity and such appointee unauthorized to proceed with his duties.

Section 184 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows:

"No proceeding in any court of justice, in an action or special proceeding pending therein, shall be affected by a vacancy in the office of all or any of the judges thereof."

Aside from lack of authority to the effect that, because of the retirement of the judge who made the order of appointment of the referee in the instant case, the powers of such referee ceased, the statutory authority to which reference has been had is broad enough in its scope to cover the situation here presented.

It is therefore ordered that the alternative writ issued herein be and it is discharged.

VANDERBILT MINING CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al.★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. August 16, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 13, 1927.

1. Master and servant §419—Commission awarding permanent disability compensation for Charcot knee could award additional compensation for subsequent amputation because of Charcot knee (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20d).

Notwithstanding that Industrial Accident Commission had awarded permanent disability compensation to employee for injury which, due to pre-existing syphilitic condition, resulted in Charcot knee, commission held to have jurisdiction to subsequently award additional compensation, for subsequent amputation because of Charcot knee, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20d (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), providing that the commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over its awards and may alter or amend any award upon good cause appearing therefor, such power including right to increase compensation awarded.

2. Master and servant §419—Where award granted antisiphilitic treatment and operation which was refused, subsequent award for permanent disability held not to terminate liability for treatment.

Where original award to employee sustaining injury resulting, because of pre-existing syphilitic condition, in Charcot knee required employer to furnish antisiphilitic treatment and an operation, and the employee refused the operation and was found justified in refusing, subsequent award for permanent disability held not to terminate liability for medical treatment; antisiphilitic treatment not being part of treatment for operation and not subsequently passed on.

Proceeding under the Compensation Act by John A. McFarlane, employee, against the Vanderbilt Mining Company, employer, and the Columbia Casualty Company, insurer. To review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation, the employer and insurer bring certiorari, making the Industrial Accident Commission and the employee respondents. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. [1] Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. It is alleged therein, in substance, that on January 30, 1924, respondent John A. McFarlane filed an application for adjustment of claim under the Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), in which it was alleged that he sustained an injury by slipping on a timber while working for Vanderbilt Mining Company at Ivanpah, Cal., on September 26, 1923, causing abrasion of his right shin and a strain of the right knee. That evidence taken upon the hearing showed that McFarlane had worked for several days following this injury, and that he had been treated for superficial injury of the leg by a Dr. Brook, of Las Vegas, Nev., but after about two weeks' time he went to Bakersfield and placed himself under the care of doctors of that city. That shortly after the 1st day of January following, the insurance carrier had him removed to Los Angeles, where a complete examination was made by specialists on behalf of the company, and also by a referee doctor appointed by the Industrial Accident Commission; that the medical evidence showed that McFarlane was suffering from a Charcot joint of the knee caused by syphilis; that a Charcot joint is one evidence of the disease known as "tabes dorsalis," often referred to as "locomotor ataxia." Thereafter findings and award were issued April 12, 1924, by which it was determined that McFarlane had scraped the inner aspect of his right leg from the knee to the ankle, approximately precipitating a previous diseased condition resulting in a Charcot knee. As a result of this injury, the commission found that disability had continued from October 5, 1923, to and including February 6, 1924, which on maximum earnings amounted to $348.16 compensation; that it was necessary to do a fixation operation of the right knee joint, together with antisiphilitic treatment. It was further found that the proper apportionment between the disease and injury was to award applicant certain medical and surgical care without compensation from and after February 6, 1924, as said injury might result in permanent disability which in such event would be rated subsequently upon request and the filing of medical reports. This award became final. Thereafter McFarlane refused to accept the operation on his knee, and the commission found the refusal justified. McFarlane then filed a request for a permanent injury rating. The commission filed its decision upon this petition September 3, 1924, in which it held the condition to be permanent, consisting of what is technically known as "Charcot knee," and it further found that the proportion of permanent disability attributable to the injury, and not to the pre-existing disease, had been fully compensated by the compensation awarded for the temporary disability in the previous award. On September 22, 1924, McFarlane filed a petition for rehearing in which he set forth, among other things, that he had paid out over $770 for medical expense while in Bakersfield, prior to the first hearing, and he asked that the commission grant him a further award in reimbursement for such expense. On October 17, 1924, this petition came on for a rehearing and was denied.

Following this decision McFarlane then petitioned for a writ of review in the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 2, which petition was denied on December 9, 1924. Thereafter, on April 22, 1926, some 16 months later, McFarlane filed a petition for further compensation based on new and further disability, and also for an allowance for medical bills, said petition setting forth that on September 26, 1925, it had become necessary for him to have his leg amputated because of the Charcot knee. Applicant asked for a further allowance of compensation on account of the loss of his leg and for the medical, surgical, and hospital expense incurred in connection therewith, and the sum of $933.85 to cover medical expenses that were incurred previous to the first hearing, a part of which had, it is claimed, been the subject of the petition for writ of review which had been denied. Petitioners herein answered said application and set up that the said matter had become res judicata, and that the denial of the writ of review established the previous decisions of the commission as the law of the case. Thereafter on July 21, 1926, the commission entered its decision on applicant's petition for further compensation in which it determined that (1) the order and decision of September 3, 1924, was a final decision upon the claim for disability compensation and therefore the applicant was entitled to no further compensation for permanent disability; (2) that McFarlane was entitled under the award of April 12, 1924, to certain medical and surgical treatment and such treatment had not been furnished by petitioners herein; and (3) that as the applicant's claim for such medical treatment had not been acted on in the denial of the petition for rehearing on September 22, 1924, the case should be set down for further hearing as to such medical expense. Thereafter McFarlane filed a petition for rehearing on July 9, 1926, claiming that the amputation of the leg was a new and further disability, and the commission granted the petition and subsequently on April 2, 1927, rendered two decisions. Under the first, medical expense incurred prior to the first hearing was disallowed, but an award was made for antisiphilitic treatment subsequent to the first hearing, and prior to the amputation of the leg, in the amount of $187.50, for which an award was made. Under the second, it was found that the employee was entitled to a new and further disability by reason of the amputation of the leg above the knee, which was rated at 73¾ per cent., amounting to $20.83 a week for 240 weeks and thereafter $4.41 a week for life, but as said disability was caused in part by pre-existing disease and in part by injury, that the proportion of said disability attributable to the injury was 25 per cent. which reduced the amount to $5.21 for 240 weeks, and thereafter $1.10 a week for life. It also found the reasonable medical expense to be $141.10 for the cost of amputation, one-quarter of which is $35.28, and award was made accordingly. Petitioners aver in support of the present application that the commission in entering its decision of April 2, 1927, acted without and in excess of its powers; that the findings and award are not sustained by the evidence and the findings do not sustain the awards; and, further, that they are unreasonable. It is also claimed that the award of September 3, 1924, was a complete decision of the case as it disposed of all issues up to that date, which included antisiphilitic treatment, and the fact that the knee should not be operated on, that the condition of Charcot knee is a diseased condition and the award contemplated that the disease might become worse and might necessitate an operation to amputate it, in accordance with the course of such disease; that there was no rating of the amount of permanent disability, but the findings were general that the full disability of the employment for precipitating an impending Charcot knee had been fully compensated, and the final order that applicant take nothing further was a complete disposition of that issue; that a denial of the writ of review to the District Court of Appeal confirmed this, and that, therefore, the commission could not reopen the case and give further relief for the same condition of Charcot knee existing 18 months later. It is further claimed that the antisiphilitic medical treatment was part and parcel of the treatment for the operation ordered, which had never been accepted, and that, therefore, the commission was without jurisdiction to entertain the claim of further disability or medical treatment due to the syphilitic condition after the findings and awards of April 12, 1924, and September 3, 1924, which fixed the total liability for these claims and which had become final. In support of the claim that the disability benefits had become final, petitioners argue that the fact that the Charcot knee condition necessitated an amputation after the original awards had been made could in no manner affect their liability, as such operation was rendered necessary as the proximate result of the disease known as "Charcot knee," and not as a new development of the injury. We cannot subscribe to this contention. The medical evidence showed that the disease known as "Charcot knee" is developed by a traumatic injury such as the employee suffered, where a pre-existing syphilitic condition exists. In accordance with this evidence the commission in the original award of April 12, 1924, found that the injury suffered by McFarlane proximately precipitated the pre-existing diseased condition resulting in a Charcot knee. By this award it was definitely established that the injury complained of was temporary in character and consisted of a Charcot knee, which was due to both injury and pre-existing quiescent syphilis. The award made upon the petition for a permanent disability rating filed September 3, 1924, was to the same effect. At the time of the filing of this last final award the employee had not suffered an amputation of his leg. It cannot be successfully argued that this loss did not constitute "new facts" such as would confer jurisdiction upon the commission under section 20d of the Compensation Act to amend its prior awards. A different and more complete permanent disability resulted from the operation than that determined by the award of September 3, 1924. The nature of this new disability was a progression of the permanent character of such condition which was originally caused or contributed to by both disease and injury. Under these circumstances, the commission was justified in entertaining and granting a petition for rehearing upon applicant's request for further compensation and in the making of its award of April 2, 1927, as above recited. The extent and apportionment thereof was fixed and established by the commission under a schedule adopted by the commission pursuant to statute. It was a determination of a fact within its jurisdiction.

[2] Equally without merit is the further contention that the award of September 3, 1924, terminated all liability for medical treatment under the award of April 12, 1924. This original award ordered petitioner to furnish a surgical operation, together with antisiphilitic treatment as suggested by Dr. Jones in a report filed with the commission. The treatment was a thing separate and apart from the operation provided for. The subsequent decision on petition for permanent disability did not deal with this question, but the decision upon applicant's petition for further compensation filed April 23, 1926, and decided June 21 following, expressly recites that this matter was not passed upon, and it orders that the cause be set for further hearing on the claim for medical expense under the provisions of the findings and award filed April 12, 1924. The supplemental award of April 2, 1927, for the first time determined the amount to be allowed for treatment. The applicant was entitled to medical aid for the disease from which he was suffering by reason of the fact that the injury he received produced in part a condition requiring medical treatment. The award of April 12, 1924, so determined and it has long since become final. The amount to which he was entitled was passed upon for the first time in the supplemental award of April 2, 1927, and the amount so found to be due finds support in the evidence.

The award is affirmed.

DONAHUE v. CONLEY. (Civ. 4605.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 10, 1927.

1. Bankruptcy $\S$ 426(2)—Where defendant gave cash and note for sum embezzled, then gave new note for unpaid portion of old, original fraud precluded bankruptcy from discharging note.

Where defendant gave cash and note for sum embezzled and later gave a new note for unpaid portion of old, debt on new note held debt for money embezzled, hence not discharged by bankruptcy because of original fraud.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 656(3)—In suit upon note, record justified appellate court's amending findings of fact of lower court, in view of statute (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 956a, as added by St. 1927, c. 352).

In suit upon a note where bankruptcy was in issue, record held to justify appellate court in amending findings of fact of lower court pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 956a, as added by St. 1927, c. 352, relative to courts of appeal altering findings of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Ada Donahue against John J. Conley. Judgment for defendant on his plea of discharge of liability under the federal Bankruptcy Act, and plaintiff appeals. Finding of facts amended, judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions.

Waldo & Hinds, of Pasadena, for appellant.

David S. McCann, of San Diego, for respondent.

YORK, J. All of the objections raised to the findings of fact and conclusions of law herein are predicated upon the proposition that the indebtedness of the defendant to plaintiff was an indebtedness as set forth in the amended complaint, to wit, moneys embezzled by the defendant which had been intrusted to the defendant for the purpose of purchasing second mortgages. The defendant, according to the evidence and the amended pleadings, appropriated to his own use a sum aggregating about $5,000, and thereafter gave a note for part thereof and the balance in cash. Upon paying up the most of the original note, the balance of this original note was paid by a note, which last-mentioned note is the note upon which the original complaint herein was solely based. After the adjudication in bankruptcy of the defendant, the plaintiff secured leave at the time of trial to file an amended complaint which set up the alleged embezzlement, and which the plaintiff now contends on this appeal is such an obligation as comes within the exception stated in the discharge in bankruptcy secured by the defendant herein, "excepting such debts as are by law excepted from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy." The trial court had before it not only the evidence set forth in the supplement to the brief herein, but also the original complaint and the answer thereto and certain portions of the proceedings in the bankruptcy court, including the discharge and the claim filed in the bankruptcy court by the plaintiff herein. The findings herein must have been predicated upon the belief of the trial court that the indebtedness sued on was the balance due on a note given for an unpaid balance of a prior note, and that therefore the allegations of the amended complaint as to fraud, embezzlement, and misappropriation were matters that could not be considered by the court in rendering its judgment.

[1] A fraud was involved in the original liability, to wit, the embezzlement of the funds of plaintiff intrusted to defendant, and the intervening note transactions we hold do not change the fact that the suit is still for a part of the money so obtained. This being so, the debt comes within the exception stated in the discharge in bankruptcy. Even if the money were stolen without ever being intrusted to defendant, the liability would still be one not wiped out by such discharge in bankruptcy. McIntyre v. Kavanaugh, 242 U. S. 138, 141, 37 S. Ct. 38, 61 L. Ed. 205, 207.

As the judgment must be reversed, we should consider whether or not we are authorized to order the entry of a new and different judgment. By an act of the Legislature, which became effective July 29, 1927 (Stats. 1927, c. 352), there was added to the Code of Civil Procedure a new section, numbered 956a. It is there provided that on appeal in nonjury cases, the Supreme Court or District Court of Appeal may make findings of fact contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court. Provision is made for the making of such findings on the evidence in the record, or on that evidence and such additional evidence as the court of appellate jurisdiction may take, pursuant to rules to be prescribed therefor.

[2] It may be said that section 956a will not become entirely self-operative in cases where additional evidence must be taken until appropriate rules therefor shall have been adopted. Capron v. Van Horn, 74 Cal. Dec. 44. See, however, Code of Civil Procedure, $\S$ 187; Roche v. Superior Court of San Diego County, 30 Cal. App. 255, 260, 157 P. 830. In this connection, it should be noted that while said section provides that the rules shall be made by the Supreme Court, the Constitution declares that rules of practice and procedure shall be made by the Judicial Council. But in the present action, all necessary amendments to the findings are amply justified by the record, including the evidence now before us.

Therefore, it is ordered that the findings of fact in this action be, and they hereby are, amended as follows: (1) By striking from finding 4 the words "in payment of his said indebtedness." (2) By striking from finding 5 the words "as payment." (3) By amending finding 9 to read as follows: "That the liability of defendant to plaintiff was created by defendant's fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, and defalcation, while acting in a fiduciary capacity." (4) By striking out finding 10. (5) By striking out from finding 12 the word "not."

Upon the findings of fact as thus amended, the judgment is reversed, and it is ordered that the cause be remanded to the superior court with the direction that judgment be entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant in the sum of $1,629.24, with interest thereon from the 29th day of April, 1918, at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum, together with costs.

PENDELL v. VESPER et al. (Civ. 4639.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 10, 1927.

1. Executors and administrators ⚡314(3)—Where devisee's interest in specific land is assigned and portion reassigned, executor selling land in administration need not account to last assignee (Code Civ. Proc. § 1678).

Where an interest in specific real property of a decedent's estate is assigned, and reassigned in portions, and an executor sells the real property under an order of the court in due course of administration, he is not required to account for the money received from the sale other than in his account as executor rendered to the court, no accounting to the last assignee being necessary, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 1678.

2. Executors and administrators ⚡367—Property is presumably sold by executor to pay expenses, debts, or specific cash legacies.

The presumption is that property sold by an executor is sold for the purpose of paying the costs and expenses of administration, or the debts of the estate, or specific cash legacies.

3. Executors and administrators ⚡314(3)—Statute providing for distribution to assignees applies only where no question arises respecting conveyance (Code Civ. Proc. § 1678).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1678, providing that if some of the original heirs, legatees, or devisees have conveyed their shares in the estate of a decedent to other persons, then such shares must be assigned to persons holding the same, applies only where no question arises on the distribution as to the conveyance having been made.

4. Wills ⚡744—Where land is not specifically devised, rents or proceeds of sale by executor are assignable only as cash remaining after payment of expenses.

Where property is not specifically devised, rents received by the executor therefrom or the proceeds of the sale of the property in due course of the administration, under the authority of the court, can be assigned only as a residuary portion of the cash remaining in the hands of the executor at the close of the estate after paying all costs and expenses of administration.

5. Wills ⚡744—Complaint alleging devisee's assignment of interest in land and reassignment of portion to plaintiff, and seeking accounting from executor who sold land, held insufficient to establish an interest in estate where not alleging payment of administrative expenses (Code Civ. Proc. § 1678).

Complaint alleging that interest in estate was devised to designated person, but not alleging that it was specific devise, and alleging devisee's assignment of interest in specific real property and reassignment of a portion of this interest to plaintiff, held insufficient to establish an interest in the estate, where failing to allege that the debts and charges and costs of administration had been paid, the rents or proceeds being assignable only as portion of the cash remaining at the closing of the estate after the payment of the expenses, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 1678.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action to establish interest in an estate, brought by G. Roy Pendell against A. E. Vesper and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. Roy Pendell, of Los Angeles, in pro. per. Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam, of Pasadena, for respondent Rezin Thompson.

Grant Jackson, of Los Angeles, for respondent Vesper.

YORK, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order dismissing plaintiff's action, which action was dismissed by the trial court on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The claim of the appellant in this action appears to be that notwithstanding the decree of distribution which was entered in the matter of the estate of John H. Thompson, deceased, and which decree contains no reservation whatever in favor of the appellant, the appellant is entitled to recover from the defendant Thompson, personally and as executor, some portion of the estate by this action which was filed by him more than two months after the decree of distribution had become final. Appellant claims a right in the estate of John H. Thompson, deceased, by reason of an assignment made to plaintiff, by the defendant Vesper, of a one-fourth of the interest assigned to said Vesper by the defendant Martha Carroll. Under the terms of the will, the defendant Carroll was to receive two-thirteenths interest in the estate, and the defendant Martha Carroll, during the course of the administration, assigned to the defendant Vesper her interest in two certain parcels of real property, presumably property of the estate, and the assignment by defendant Vesper to plaintiff was an assignment only of a one-fourth portion of such interest thus assigned to him by defendant Carroll in said two parcels of real estate. By final decree of distribution of the estate, rendered after said two parcels had been sold under order of court, two-thirteenths interest of the entire estate of John H. Thompson, deceased, was distributed to the defendant Carroll, and the relief asked against the defendant Thompson is "that the said Rezin Thompson be directed and ordered to pay to this plaintiff, under said assignments, the sum of $410.92, and that plaintiff have judgment against the said Rezin Thompson, both as executor of said estate and as an individual, for said sum of $410.92; that plaintiff have judgment against defendants for costs of suit, and for such other and further relief as may seem meet and proper to the court." It is alleged in the complaint that the said two parcels of real estate which were specifically described in said conveyance and said complaint were sold during the course of probate for certain amounts, and that rentals had been received by said executor as such executor from the real estate prior to such sale. It is also alleged that the defendant Thompson had knowledge of such assignments, but nevertheless petitioned and caused the court to make its order distributing to Martha Carroll the two-thirteenths interest previously assigned by her to Vesper, as aforesaid. It is also alleged that a portion of the funds derived from the sales of said lands and the rents derived from said lands prior to such sales and represented by the interest therein assigned by Martha Carroll has been paid to Vesper, and that portion of said funds amounting to $1,186.80 still remains in the hands of the defendant Rezin Thompson—probably meaning as such executor. Plaintiff also alleged that he is the owner of a one-fourth interest in said funds and the money so held by said executor by reason of the conveyance to him hereinbefore set out, but that defendant has failed and refused to pay any part thereof to plaintiff. Plaintiff also attempts to set up sufficient facts to justify an accounting to ascertain what plaintiff's alleged one-fourth interest in the interest of said Vesper would amount to.

[1] The order of the trial court may have been predicated upon several different grounds, but sufficient to say that where an interest in specific real property of a decedent's estate is assigned and reassigned in portions only, and where in due course of administration the real property is by order of court sold, an executor is not required by any provision of law pointed out to us by appellant to account for what he may do with said money so received from such sale, other than his account as executor rendered to the court.

[2, 3] Presumably, property when sold by an executor is sold for the purpose of paying costs and expenses of administration, or debts of the estate, or to pay specific cash legacies. It was held in Howe's Estate, 161 Cal. 152, 118 P. 515, that section 1678 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as to partition or distribution to assignee of devisees, only applies where no question arises on the distribution as to such conveyance having been made. "Where its validity or effect is an issue upon the distribution, the determination of that question is not a matter within the probate jurisdiction of the court." If the rule contended for by appellant is correct, we can readily see that it could be made impossible for an executor to ever close his estate. If an assignment of an interest in specific property which has to be sold to pay the costs and expenses of administration is assigned and reassigned, time without number, it could readily be made impossible for any executor in the ordinary course of business to ever complete his trusteeship.

[4] We find no authority for the assignment of the moneys received from the sale of property by an executor in due course of administration where the real estate has not been specifically given under the will to any particular person, except only such interest as assignee may have in the cash on hand. In the case at bar, the complaint alleges that the estate consisted in part of the real estate hereinbefore mentioned, and that, under the terms and provisions of the last will and testament so admitted to probate, the defendant Martha Carroll acquired an interest in said estate, which said interest included a two-thirteenths undivided interest in and to said two pieces of real estate. There is nothing set forth in the pleading that would authorize us to conclude that the will specifically devised said or any portion of said real estate to the said Martha Carroll, and it is not clear from the appellant's brief in what way or in what manner he claims that the amount that the executor would receive from the sale of the property in the due course of administration of said estate could be kept in a separate fund by itself and be subject to a special assignment as set forth in his complaint, to wit, an assignment of a portion of an assigned interest. The complaint even claims the rentals from the property received by the executor, while no authority is set up in the appellant's brief to show how or why he would be entitled to any part or portion of the rents so received by the executor.

[5] Presumably, the executor during his administration would be paying the taxes and expenses of maintaining the property, and it would require some definite authority for us to hold that the rents received by the executor, or the amounts received by him for the sale of the property in due course of administration under the authority of the court, could be assigned or transferred from one person to another other than as a residuary portion or balance of cash on hand in the hands of the executor at the close of said estate after paying all costs and expenses of such administration. The complaint is silent as to whether the debts and charges and costs of administration have been paid. It fails to state facts sufficient to entitle the appellant to the relief demanded in his complaint.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

GASTER v. HINKLEY. (Civ. 5834.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 12, 1927.

1. New trial ⚡140(3)—Evidence of defendant's remarks at time of automobile accident contrary to his testimony held competent for court to consider on plaintiff's motion for new trial.

Evidence of defendant's remarks at the time of an automobile accident, which was directly contrary to the testimony which he gave at the trial, held competent for the trial court to consider on plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

2. Appeal and error ⚡994(2), 1002—Appellate court does not determine conflicts in evidence nor pass on credibility of witnesses.

The appellate court does not pretend to determine which version of conflicting stories is correct, or pass on the credibility of witnesses.

3. New trial ⚡157—On motion for new trial, court may consider conflict in evidence.

Where there was a sharp conflict in the evidence with respect to material facts, it may be considered by the trial court on a motion for new trial.

4. Appeal and error ⚡977(3)—Whether trial court abused discretion in granting new trial should be determined from consideration of entire record.

In passing on the question of whether the trial court abused its discretion in granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, the appellate court should consider the entire state of the record.

5. Appeal and error ⚡989—On appeal from order granting new trial, appellate court passes only on whether there is substantial evidence supporting trial court's conclusions.

On appeal from an order granting a new trial, the appellate court does not pass on the weight of evidence, but determines only whether there is substantial evidence supporting the trial court's conclusions.

6. New trial ⚡6—Granting new trial is largely discretionary with trial court.

The granting of a new trial rests largely in the discretion of the trial court.

7. New trial ⚡72—Where evidence preponderates against verdict, trial judge should set it aside.

If the weight of the evidence preponderates against the verdict, it is the duty of the trial judge to set it aside.

8. Appeal and error ⚡979(2)—Unless trial judge abuses discretion, order granting new trial on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

If the evidence is conflicting, and it does not appear that the trial court abused its discretion in granting a new trial, the order will not be disturbed on appeal.

9. Municipal corporations ⚡706(3)—Automobile driver has burden of proving pedestrian's contributory negligence.

The burden of proving plaintiff's contributory negligence, in pedestrian's action for injuries from being struck by automobile, rests on the defendant.

10. Municipal corporations ⚡706(8)—Instruction that plaintiff must have been without contributory negligence which might "in any wise" have contributed to automobile accident held erroneous.

In pedestrian's action to recover for injuries from automobile accident, instruction that, before the plaintiff could recover, it must be shown that plaintiff was without contributory negligence which might "in any wise" have contributed to the accident held erroneous, since it fell far short of the rule that, to defeat recovery, the contributory negligence must directly and proximately contribute to the injuries sustained.

11. Municipal corporations ⚡705(10)—Plaintiff's contributory negligence must be proximate cause of injuries from automobile accident to defeat recovery.

In an action for injuries sustained from being struck by automobile, plaintiff's contributory negligence must directly and proximately contribute to injuries sustained to defeat recovery.

13. Trial ⚡296(1)—Where necessary element omitted from one instruction is supplied in others, the error is harmless.

The omission of a necessary element from one instruction is not reversible error, provided it is supplied in other instructions.

14. Trial ⚡296(1)—Incorrect statement of law as to material issue will not be cured by correct statement in another instruction, where error might have been prejudicial.

An incorrect statement of the law as to a material issue which appears to have been prejudicial will not be cured by a correct statement of the law in another instruction, since it cannot be determined which statement controlled the jury.

15. Negligence  82—"Contributory negligence" is act of plaintiff amounting to want of ordinary care co-operating with defendant's negligence to proximately cause injury.

"Contributory negligence" is such act or omission by plaintiff amounting to a want of ordinary care as, concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of a defendant, was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Anna Gaster against A. B. Hinkley. Verdict for defendant. From an order granting a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pierce & Carlson, of Richmond, and Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial after a verdict had been secured in favor of the defendant.

On the motion for a new trial the respondent contended that certain instructions which were given at the request of the appellant were erroneous and therefore warranted the granting of a new trial; but the chief question involved on this appeal is whether in view of the evidence the trial judge abused his discretion in granting the new trial.

On November 8, 1923, at about 8 o'clock p. m., the defendant was driving his Essex coupé automobile from Richmond toward Oakland along San Pablo avenue. It was a rainy night. There was a double line of street car tracks along this avenue. Seated upon defendant's right on the front seat was his friend Shroeder. Defendant's wife and Mrs. Shroeder occupied the rear seat. All agreed they were traveling about 15 miles an hour, with the machine running over the westerly rail of the street car track.

The plaintiff, who is an elderly lady, had been shopping at a grocery store on the westerly side of San Pablo avenue at its intersection with Thirtieth street. With a number of small parcels under her left arm she went to the crossing where she stopped at the westerly street line for a few moments waiting for the traffic to pass. Southerly from the intersection of these streets, some 50 feet distant, was an excavation in the easterly portion of the street, 18 or 20 feet from the easterly curb. This hole was about four feet square and was inclosed with a fence. A pile of dirt 5 feet in depth lay upon the pavement about the hole. This mound of dirt extended to within 3 or 4 feet of the easterly rail and so far toward the east as to leave scant room for a vehicle to pass between it and the easterly curb. Lighted lanterns were placed as a warning upon this obstruction.

After the traffic had passed, the plaintiff crossed to the center of the street and stood between the two tracks, where she waited a moment for the passing of an automobile on the easterly side, which was going toward Richmond. She then looked northerly, and before continuing on her way she turned again and looked southerly toward Oakland. At this instant another car came from the south and in passing the dump of dirt in the street it suddenly swerved toward her. She stepped back to avoid this car and was instantly struck by the left fender of defendant's car, which was traveling southerly near the center of the street. The plaintiff was hurled to the pavement and sustained severe injuries consisting of a fractured left leg, three broken ribs, an injured spine, and numerous bruises and contusions about the body. She was taken by the defendant to an emergency hospital and remained under a doctor's care for several months.

The defendant's story of the affair was substantially corroborated by all of the occupants of his car. No other witness observed the immediate accident. The defendant testified that he and his wife had driven to Richmond for their friends, Mr. and Mrs. Shroeder, and that they were returning to Oakland along San Pablo avenue about 8 o'clock p. m.; that it was raining lightly and the pavement was wet, but that his view of the street was not obscured. He said that they were traveling 15 miles an hour "astride of the western rail," and testified:

That "as we neared the intersection of Thirtieth street I noticed a woman standing * * * between the two rails. * * * When I first saw the woman she was between 30 and 40 feet from me. Shortly after that a car coming from Oakland in this vicinity suddenly swerved to the left. * * * Immediately upon the swerving of this car, the woman stepped backward, and before I could turn my car to the right, she had come in contact with the left * * * bumper or fender, and fell to * * * the street."

He then testified that he stopped the car within 15 or 20 feet, and returning took the injured lady to the hospital for treatment.

In spite of the fact that the defendant saw the plaintiff standing in the center of the street dangerously near the exact line in which he was traveling and 30 or 40 feet ahead of him, he neither sounded his horn as a warning, nor changed his course, although the street was unobstructed upon his right. In this regard the following testimony was adduced:

"Q. Why didn't you turn your car to the right when you were 30 feet away? A. The lady had crossed my path. I had a well-defined path astride the rail. She was facing the other way, and had apparently crossed my path and was going on. I saw no reason why I should swerve my car. * * *

"Q. Why did you not blow your horn? A. * * * I partly thought it would confuse the lady, and I saw no reason for blowing my horn. * * *

"Q. How far away from the lady were you when you swerved to the right? A. The lady had either come in contact with my car, or I was so close to her that I could not. * * * I attempted to swerve it, but I did not succeed before she came in contact with the car."

[1] It will be observed that the defendant testified that he was traveling only 15 miles per hour, and that he plainly saw the plaintiff standing between the tracks 30 or 40 feet ahead of his car. For the purpose of impeachment he was asked if he did not tell a police inspector by the name of Powers, at the hospital the night of the accident, that he was running 20 miles an hour at the time of the accident and that he did not see the plaintiff until he struck her. He emphatically denied talking with the inspector or telling him either that he was traveling 20 miles an hour, or that he did not see the plaintiff until he struck her. The inspector, Powers, was then called, and testified positively that he did talk with the defendant at the time and place mentioned, and that the defendant then told him he was traveling 20 miles an hour and did not see the lady until he struck her. This was a flat contradiction upon material testimony and was competent for the trial court to consider upon a motion for a new trial.

One witness for plaintiff testified that immediately prior to the accident the defendant was running 25 or 30 miles an hour. Several witnesses testified that the plaintiff was picked up seventy-five or eighty feet southerly of the point where she was struck. This was not only in conflict with defendant's evidence but furnishes some proof which tends to show that he was driving at an unlawful rate of speed.

Much of the trial was devoted to an attempt to prove that the plaintiff sustained serious and permanent injuries as a result of the accident, while, upon the contrary, the defendant made a strenuous effort to refute this showing. To this end much time was consumed in examining physicians as expert witnesses. For the purpose of thus contradicting plaintiff, Dr. Irwin was called by the defendant. He had examined the plaintiff at his office three or four weeks prior to the trial, and testified to facts generally discrediting plaintiff's claim that she was seriously and permanently injured. He testified that she told him she had come alone to his office; that he did not see her son at his office; that she then walked without the aid of a cane, and with approximately 50 per cent. more ease and apparent comfort than she appeared to exhibit in her effort to walk before the jury during the trial. The plain inference which was conveyed by this evidence on the part of the doctor was that the plaintiff was feigning more serious results from the accident than she really suffered, although he denied this inference. Nevertheless, it is apparent that his evidence would have a potent influence to prejudice the jury against the plaintiff, provided his testimony was given full credit. Undoubtedly it would create the impression that she was fraudulently trying to deceive the jury and would therefore be likely to result in their discrediting and rejecting her testimony. Both the plaintiff and her son contradicted the doctor, saying that they went together to his office; that the son personally entered the presence of the doctor on that occasion; and that the plaintiff did not tell him she had come alone to his office.

[2, 3] This court does not pretend to pass upon the credibility of witnesses, nor to determine which version of the story was correct. There was, however, a sharp conflict with respect to material facts which it was competent for the trial court to consider upon a motion for new trial.

[4] In passing upon the question of whether there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge in granting the motion for a new trial, the entire state of the record should be considered, including the effort to impeach both the defendant and the doctor. If this evidence, taken as a whole, was favorable to plaintiff, or was such as to cause reasonable and unbiased minds to arrive at contrary conclusions as to the merits of the cause, then the discretion of the trial judge in granting the new trial will not be disturbed. Merralls v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 19, 22, 186 P. 778.

[5, 6] While the evidence on the part of plaintiff furnished little proof of negligence on the part of the defendant, yet the defendant's own testimony supplied proof of conduct dangerously close to what might amount to a lack of ordinary care and prudence. On appeal from an order granting a new trial, the appellate court is not called upon to pass on the weight of evidence, but to determine only whether there is substantial evidence in the record supporting the conclusions of the trial court in granting the new trial. The granting of a new trial rests largely in the discretion of the trial court. 2 Cal. Jur. 905, § 533; Quinn v. Kenyon, 22 Cal. 82.

[7, 8] If the weight of the evidence preponderates against the verdict, it is the duty of the trial judge to set it aside. Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 506, 509, 123 P. 288; Warner v. Thomas Parisian Dyeing & Cleaning Works, 105 Cal. 409, 38 P. 960. If the evidence is conflicting, and it does not appear that the trial judge abused his discretion in granting a new trial, his order will not be disturbed on appeal. Butler v. Miller, 69 Cal. App. 586, 231 P. 1007.

"Before the plaintiff can recover in this action, it must appear to your satisfaction that the defendant was guilty of some act of negligence which directly contributed to the accident. It must also appear to your satisfaction that the plaintiff was without fault or negligence on her part which might in any wise have contributed to the accident."

[12-14] Standing alone, this instruction was erroneous. The burden of proving the contributory negligence of the plaintiff rested upon the defendant. Not only must it appear that plaintiff was guilty of a lack of ordinary care for her own safety under the circumstances of the case, but also that this negligence contributed directly and proximately to the injuries which she sustained. Gett v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 192 Cal. 621, 631, 221 P. 376; 19 Cal. Jur. 649. To instruct the jury that it was only necessary that plaintiff's negligence should contribute "in any wise" to the injuries which she sustained falls far short of the well-established rule that it must directly and proximately contribute to the injuries sustained. However, the jury was elsewhere fully and correctly instructed as to all the necessary elements constituting contributory negligence. All of the instructions must be read together, and construed as a whole. 24 Cal. Jur. 857, § 113. The omission of a necessary element from one instruction is not reversible error, provided it is supplied in other instructions. But an incorrect declaration of the law as to a material issue, which appears to have been prejudicial, will not be cured by a correct statement of the law in another instruction for the reason that it is impossible to determine which controlled the jury. 2 Cal. Jur. 1027, § 611; Cooper v. Spring Valley Water Co., 16 Cal. App. 17, 25, 116 P. 298; Brown v. McAllister, 39 Cal. 573; Sappenfield v. Main St. & A. P. R. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 59, 27 P. 590. In Chidester v. Consolidated People's Ditch Co., 53 Cal. 56, an instruction was held to be erroneous which declared that the defendant was liable for damages "resulting either directly or remotely from the negligence of the defendant," and was not cured by the subsequent giving of another instruction correctly stating that he was liable only for such negligence as proximately caused the damage, for the reason that it was "impossible to determine on which of these (instructions) the jury acted."

[15] In the instant case the following instructions which were given correctly stated the law on that subject:

(a) "Contributory negligence is such an act or omission on the part of the plaintiff amounting to a want of ordinary care as, concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of a defendant, was the proximate cause of the injury complained of;" and (b) "if the plaintiff was herself negligent and her negligence proximately contributed to her injuries, then she cannot recover. * * *

Since the record in this case will not warrant an interference with the discretion exercised by the trial court in granting a new trial, because of the serious conflict of material evidence, it becomes unnecessary to determine whether the giving of the erroneous instruction above quoted was prejudicial error.

For the foregoing reasons, the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

CENTRAL PAC. RY. CO. v. COSTA et al.
Board of Sup'rs. (Civ. 3243.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 26, 1927.

1. Counties ⇐—"Counties" are governmental agencies, powers and functions of which have direct and exclusive reference to general policy of state.

"Counties," as political entities or subdivisions of state, are governmental agencies, all powers and functions of which have direct and exclusive reference to general policy of state, and are but branch of general administration of that policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, County.]

2. Constitutional law ⇐63(2)—State may, except where people have not restricted such power, delegate to counties functions belonging to it and take back functions delegated.

State may, through Legislature and in exercise of sovereign power and will, in all cases where people themselves have not restricted or qualified such exercise of that power, apportion and delegate to counties any of functions belonging to it, and may take back and itself resume exercise of certain functions which it had delegated.

3. Constitutional law ⇐284(1)—Statute providing for cancellation of assessments where property is taxed by two counties without regard to location of property is not unconstitutional as depriving county in which property is situated of property without due process of law (Pol. Code, § 3804b).

Pol. Code, § 3804b, providing in effect that, where real property has been assessed by two or more counties for same year and owner has paid one assessment, assessments by other counties should be canceled, regardless of whether property is situated in that county or not, held not unconstitutional as depriving county in which property is situated of property without due process of law, since state in dealing with matters appertaining to administration of governmental affairs of counties deals with itself.

4. Statutes $\S$ 245—Taxation $\S$ 480—Proceeding to obtain relief from double taxation by different counties must substantially follow statute, but statute should be liberally construed (Pol. Code, $\S$ 3804b).

Proceeding, under Pol. Code, $\S$ 3804b, to obtain relief from double taxation by different counties must substantially follow statute, but reasonable liberality in construction of statute establishing such proceeding should be rule to end that owner of property subject to taxation may not be compelled to pay more than is justly due from him to government.

5. Statutes $\S$ 245—In construing tax statute, obvious intention and meaning of Legislature should be given effect where language permits it.

In construction of statutes relating to taxes, obvious intention and meaning of Legislature should be given effect where language will permit it, rather than adhere too strictly to letter, and any leaning in case should be in direction of presumption that everything is expressed in tax laws which was intended to be expressed.

6. Limitation of actions $\S$ 1—Object of statutes of limitations is to suppress fraudulent and stale claims from springing up at great distances of time.

Statutes of limitations are statutes of repose, object of which is to suppress fraudulent and stale claims from springing up at great distances of time and surprising parties or their representatives when all proper vouchers and evidences are lost, or facts have become obscure from lapse of time or defective memory or death or removal of witnesses.

7. Limitation of actions $\S$ 12(2)—Taxation $\S$ 480—Proceeding to compel county to cancel assessment on property assessed by another county, nearly 6 years after statute providing relief from such double taxation took effect, held not barred by statute or laches (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 343, and $\S$ 338, subd. 1; Pol. Code, $\S$ 3804b).

Where petitioner filed petition with board of supervisors of county to have assessment and certificates of sale of lands and deeds to state of property, also assessed by another county to which petitioner had paid taxes, canceled, and board refused to cancel, as provided by Pol. Code, $\S$ 3804b, mandamus proceeding to compel board to cancel assessment and deeds nearly 6 years after section 3804b took effect, though assessments were made long before, held not barred by statutes of limitations, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 343, and section 338, subd. 1, or by laches.

8. Equity $\S$ 67—Laches is analogous to statute of limitations as applicable to actions at law.

Laches is an equitable defense and is analogous to statute of limitations as applicable to actions at law.

9. Equity $\S$ 72(1)—Party pleading "laches" must show that he has or will suffer substantial prejudice by long delay in bringing action.

One of essentials of defense of "laches" is that party pleading it must show that he has suffered, or will suffer substantial prejudice by long delay in bringing action or suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Laches.]

10. Taxation $\S$ 497—Petitioner held entitled to writ compelling county to cancel assessment on property taxed by another county and tax deeds to state (Pol. Code, $\S$ 3804b).

Where lands were assessed in Nevada county and petitioner paid taxes, and lands were assessed for same year in Sierra county, and on default of owner to pay taxes lands were sold to state by Sierra county, and petitioner in due legal time presented with tax receipts from Nevada county petition to board of supervisors of Sierra county, praying cancellation of assessments as provided by Pol. Code, $\S$ 3804b, and board refused to grant application for cancellation of assessments and certificates of sale, petitioner held entitled to writ of mandate to compel cancellation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; W. I. Redding, Judge.

Mandamus proceeding by the Central Pacific Railway Company against August Costa and others, as members of and constituting the Board of Supervisors of Sierra County, to compel the cancellation of certain assessments of taxes upon real property and certificates of sale of said lands and any deeds to the state. From a judgment denying the relief, petitioner appeals. Reversed with directions.

H. W. Hobbs, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry B. Neville, of Downieville, for respondents.

HART, J. The petitioner Railway Company petitioned the court below for an alternative writ of mandate to compel the respondents, as members of and constituting the board of supervisors of the county of Sierra, to enter upon the minutes of said board an order directing the auditor of said county to cancel certain assessments of taxes levied upon certain real property of petitioner, and further, to cancel the certificates of sale of said lands and "any deeds to the state executed in pursuance of said sale," or to show cause why they have not done so upon applications theretofore made by petitioner to the respondents for such cancellation.

The sales of the real property described in this proceeding were to the state (Pol. Code, $\S$ 3771) for delinquent taxes assessed thereon by the county of Sierra for the years 1899, 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1908.

The trial judge set forth the reasons for the denial of the relief prayed for by petitioner in a written opinion, which was filed by him, and which opinion is printed in the transcript. A statement of the case and the issues submitted by the pleadings (the petition and the answer or return) is correctly set forth in said opinion as follows:

"This is an application for writ of mandate commanding the board of supervisors of Sierra county to enter an order upon the minutes of said board directing the auditor of said county to cancel certain purported double assessments of the property of petitioner.

"It is alleged by petitioner that, at all times mentioned in the petition, it was the owner of certain tracts of land described by legal subdivisions; that for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1899, the county of Nevada, acting by and through its duly constituted officers, assessed for state, county, and school purposes certain tracts of said lands of petitioner; that petitioner has paid all of the taxes levied and assessed thereon by the county of Nevada; that for said fiscal year commencing July 1, 1899, the county of Sierra, acting by and through its duly constituted officers, assessed for state, county, and school purposes the same tracts of said lands of petitioner; and that petitioner failed to pay said taxes so assessed by the said county of Sierra, and said lands were sold to the state of California on July 2, 1900.

"The petition contains similar allegations regarding various tracts of the said lands of petitioner, which were assessed by Nevada county for the fiscal years commencing July 1, 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1908 and by the county of Sierra for the same years; and it is alleged that petitioner has paid all of the taxes levied upon said lands by the county of Nevada for each and all of said years, but failed to pay the taxes levied by Sierra county for any of said years, and that the lands so assessed by Sierra county have been sold to the state.

"It is further alleged that on or about the 2d day of July, 1923, petitioner filed with respondents, as members of and constituting the board of supervisors of the county of Sierra, its application in writing that said board of supervisors make and enter upon its minutes orders directing the auditor to cancel said assessments, so made by the county of Sierra, by entries on the margin of the assessment book and also upon the delinquent list, should such assessments be carried therein, and directing the recorder to cancel the certificates of sale and deeds to the state; that with each of said applications, petitioner presented to and filed with respondents a certificate signed by the auditor of Nevada county, stating that the lands described in said applications had been assessed for taxes for the fiscal years in question, and that all of said taxes had been paid, as required by section 3804b of the Political Code.

"And it is finally alleged that respondents have wholly refused and neglected and do continue to refuse and neglect to make and enter in their minutes the orders so applied for, and that said tax sales appear to be valid on their face and constitute clouds upon the title of petitioner to said lands, and that petitioner has no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law.

"In their answer to the petition, respondents 'admit each, every, and all of the averments of the petition of petitioner in its petition set forth.'

"The respondents aver in their answer that during all the times mentioned in the petition, prior to the 1st day of March, 1909 the lands described in the petition and the whole thereof were situated within the exterior boundaries of Sierra county and at all such times were a portion of the territory of said county; that the taxes levied upon said lands of petitioner by the county of Sierra, as stated and set forth in said petition, became, were and still are the property of and are now due and payable to the county of Sierra and the state of California as the interest of each appears. It is further averred that petitioner has been guilty of laches and unreasonable delay in making its applications to have said assessments canceled, and that by reason of said laches respondents and their predecessors in office have been and are deprived of the opportunity and right to litigate and have determined the claims of said county of Sierra relative to said assessments and the taxes accruing therefrom.

"Respondents also plead, in their answer, the defense that the cause of action set forth in petitioner's petition is barred by subdivision 1 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure and by section 343 of the same Code.

"Petitioner's applications for orders canceling said assessments and its petition in this proceeding are based upon that portion of section 3804b of the Political Code, reading as follows:

"Where real property has heretofore been assessed by the assessors of two or more counties for the same year and the owner thereof has paid all of the taxes on one of such assessments, upon proof of the payment of such taxes on one of such assessments for any year, by the production of a tax receipt or certificate of the auditor of the county in which such payment has been made, the board of supervisors of any other county claiming the right to assess and tax such real property, shall thereupon enter an order upon its minutes directing the auditor to cancel such double assessment of such property by an entry on the margin of the assessment book, as also upon the delinquent list, should double assessment be carried therein. If the property assessed under such double assessment has been sold to the state and a certificate of sale or deed therefor has been issued to the state, the order of the board shall further direct the recorder to cancel such erroneous certificate and deed so issued except where the state has disposed of the property thereby conveyed.'

"Said section was added to the Political Code in 1917 and took effect July 27th of that year, but petitioner did not apply to respondents for the cancellation of said assessments until nearly 6 years thereafter, to wit, on July 2, 1923.

"Petitioner contends, however, that its cause of action—its right to commence and prosecute this proceeding—did not accrue until it had applied to the respondents for the orders of cancellation of the assessments in question, and, therefore, that it has not been guilty of laches, and that the statute of limitations had not run against it at the time of the institution of his proceeding."

The petition does not state, either directly or indirectly, that the lands involved herein are not situated within the boundaries of Sierra county. On the other hand, as will be observed from that part of the trial judge's opinion herein above presented, the answer or return alleges that said lands and all and every part thereof are and were, at the times of the assessment and sale thereof to the state, on account of delinquency on the part of the owner in the payment of the taxes thereon for the years stated in the petition, situated within the boundaries of the said county. No evidence was received at the hearing of the proceeding, hence the judgment is founded upon the facts as they were stated in and admitted by the pleadings (the petition and the answer or return thereto) and is in effect a judgment on the pleadings. The court, nevertheless, specifically found that all of the material allegations of the petition are true, but concluded, as a matter of law, that:

"The petitioner is not entitled to a writ of mandate as prayed in the petition because its right is barred by the statute of limitations, and also by laches, and that respondents are entitled to a judgment dismissing the proceeding and awarding them costs."

The petitioner appeals from the judgment.

For the purpose of this decision, it is to be accepted as a fact in this case that said lands are and were at all times referred to in the petition situated within the boundaries of Sierra county. It is further to be accepted as established facts in this case that said lands, in the years named in the petition, were assessed and taxes thereon levied for county purposes by the county of Nevada, and that the petitioner paid to Nevada county the taxes so assessed and levied by said county for the years referred to.

While it is true, as is stated in that part of the opinion of the trial judge hereinabove reproduced, that the respondents, in addition to setting up the defense of laches and the bar of the statute of limitations against the right of the petitioner to maintain the proceeding inaugurated by its petition herein, also have expressly set up in their answer the plea, or more accurately speaking, have expressly interposed the proposition, as in impeachment of the right claimed by the petitioner to the relief it seeks to obtain by this proceeding, that those provisions of section 3804b of the Political Code, according to which the petitioner has proceeded herein, would, if given application in harmony with the prayer of the petition, have the effect of depriving the county of Sierra of a property right, to wit, the taxes assessed or levied on said lands, without due process of law. The court, however, in deciding the case, ignored the last-stated proposition, and the district attorney, in his brief filed herein, has not referred thereto, from which it may be assumed that he has abandoned or surrendered the point. For this reason, further notice herein of the point could be waived, a rule which the courts of appeal are strongly inclined to follow unless, perhaps, the point presents a proposition of law peculiarly vital to the decision and which, upon its face, is plainly subject to debatable considerations.

But, since said section is a comparatively new legislative enactment and authorizes a proceeding for the relief of a property owner from the effect of a double tax on his property, and, furthermore since, so far as we are advised to the contrary, the appeal courts of this state have thus far not been afforded an occasion for considering the section or inquiring into the question (if it be a question) whether it is consistent with the constitutional authority of the Legislature to enact or pass such a measure into law, it is deemed not improper to give to the legislation involved in the act, with respect to the question whether its enactment constituted a competent exercise of legislative power, some consideration herein.

It will readily be noted, upon reading section 3804b of the Political Code, that said section requires the board of supervisors of a county in any case to which its provisions and obvious purpose are appropriate, and where application is made by the owner of real property to such board for relief under and in pursuance of the provisions thereof, to direct a cancellation of the assessment levied, regardless of whether such property is or is not situated in the county wherein such application is made. In other words, as the statute reads, the situs of the real property is an immaterial consideration, and, therefore, upon the filing of the application for the cancellation of the assessment by the owner with the required proof that he has paid to another county taxes on the same property for the same year, upon an assessment thereof by such other county, there is no alternative left to the board of supervisors of the county in which such application and proof have been made but to order the auditor of such county to cancel the assessment on such property. It is upon this proposition that the respondents contended in the court below that section 3804b of the Political Code, as so applied, and as it was obviously intended to be applied, will operate to deprive Sierra county of its just taxes on the lands involved without due process of law.

Obviously the act, in its nature and purpose, is remedial. It gives to the owner of real property, circumstanced with reference to the assessment of such property for revenue raising purposes as the act contemplates, a remedy whereby he may, by a summary proceeding before the supervisors (and not before the courts), relieve himself from an unequal and unjust tax burden. And the legislation involved in the act is consistent with and in furtherance of the ends of the positive policy of the state to discountenance and disallow any act or course of official conduct on the part of the state or its agents charged with the administration of the fiscal or revenue system of the state which would result in or lead to the imposition upon real property owners of a tax burden amounting to double taxation.

It is no doubt true that, prior to the enactment of section 3804b of the Political Code, there were available to the owners of real property a number of different remedies, the election of which was or is governable by the circumstances peculiar to the particular case, whereby such property owners were or are enabled to relieve themselves from the illegal burden of double taxation brought about by such conditions as furnished the legislative motive for the enactment into law the provisions contained in said section. These remedies, though, when resorted to or invoked, pertain or are solely appropriate to judicial proceedings, and, when thus called into action, are usually attended by the expense, the inconvenience, and the delay in securing the final judicial adjudications of the questions involved incidental to the litigation of contested questions of property rights before the courts. Instances of double taxation due to disputed county boundary lines are not wanting. The present case, as we may infer from the briefs, furnishes such an instance. See County of Sierra v. County of Nevada, 155 Cal. 1, 99 P. 371. Other such cases, as we know as a matter of common knowledge, have arisen in the history of California, in which the excess tax following from the assessment of the same lands for the same years by two different counties, each county proceeding upon the assumption that such lands were situated within its exterior boundaries, thereby imposing upon the lands an illegal tax burden, and in which the amount involved was so small as to make it not worth the time, trouble, and expense to litigate and so secure an adjustment or adjudication of the matter in an appropriate proceeding by the courts. But, in such instances, if one of the assessments be not nullified, or if both assessments be enforced, the state would receive and retain a larger amount of taxes upon such lands than it would be entitled to, and at the same time the state itself would be forced or involuntarily driven into the position of impinging upon its own policy of equality, or as near equality as is reasonably practicable in the distribution of the burdens of government among property owners within its borders. Such a situation, it may be repeated, might have occurred, and in all probability has occurred, in some cases, prior to the enactment by the Legislature of 1917 of section 3804b, providing a summary and simple and inexpensive and convenient remedy for relief in instances such as we have before us now. Furthermore, since, as we have seen, said section (where there have arisen the circumstances which call for its actual application) plainly contemplates that it is the imperative duty of the board of supervisors to which application for relief under the section is made in the manner required thereby to direct the auditor to cancel the assessment, etc., without regard to whether the lands affected are or are not situated within the county in which such application is filed, the remedy thus provided can be no less efficacious in the matter of safeguarding the rights of all the parties than would be any remedy which may be afforded for securing the identical relief through the courts. Conceivably, by the foregoing considerations the Legislature of 1917 was moved to enact said section, and so make it one of the constituents of the fiscal system of the state.

[1, 2] The discussion thus far has proceeded upon the assumption that the fiscal affairs of counties are nothing less than the fiscal affairs of the state itself. This assumption, however, is more than a mere assumption or supposition. It is a postulate to which assent must without qualification yield; for, as has often been reiterated by the cases, these propositions may be set down as fundamental, or at least so thoroughly established as to be entirely removed from the field of speculation or the realms of legitimate controversy:

"(1) That counties, as political entities or subdivisions of the state, are governmental agencies, all the powers and functions of which have a direct and exclusive reference to the general policy of the state, and are, in fact, but a branch of the general administration of that policy. 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations. (5th Ed.) § 35; County of Sacramento v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 142, 146, 164 P. 613; County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 636, 63 P. 78, 621; Reclamation Dist. No. 1500 v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 672, 679, 154 P. 845; Dillwood v. Riecks, 42 Cal. App. 602, 607, 184 P. 35. (2) That, as a corollary of the foregoing proposition, 'the state may, through its Legislature, and in the exercise of its sovereign power and will, in all cases where the people themselves have not restricted or qualified such exercise of that power, apportion and delegate to the counties any of the functions which belong to it,' and, 'on the other hand, the state may take back and itself resume the exercise of certain functions which it had delegated to those local agencies.' County of Sacramento v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 149, 164 P. 616."

See Reclamation District v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 672, 679, 680, 154 P. 845; Watson v. Greely, 67 Cal. App. 328, 337, 227 P. 664.

The case of Reclamation District v. Superior Court, supra, is illuminating upon the subject in hand, and thus it speaks in the language of Mr. Justice Sloss:

"The public building, roads, and bridges of a county are not the private property of the county in such sense as to authorize the county to object to the taking or damaging thereof by the state for public purposes. The counties are governmental agencies of the state (County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 631, 63 P. 78, 621), and the property intrusted to their governmental management is public property. The proprietary interest in all such property belongs to the public, and if there be a legal title in the county, it is a title held in trust for the whole public (Board of Education v. Martin, 92 Cal. 209, 28 P. 799; People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 241, 29 P. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186; Heffner v. Cass & Morgan

Counties, 193 Ill. 439, 62 N. E. 201, 58 L. R. A. 353. In the absence of constitutional restrictions, the Legislature has full control of the property held by the counties as agencies of the state, and may dispose of that property without the consent of the county or without compensating it. City of Edwardsville v. County of Madison, 251 Ill. 265, 96 N. E. 238, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 101. Upon analogous principles, it has been established by a long line of decisions, in this state as well as elsewhere, that, except as restrained by constitutional limitations, the Legislature may alter the boundaries and extent of counties at will, may consolidate two or more into one, or divide and create new counties out of the territory of counties already existent. 'Upon the creation of a new county out of the territory of another, the Legislature, in the absence of constitutional restrictions, may make such provision with reference to the public property and debts, or their division, as to it may seem just. * * *' Los Angeles County v. Orange County, 97 Cal. 329, 32 P. 316; Orange County v. Los Angeles County, 114 Cal. 390, 46 P. 173; Tulare County v. Kings County, 117 Cal. 195, 49 P. 8; *Colusa County v. See, also, cases cited in footnotes following section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution, p. 704 et seq., of Treadwell's fifth edition of the state's organic law.

It is thus readily to be seen that, when the state, through its Legislature, deals with the governmental affairs of counties, it deals with itself. As would be so in the case of principal and agent, as that relation is understood in the law governing contracts between private parties, the state may at any time, except in those instances in which the people themselves have in their Constitution interdicted legislative interference, confer upon or withdraw from the counties such of its sovereign powers as it may deem essential to the proper or convenient administration of its sovereign authority and duties. In line with this firmly established principle, the people have by their Constitution conferred upon the Legislature unlimited power in matters of taxation, except as restricted by the Constitution.

"This is one of the attributes of sovereignty which the people have placed in its [the Legislature's] hands; and they have intrusted its exercise to its discretion, either in the manner or to the extent to which it is to be applied. * * * For the purpose of apportioning this benefit, the Legislature may determine in advance what property will be benefited, by designating the district within which it is to be collected, as well as the property upon which it is to be imposed, or it may appoint a commission or delegate to a subordinate agency the power to ascertain the extent of this benefit. It may itself declare that the entire state is benefited, and authorize the burden to be borne by a public tax, or it may declare that all or a portion of the property within a limited region is benefited, either according to its value or in proportion to its actual benefit, to be specifically ascertained by actual determination of officers appointed therefor." In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 324, 325, 28 P. 272, 279 (14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106); Const. art. 13, § 1.

[3] It is hardly necessary to say, in view of the principles above considered, and which are so well established as of the essence of our governmental polity that the doctrine of "due process of law" can have no application to any case growing out of section 3804b of the Political Code. As stated, the state, in dealing with matters appertaining to the administration of the governmental affairs of counties, deals with itself. As also in effect stated, the dominant thought at the bottom of section 3804b is to insure owners of property situated within the state unmolested enjoyment of their constitutional right to be protected against double taxation, and, as the state, in said section, seeks merely but justly to correct its own wrongs or those of its agents committed while engaged in fixing the tax burdens which must in particular years be borne by such property owners, the mode thus devised itself squares sufficiently with the juridical concept of the doctrine of "due process," etc., assuming, and only assuming, that that doctrine has any application to such proceedings as are authorized by the act in question.

We now come to the consideration of the proposition upon which the trial court planted its decision, to wit, that the proceeding in mandate instituted by the petitioner was barred by the statute of limitations and also by laches. Neither in its findings nor its conclusion of law does the court specifically declare by what particular provisions of the statute of limitations this action or proceeding in mandamus is barred. It will be noted, though, that the answer sets up section 338, subd. 1, and section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as in bar of the several causes of actions set forth in the petition, and the discussion of the points thus made by respondents by the court in its written opinion indicates that it was upon section 338 that the court below based its conclusion that the several causes of action pleaded in the petition were barred.

Section 338, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, declares that "an action upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture," shall be commenced within three years (after the cause of action shall have accrued—see section 312 of said Code).

Section 343 provides:

"An action for relief not hereinbefore provided for must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued."

Respondents, in their brief, as did the trial court in its written opinion, proceeding upon the hypothesis that the relief herein demanded "is based upon a liability created by statute," contend, as the court held, contrary to the position of petitioner that its right to commence this proceeding did not arise until the demand for the cancellation of the assessments was made to the board of supervisors, that, as to the present proceeding, the statute of limitations began to run from the time of the operative effect of section 3804b of the Political Code. In other words, the theory of the decision below is that petitioner's right to the relief herein sought accrued on the 27th day of July, 1917—the effective date of section 3804b of the Political Code—and that, while the petitioner was required to file its demand and proof of payment of taxes on the lands in question for the years designated in the petition with the board of supervisors before it would be entitled to the writ herein sought, such filing was "merely a step in the enforcement of petitioner's remedy," which became available to it immediately upon the going into effect of said section, and should have been invoked within the period of time prescribed by the statute of limitations appropriate to such a case as this. This conclusion, it is asserted, is supported by the following cases: Harby v. Board of Education, 2 Cal. App. 418, 83 P. 1081; People v. Cal. Safe Deposit & Trust Co., 41 Cal. App. 727, 731, 183 P. 289; Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 1, 8, 48 P. 804, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153; County of San Luis Obispo v. Gage et al., 139 Cal. 398, 404, 73 P. 174; Wittman v. Board of Police Commissioners, 19 Cal. App. 229, 231, 232, 125 P. 265; Jones v. Board of Police Commissioners, 141 Cal. 96, 97, 74 P. 696.

In Harby v. Board of Education a writ of mandate was petitioned for, and directed to, the board of education of the city of San Francisco, to compel said board to restore petitioner to the position of vice principal of a grammar school of said city, from which position she had, over 3 years previous to the application for the writ, been removed by said board. A demurrer to the petition upon the general ground and on the further ground that the proceeding was barred by section 338, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, was sustained. On appeal, the judgment was sustained upon the ground that the action was barred by the provisions of said section 338, subd. 1. The wrong, if any, committed against the petitioner in that case was in the act of removal by the board of education, and, thereupon, and immediately, there accrued to her as against the board a right of action to have the wrong, if any, redressed, or to have restored any right of which thus she had been deprived. No demand upon the board of education to restore her to the position was required to entitle her to appeal to the courts for relief. The same is true (and, in line with the Harby Case, the Supreme Court so held) in the cases of Wittman v. Board of Police Commissioners and Jones v. Police Commissioners. In those cases the petitioners were by the commissioners removed from membership of the police department of the city of San Francisco, in the first-named case the chief of police and in the last-named, a patrolman. In each of those cases, a period of over 3 years elapsed between the date of the act of removal and the date upon which the petitioner applied for a writ of mandate to compel the board of police commissioners to restore the applicant for the writ to the position in the department from which he had been ousted. As stated, in each case, the Supreme Court, on appeal, properly held that the statute had run against the right of the petitioner to maintain the action. Obviously, those cases are no different from the ordinary cases in which the gist of the action is in some specific wrongful act, as for instance, where a contract has been breached or a tort committed, immediately upon the breach of the contract or the commission of the tortious act, a right of action accrues to the injured party against the wrongdoer.

The other cases cited by respondents and hereinabove named disclose a situation somewhat different from that of the three cases just briefly examined. In some of those cases a preliminary step by way of a demand upon some administrative or other body or tribunal to perform an act falling within the scope of the official duties thereof was required to be taken as a condition precedent to the right of the interested party to maintain an action against said body or tribunal to compel it to do or perform the act. One of said cases may be specially noticed herein as precisely illustrative of the position of respondents. In Barnes v. Glide, supra, the following language from Prescott v. Gonser, 34 Iowa, 179, is quoted and by that case approved:

"That the action of mandamus cannot be maintained until there has been a refusal to perform the official duty sought to be enforced is true, but to hold that a plaintiff who has a right to demand performance at any time may delay such demand indefinitely would enable him to defeat the object and purpose of the statute. It is certainly not the policy of the law to permit a party against whom the statute runs to defeat its operation by neglecting to do an act which devolves upon him in order to perfect his remedy against another. If this were so, a party would have it in his own power to defeat the purpose of the statute in all cases of this character. He could neglect to claim that to which he is entitled for even 50 years unaffected by the statute of limitations, thereby rendering it a dead letter."

The case of People v. Cal. Safe Dep. & Trust Co., particularly stressed here by respondents, involved a proceeding commenced on December 7, 1907, in the name of the people of the state of California on the complaint of the state bank commissioners, under the provisions of the Bank Act (St. 1903, p. 365, as amended St. 1905, p. 304), for the purpose of securing the appointment of a receiver for the liquidation of the affairs of the said Safe Deposit & Trust Company. A receiver was appointed by the court, and on July 28, 1917, while the proceeding was still pending, one Smith applied for and was granted leave by the court to file a petition in intervention to obtain judgment against the Trust Company for a large sum of money alleged to be due him upon certain contracts executed by the bank prior to the commencement of the proceeding. A demurrer was filed interposing, among others, the objection that the right to litigate the claim set up in the complaint in intervention was barred by section 337, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The petitioner in intervention contended that the running of the statute was suspended by reason of the receivership proceeding, and that the statute did not run for the reason that his proceeding in intervention "could have been maintained only by leave of the court first had and obtained"; that the running of the statute, therefore, began with the making of the order granting him leave to intervene. The trial court sustained the demurrer on the ground that the intervention or any right of petitioner to maintain an action for the enforcement of the indebtedness of the bank to him was barred by the section of the Code named in the demurrer. The case being appealed, the appellate court affirmed the judgment, holding and declaring (as it could not logically otherwise be held) that petitioner's cause of action accrued to him prior to the application for leave to intervene—that "the statute commences to run from the time when the wrong complained of was done, and not from the time of obtaining leave to sue."

It is not necessary to refer specifically herein to the other cases cited by respondents upon the question in hand. We are satisfied that none of them is to be accepted as the criterion for the determination of that question in the instant case. They have application to the case at bar so far only as they hold that the statute appropriate to the particular case begins to run, as a general rule, from the date of the refusal by public officers to perform the act required of them as such officers by law. But the problem here is to be solved, not by analogy, but upon the solution of the question whether the Legislature intended that a taxpayer seeking relief under section 3804b should be limited as to the time within which to proceed, except the limitation which may be implied from the provision in the section that the application must be made before the lands affected are sold by the state.

We have seen that the established policy of the state is to make the burden of supporting the government as nearly equal as is possible (Const., art. 13, § 1), and that, in consequence of that policy, the design of the state, as evidenced by its revenue system, is to afford an owner of property upon which a double assessment has been levied for the same year and the same purpose—that is, for the support of the same government—legal means for securing relief from such double taxation in any case where it might occur. The section of the Political Code in question was, as is obvious, designed to afford a mode for such relief in a particular situation. When the state, through its Legislature, provides a scheme or procedure for the relief of property owners in such instances, it does not intend that the aggrieved property owner, when he finds it necessary to invoke the remedy for such relief thus provided for, shall be unreasonably hampered by the interposition of objections which are founded upon ultratechnical considerations.

[4] A proceeding established for the purpose of affording such relief must, of course, be substantially followed as the Legislature has created it. On the other hand, reasonable liberality in the construction of the statute establishing such proceeding should be the rule, to the end that the owner of property subject to taxation may not be compelled to pay more than is justly due from him to the government. And that it has ever been a matter of serious concern to the lawmaking department of the government that no person or set of persons should be discriminated against, either purposely or innocently, by the public officers charged with the levying and the collection of taxes for public purposes, is clearly evidenced by the numerous provisions of our revenue laws giving the taxpayer reasonable opportunity for preventing, as far as may be, the imposition upon him of a tax burden unequal and unjust, when compared to the like burden likewise imposed upon others, and also for preventing the sacrifice of his property for inconsiderable sums falling due as the result of delinquency in the payment of the tax imposed upon his property for the general purposes of the government. For instance, the board of supervisors of each county is required to meet at a stated time for a stated period in every year, to sit as a board of equalization for the purpose of hearing any complaints which may be made by taxpayers regarding the assessment of their property, and thus review, and correct, where inequality in the levy has been shown, the assessment as made and returned by the assessor. Again, even after real property has, by operation of law, been sold to the state by reason of delinquency upon the part of the owner in the payment of the tax assessed thereon, such owner, or any party in interest, is allowed 5 years from the date of such sale within which to redeem the property. Pol. Code, §§ 3780 and 3817. And so running all through our system of revenue laws are provisions clearly indicating that it is the policy of the state not only to apply, in distributing among property owners the burdens of taxation, the element of equality, as far as such equality may be practicable in the contrivement of a scheme for supplying the government with the requisite revenue which is always beset by great and sometimes insurmountable difficulties, but also to give to a delinquent taxpayer every reasonable opportunity, compatible with the just rights of the state in the premises, to redeem his property before it is finally sold by the state, perhaps, in some instances, far below its actual value. All these matters are mentioned for the purpose of showing that it was the design of the Legislature, in framing and enacting the state's revenue laws, to present a system which would fully conserve the just rights of the state in the matter of the collection of public revenues and at the same time afford like protection to taxpayers against oppressive exactions when required to respond to their duty to the government in that particular; that, to accomplish that important purpose, it was, and at all times is, the intention of the Legislature to establish, in substantially complete detail, the various steps to be taken, or the proceedings and the procedure to be followed, and not to leave any essential matter in connection therewith to inference or conjecture, or to be worked out by analogy, unless, in the latter case, the principle invoked is so near applicable to the instant situation as to justify adopting it where otherwise either the rights of the state or those of the taxpayers may be forfeited or lost.

[5] Of course, it is a settled rule in the construction of statutes relating to taxes, or which are designed for the raising of revenue for the support of the government, that the obvious intention and meaning of the Legislature should be given effect where the language will permit it, rather than to adhere too strictly to the letter, but, as is well said by Judge Cooley, in his work on Taxation (3d Ed.) pp. 363, 364:

"If there should be any leaning in such cases it would seem that it should be in the direction of the presumption that everything is expressed in the tax laws which was intended to be expressed. The laws are framed by the government for its own needs, and, if imperfections are found to exist, the Legislature, in the language of Mr. Dwaris, 'is at hand to explain its own meaning, and to express more clearly what has been obscurely expressed.' But there can be no propriety in construing such a law either with exceptional strictness amounting to hostility, or with exceptional favor beyond that accorded to other general laws. It is as unreasonable to sound a charge upon it as an enemy to individual and popular rights, as it is to seek for sophisticated reasons for grasping and holding by its authority every subject of taxation which the drag-net of the official force has brought within its supposed compass. The construction, without bias or prejudice, should seek the real intent of the law; and if the leaning is to strictness, it is only because it is fairly and justly presumable that the Legislature, which was unrestrained in its authority over the subject, has so shaped the law as, without ambiguity or doubt, to bring within it everything it was meant should be embraced."

[6, 7] It is not and will not be claimed, nor do the cases cited by respondents so hold, that the statute of limitations, as a part of our system of procedural law governing the trial and the disposition of actions and proceedings in courts of justice, has any application to proceedings of which boards of supervisors or other governing or administrative boards have cognizance by virtue of the laws creating them and fixing their duties and powers. Section 3804b does not itself fix any period of time within which the owner of real property doubly assessed for the same year and for the same purpose may proceed under its provisions, save and except that, as before pointed out, he must make his application and proof before the state has sold such property. Keeping in mind the animating principle of statutes limiting the period of time within which actions at law must be brought to save the right sought in such actions to be judicially asserted, it is difficult to reconcile the omission by the Legislature to provide specifically in section 3804b or in some other section of the general revenue laws a time limit within which a taxpayer may apply to the board of supervisors for the cancellation of the assessment of his real property upon which the taxes on an assessment levied on the same property for the same year and purpose have previously been paid, upon any other theory than that the state lawmaking body intended, ex industria, not to place any limitation upon the taxpayer in that respect other than the limitation to be implied from the provision contained in the section that he must apply to the board of supervisors for the relief afforded thereby before the property involved is sold by the state. The basic principle of statutes of limitations is that they are statutes of repose, "the object of which is to suppress fraudulent and stale claims from springing up at great distances of time and surprising the parties or their representatives when all proper vouchers and evidences are lost or the facts have become obscure from the lapse of time or the defective memory or death or removal of witnesses." 37 C. J. pp. 684-686. In the instant case, the tests appropriately admitting of a provision limiting the taxpayer to a specified period of time within which to initiate proceedings to secure the relief provided by section 3804b are wholly wanting. All the essential facts forming the foundation for the relief authorized by the section are permanent public records. No question of "obscurity of the facts" through the erosive influence of time or of death or removal of witnesses or of the treachery of human memory, can arise or enter into the proceeding. The facts may be shown as easily, readily, and accurately 20 years or more after the assessment and the sale have been made as they can be a month thereafter. This consideration is singularly significant when looking for the reason or reasons why the Legislature omitted to fix in the statute a time limit within which property owners aggrieved, as the section contemplates, should proceed to secure the relief afforded thereby. Besides all this, the prime desideratum, so far as the state is concerned in the matter of taxation, is to secure the payment of the taxes which constitute the revenue necessary for the support of its government, and, furthermore, as pointed out above, to enable the delinquent taxpayer to secure a return to him of his property.

[8, 9] The foregoing applies with equal cogency to the proposition, accepted by the trial court, that the right to have the assessments involved herein canceled is barred by laches. This is an equitable defense and is analogous to the statute of limitations as applicable to actions at law (and also under our present system—the reformed procedure—by virtue of statutory provisions applicable to suits in equity). But one of the essentials of the defense of laches is that the party pleading it must show that he has suffered or will suffer substantial prejudice by the long delay in bringing the action or suit. It is perfectly clear from what has already been said that no prejudice to the state can follow from the act of canceling an assessment which will result in imposing upon the owner of real property a double tax upon the same property for the same year and the same purpose. In fact, the fact itself of the enactment of section 3804b is a direct recognition by the state itself of the proposition that, rather than resulting in prejudice to it, the enforcement of the remedy thus afforded to property owners under the circumstances contemplated by the section will promote the ends of simple justice both to the state and such owners.

In addition to the considerations to which the discussion has thus far been confined, it may be suggested that, in the last analysis, the remedy provided by said section involves, in effect, nothing less than a summary mode for quieting the title or to remove a cloud from the title to the lands concerned. Indeed, it would seem to be logical to hold that, since it is plainly the intent of the section that the duty of the supervisors is to order the cancellation of an assessment subsisting upon real property which would, if enforced, have the effect of subjecting such property to double taxation for the same year and purpose, regardless of whether such property is or is not situated in the county in which such assessment has been levied, the owner of such land could maintain an action, at any time before a sale of such property is made by the state, to quiet the title thereto or to remove therefrom the cloud upon such title occasioned by such assessment, and, in such case, secure the relief so sought without being required, as a prerequisite thereto, as equity would under certain circumstances so require in cases of the same technical character, to pay the taxes embarrassing the title. But however that all may be, we are firmly persuaded that, for the reasons hereinabove set forth, the judgment is erroneous and must therefore be reversed.

[10] The court below, as has been shown, expressly found that all the facts stated in the petition for the writ herein sought were and are true. It therefore follows that the found and established facts in the case are: That the lands were assessed by the county of Sierra for county purposes and for the years designated in the petition and in due time on the default of the owner to pay the taxes on said assessments were sold to the state by said county; that the same lands were, for the same years and for the same purpose, assessed in the county of Nevada; that the petitioner paid to the last-named county all the taxes called for by the assessments levied by it for said years; that petitioner in due legal time presented, with the tax receipts from the proper officer of Nevada county showing the payment of said taxes, its petition to the board of supervisors of Sierra county, praying for the cancellation of said assessments so levied by said county and of the certificates of sale of said property to the state; and that said board of supervisors refused to grant said application.

Accordingly, the judgment appealed from herein is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter upon the facts stated in the petition and upon its findings its judgment granting the writ of mandate as prayed for in the petitioner's petition.

COCHRAN v. BROWN et al. (Civ. 5820.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 6, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 3, 1927.

1. Street railroads ⇨81 (5)—Street car, driven rapidly towards crossing at night without lights and other warning, is negligently operated.

A motorman operating a street car and approaching a street crossing must exercise the degree of care which a reasonable person would exercise under similar circumstances, and a street car traveling rapidly towards a public crossing in the dark of the night without lights or other warning of approach is not operated with such care.

2. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 296(3)—Instruction that motorman of street car approaching crossing must give reasonable warning held not prejudicial in view of instructions requiring finding of negligence.

In an action for personal injuries sustained by occupant of automobile when it was struck by electric interurban car at crossing in city, instruction that motorman was bound, when approaching a public crossing, to give reasonable warning to travelers as by blowing whistle or ringing a bell, or if operated at night by having a suitable light on the front part of the car, held not prejudicial, in view of other instructions requiring the jury to find negligence before finding verdict for plaintiff and defining negligence.

3. Street railroads $\hookrightarrow$ 117(29)—Occupant of automobile, struck by street car at crossing at night, held not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

In an action for personal injuries sustained when an automobile, on which side curtains were fastened to keep out the rain, was struck at a public crossing in the city on a dark night by an electric interurban car, occupant of automobile held not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

4. Parties $\hookrightarrow$ 96(5)—Defendant waived objection that it was made party by amended complaint after demurrer to original complaint without leave, where it proceeded to trial without objection (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Defendant's objection that it was made a party by an amended complaint after demurrer to the original complaint was filed, and this without leave of court, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, held to have been waived, where defendant had demurred to the amended complaint, answered, and proceeded to trial without raising the objection.

5. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1004(1)—Damages $\hookrightarrow$ 96—Amount of damages for injuries is for jury; verdict is not reviewable in absence of passion or prejudice.

The question of what is a reasonable amount of damages for personal injuries is one for the jury and will not be controlled by the appellate court unless the record shows that the verdict was the result of passion or prejudice.

6. Damages $\hookrightarrow$ 130(1)—\$3,000 for cut over eye and fracture of rib held not excessive.

$3,000 for cut over eye and fracture of one rib, confining plaintiff to hospital for not over 6 weeks and entailing medical expense of not over $202.05, held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Francis J. Cochran against E. N. Brown, the United Railroads of San Francisco, and the Market Street Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant Brown and against the other defendants, the latter appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott and K. W. Cannon, both of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for appellants.

Joseph J. Bullock, of Redwood City, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued the defendant Brown and the two defendant railroad corporations for personal injuries suffered in a collision between an interurban car operated by the corporations and an automobile operated by the defendant Brown, and in which the plaintiff was riding as Brown's guest at the time of the collision. The cause was tried before the court sitting with a jury and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000 against the two railroad corporations, and in a verdict absolving defendant Brown from liability. While the motion of the railroad corporations for a new trial was pending, the trial court reduced the judgment to $3,000, and upon plaintiff's waiver of the excess over that amount the motion for a new trial was denied. From this modified judgment the railroad corporations have appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

The collision occurred at about midnight on December 17, 1922, while the plaintiff, riding with the defendant Brown in the latter's automobile, was attempting to cross Ellsworth avenue, in the city of San Mateo, at the intersection of Tilton avenue. At that time, and for a long time prior thereto, the defendant corporations were operating an interurban electric car line over Ellsworth avenue, running from San Mateo to San Francisco. As plaintiff and his companion were crossing the track at this intersection, an electric car struck the right rear wheel of their automobile and carried it across the intersection, causing personal injuries to the plaintiff, which are the subject of this suit. At the time it was raining heavily and Brown had isinglass curtains on the right side of his car where the plaintiff sat. When the electric car turned into Ellsworth avenue, about a block distant from the point of the accident, the trolley became disconnected, causing the lights to go out on the car. The trolley was replaced, but as the car proceeded along Ellsworth avenue towards Tilton the same thing occurred again. Both the plaintiff and defendant Brown testified that they looked to their right before proceeding across Ellsworth avenue, and that they did not see the car approaching. It was the theory of the plaintiff and the defendant Brown throughout the trial that they were run down by the electric car, which was proceeding immediately before the accident in total darkness; that the isinglass in the curtains on their automobile had been recently cleaned and afforded a good vision which would have enabled either of them to have seen the car if it had approached with the lights burning; and that the sole proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the defendant corporations in operating the car across the street intersection without lights or without other suitable warning. We should not be understood as implying that the evidence was not in conflict, but there was substantial and competent evidence tending to support every element of the theory upon which the plaintiff relied, and this evidence fully supported the verdict of the jury.

Criticism is made of the instruction given by the trial judge to the jury, which reads:

"I further instruct you that it was the duty of the motorman in charge of the car of the defendant, when approaching a public crossing, to give notice of the approach by a reasonable warning, as by blowing a whistle or ringing a bell or by such other device as might be sufficient to give timely warning to travelers of the approach of the car, and if operated at night, by having a headlight or other suitable light on the front part of said car, so as to afford time for such travelers to stop in a place of safety."

The instruction is not one which can be approved generally, but we think that the objection to it goes more to the verbiage than to the substance. What the trial court apparently intended to advise the jury was that it was the duty of the corporations to operate the car with ordinary care and precaution for the purpose of avoiding others using the public streets, and that in the exercise of this ordinary care a reasonable person would give some warning in approaching a street intersection in the dark of the night in order to afford others time to stop in a place of safety. We do not understand the instruction to mean that any statute or ordinance applicable to the case required the the operator of the electric car to blow a whistle or display a headlight, but we do understand it to mean that reasonable prudence would dictate that some suitable warning should be given when approaching a public crossing.

[1] "Such timely warning of the approach of a street car must be given as to enable others to avoid any danger from it, and the nonperformance of such duty in approaching such street crossing intended to be crossed is evidence of negligence." 25 R. C. L. § 107. "Because of the greater speed with which the vehicles of a street railway move, and the little noise attending their progress, it is negligence to propel cars through public streets after dark, unless they are provided with lights sufficient to notify travelers on the street of their coming, and to put such travelers on their guard against collision." Idem. The cases cited by the text emphasize the fact that the degree of care required to be exercised by the motorman is only that which a reasonable person would exercise under similar circumstances, and that from all the experiences of mankind an electric car traveling rapidly over a public street in the dark of the night, without lights and without other warning of its approach, is not being operated in the manner in which a reasonable and prudent person would operate it under those circumstances. As said in Shea v. P. & B. V. R. R. Co., 44 Cal. 414, 427:

"The degree of prudence required of a party is dependent on the nature of the agency employed, as well as the time, place, and circumstances of its employment. In running a car loaded with earth on a down grade, in the night, with few lights in the immediate vicinity, a reasonable person would exercise a greater degree of care than he would in running a car where it would more readily be controlled, and in the daytime; and such prudence would not, in any respect, fall short of a reasonable prudence. It would be such prudence as a reasonable man would, under such circumstances employ, in order to avoid accidents and injuries to the persons and property of others."

[2] Taking the instruction with those later given, to the effect that the question whether the electric car was operated with ordinary care under the circumstances, was one for the jury, that negligence is the omission to do something which an ordinarily prudent person would have done under the circumstances, and that in any event the jury could not find a verdict against the railroad corporation unless they found the motorman was guilty of some negligence or carelessness in the operation of the car and that such negligence could not be presumed from anything which was before the jury, we are satisfied that the instruction complained of was not prejudicial.

[3] It is argued on the part of the appellants that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law because he knew that the appellants were in the habit of operating their electric cars upon that street, and that his vision was obscured by the rain-covered isinglass curtain. Finkle v. Tait, 55 Cal. App. 425, 203 P. 1031, is cited in support of this theory, but the case is not in point because both the respondent and his companion testified that the isinglass curtain did not obscure their vision, that they looked to the right before approaching the car track, and that if the car had been carrying a light they would have been able to see it through the curtain. The jury was fully instructed upon the issue of contributory negligence. The evidence upon that issue was in some conflict, and it was its province to resolve that conflict. Their is nothing in the case which, under any conceivable theory, would support a conclusion that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[4] It is argued that the case was not at issue because the respondent had filed an amended complaint bringing in the Market Street Railway Company as a party defendant after a demurrer had been filed to the original complaint, and that this was done without first having obtained leave of court as required by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. The amended complaint was served on the two defendants included in the original complaint and upon the Market Street Railway Company on October 20, 1923, and on the same day the railway corporations filed their joint demurrer to the amended complaint, which was overruled January 3, 1924. Thereafter the same defendants filed their joint answer to this amended complaint, but have not at any time prior to filing their brief on this appeal raised the point that the Market Street Railway Company was not properly joined as a party defendant. In demurring to and answering the amended complaint and in proceeding with the trial without objection this defendant must be deemed to have waived any irregularity in the manner in which it was made a party defendant.

[5, 6] Finally, it is argued that the verdict is excessive because it was shown that the respondent has suffered no permanent injuries from the accident; that he merely suffered a cut over one of his eyes and the fracture of one of his ribs, all of which confined him to a hospital for not over 6 weeks, and entailed a total expense for medical treatment of not more than $202.05. The question of what was a reasonable amount of damages to be allowed was one to be determined by the jury and cannot be controlled by the appellate court unless it appears from the record that it was the result of passion or prejudice. Appellants do not argue that such is the case here, but it is their contention that, because the respondent was a cripple from an accident received a number of years prior to this accident, the amount of the verdict in this case was the result of sympathy on the part of the jury for respondent's general condition. The difficulty of appellants' argument is that it is a theory which cannot be proved, and there is, therefore, nothing in the record which would justify this court in disturbing the verdict as modified by the trial judge.

HUME v. LINDHOLM. (Civ. 4816.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 13, 1927.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 607(1)—Request for transcript more than 10 days after actual notice of entry of judgment was not made in time (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a).

Request for transcript, having been made more than 10 days after actual notice of entry of judgment, though within 10 days from time of service of notice, was not made within statutory time, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a, and transcript could not be considered as part of record on which to consider appeal from judgment.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 607(1)—Where transcript of testimony taken on trial was not requested in time, but transcript of testimony on motion to set aside judgment was, appeal from order denying motion to vacate could be considered (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a).

Where request for transcript of testimony taken on trial was not made within 10 days of actual notice of entry of judgment, as required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a, but request for transcript of testimony on motion to set aside judgment was made within proper time and two certified transcripts were furnished on denial of motion to vacate, one by judge trying case and the other by judge denying motion, appellate court could consider appeal from order denying motion to vacate judgment.

3. Judgment $\S$ 270—Findings of fact and conclusions of law did not constitute "judgment" (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 664).

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 664, providing that in no case is a judgment effectual for any purpose until it has been entered, findings of fact and conclusions of law did not constitute "judgment."

Although Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 664, required entry of judgment immediately upon filing of findings of fact and conclusions of law, statute is directory only and judgment could be entered thereafter.

6. Trial $\S$ 400(2)—Court could amend legal conclusion that plaintiff was entitled to judgment on condition that he deliver deeds within 20 days, by extending time for surrendering deed, without notice to defendant.

Court could modify legal conclusion that plaintiff was entitled to judgment for certain sum upon condition that plaintiff surrender certain deed within 20 days, so as to permit delivery of deed for cancellation more than year later, without notice to defendant.

Where court found that defendant was indebted to plaintiff in sum of $800.40 and that plaintiff had not accepted deed in payment thereof and owned no right, title, or interest in or to property and ordered defendant's title to property described in deed quieted, and legal conclusion stated that plaintiff was entitled to judgment for $800.40 on condition that plaintiff surrender deed within 20 days, plaintiff, retaining deed for 1 year and 7 months during which time property was sold for taxes, was not estopped from having legal conclusions modified as to time of delivering up deed for cancellation.

One appealing from judgment has duty to inform appellate court of any errors affecting judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Action by Leeanna M. Hume against Albert L. Lindholm for the money due upon a contract. From the judgment, and from an order denying his motion to set aside the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Luter, Barry & Kinder, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Nolan, Rohe & Freston and Ralph E. Lewis, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. The defendant has appealed from the judgment rendered against him and from an order denying his motion to set aside the judgment. Because of another appeal by plaintiff, it may avoid confusion if we refer to the parties to this appeal as plaintiff and defendant.

The action is for money due on contract. A decision was announced by the trial court in favor of plaintiff on submission of the case on May 23, 1922, and plaintiff's attorneys were directed to prepare findings. The decision announced from the bench was "in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum claimed." The sum claimed was $800.40, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from July 30, 1921.

But the findings of fact and conclusions of law were not filed until August 16, 1922. Those findings declared, among other things, that under the terms of a certain contract between plaintiff and defendant, the defendant promised to pay plaintiff $800.40, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from July 30, 1921; that the defendant in attempting to liquidate his said indebtedness to plaintiff delivered to her a grant deed dated August 11, 1921, purporting to convey to her certain described real estate; that plaintiff never accepted said deed "nor recorded same, but still has possession thereof"; that no part of said $800.40 has been paid or any interest thereon.

As conclusions of law the court found that plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of $800.40, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from July 30, 1921, "upon condition that plaintiff surrender and deliver up to the clerk of this court for cancellation the deed hereinabove described within 20 days from the date hereof; that defendant is entitled to judgment against plaintiff; that plaintiff has no right, title, or interest in or to the real property described in said deed."

On the 26th day of March, 1924, a judgment was entered on said findings and legal conclusions in accordance therewith, except that said judgment was "upon condition that plaintiff surrender and deliver up to the clerk of this court for cancellation upon the filing of this judgment a certain grant deed dated August 11, 1921, wherein defendant is named as grantor and plaintiff as grantee, and that the said finding of fact and conclusion of law imposing the condition 'that said deed above mentioned be delivered within 20 days from the date of said findings, be and the same is hereby amended so as to permit the delivery of said deed to the clerk * * * for cancellation upon the filing of the judgment.'" The judgment quiets defendant's title to the land described in the deed as provided in said conclusions of law originally filed. The deed was filed with the clerk in accordance with said judgment. The defendant on May 2, 1924, served and filed a notice of motion to set aside said judgment on the ground that said deed was not delivered to the clerk of said superior court within the said period of 20 days and not until March 24, 1924; that defendant was not given any notice of said amendment of said findings of fact and conclusions of law and of the signing of said judgment until April 29, 1924; that subsequent to the expiration of 20 days after March 21, 1922, said property had been sold for taxes and said property had greatly depreciated in value; that interest had accrued on said sum of $800.40; that plaintiff by not depositing said deed with the clerk for cancellation within the time specified in said findings and legal conclusions made on August 16, 1922, became estopped to have said findings and conclusions amended; also, that plaintiff by not filing said deed with the clerk had elected to accept the same in satisfaction of said claim.

The motion to set aside the judgment was denied on May 14, 1924. On May 24, 1924, defendant served and filed a notice of appeal to this court from said judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion to set aside said judgment. On the same day the defendant requested of the clerk of the superior court a transcript of the testimony offered or taken on said trial and on said motion to set aside the judgment. The transcripts were prepared and certified.

Plaintiff contends that said transcript on said appeal from the judgment and from said order, not having been requested within 10 days of the defendant's notice of entry of judgment should not be considered on the appeal from the judgment. Defendant shows that the transcript was requested within 10 days from the time when plaintiff served notice of entry of judgment, and contends that the service only of that notice fixed the time from which the 10 days provided in section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, commenced to run.

[1] The affidavit of defendant filed on May 2, 1924, in support of his motion to vacate the judgment shows that he had at that time actual notice of the entry of the judgment. Defendant's request for a transcript having been made more than 10 days after said actual notice, we hold that the request for the reporter's transcript was not made within the statutory time as to the judgment, and therefore cannot be considered as a part of the record on which to consider said appeal from the judgment. Spear v. Monroe, 181 Cal. 728, 186 P. 149; Brown v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 175 Cal. 141, 165 P. 429.

[2] But on the denial of the motion to vacate the judgment there are two certified transcripts, one by the judge who tried the case and the other by another judge who denied the motion. We have before us a sufficient record for the consideration of the appeal from the order denying the motion to vacate the judgment. Defendant's appeal from that order is based principally upon his contention that the trial court had no right to modify the legal conclusion wherein a condition was imposed that plaintiff should surrender said deed for cancellation within 20 days from the filing of the findings of fact and conclusions of law, without notice to defendant.

[3, 4] The findings of fact and conclusions of law did not constitute a judgment. "In no case is a judgment effectual for any purpose" until it has been entered. Section 664, Code Civ. Proc. Legal conclusions, before the entry of a judgment, remain subject to change by the trial court. It is within the power of the court of its own motion to change them. Should a judge conclude before the entry of a judgment that the conclusions of law are erroneous, it is not only his right, but his duty in the proper administration of justice to change them to conform to the law in accordance with the facts found. 14 Cal. Jur., p. 938; Consolidated

[5] While the entry of the judgment should have been made immediately upon the filing of the findings of fact and conclusions of law (section 664, Code Civ. Proc.), that law is directory only, and the judgment can be entered thereafter. Although neglect to enter judgments should not be encouraged, the court does not lose jurisdiction to order a judgment entered long after that time as was done in this case. Furthermore, the findings determined that the deed had not been recorded and was not accepted by plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had no interest in the land described therein.

[6, 7] The contention of appellant that the court erred in modifying its legal conclusions as to the time of required surrender of the deed without notice to him cannot be sustained. Under such circumstances, the court has the inherent right to correct those legal conclusions. The case of Wunderlin v. Cadogan, 75 Cal. 617, 17 P. 713, cited by appellant, is not in point. It is true that findings of fact cannot be changed in a material manner without notice. The case of Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 P. 1074, 23 Am. St. 491, is more nearly in point. In that case, although the findings of fact and conclusions of law are referred to as a "decision" and a "judgment," it is not held that they were conclusive on the inherent powers of the court until the entry of the judgment. Indeed, this position is made clear by the Supreme Court in the statement on page 486 of the opinion in that case, wherein the court says:

"All courts of record have the inherent power to correct their records so that they shall conform to the actual facts, and speak the truth of the case; and such correction may be made at any time, either upon the motion of the court itself, or at the instance of any party interested."

In that the case, the judgment entered required the sale of mortgaged property although not provided for in the findings. Condee v. Burton, 62 Cal. 1.

Here no findings of fact were changed. Indeed, no change was made in the legal conclusions touching the merits of the action. The surrender of the deed was required and was made. The plaintiff had judgment for $800.40, and defendant had a judgment quieting his title to the land, and it is apparent from the testimony he could have had the deed at any time on requesting it from Mr. Nolan, plaintiff's attorney.

[8] The further point made by appellant that by respondent retaining said deed for 1 year and 7 months and apparently accepting the same, and permitting said property to be sold for taxes, that respondent was therefore estopped from having any modification from the legal conclusions is inconsistent with the facts. The court found that defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $800.40, and that plaintiff had not accepted said deed and owned no right, title, or interest in or to the property therein described, and ordered defendant's title to the property described in the deed quieted. It was therefore the duty of defendant, and not plaintiff, to pay the taxes, and he is blaming her for his own neglect.

The case of Wunderlin v. Cadogan, 75 Cal. 617, 17 P. 713, cited by appellant in support of his contention that the findings cannot be changed without notice to him, is not in point. In that case the change was one of findings of fact and not to supply an omission in the findings first filed, or change the direction for judgment, but was to substitute one set of findings for another.

[9] Although defendant asks for a reversal of the judgment in his closing brief, there has been no argument in support of that appeal. Inasmuch as it was his duty to inform this court of any errors affecting the judgment, if there were any, and he has not done so, the judgment is affirmed. Also, for the reasons herein set forth, the order denying the motion to set aside the judgment is affirmed.

CHAPMAN v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 12, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 10, 1927.

1. Street railroads $\Leftrightarrow$ 81(5)—Street car operator owes duty of using usual precautionary warnings.

The operator of a street car owes the public the duty of using all precautionary warnings usual and in common use in operating the car.

2. Street railroads $\Leftrightarrow$ 117(10)—Whether motorman gave warning signal and whether street car was lighted held for jury.

In an action by plaintiff who was injured while riding in automobile by collision with street car, whether the motorman gave a warning signal and whether the car was sufficiently lighted held questions for jury.

3. Trial $\Leftrightarrow$ 252(1)—Instruction based on fact not supported by evidence held erroneous, though stating law accurately.

Where the court instructed the jury that in case certain facts existed the verdict should be for the defendant and there was no evidence whatever of such facts, the instruction was held erroneous, though it stated the law correctly.

4. Negligence $\Leftrightarrow$ 93(1)—Evidence that plaintiff, injured when automobile collided with street car, was guest of driver held not to justify instruction on contributory negligence.

In action for injuries resulting from collision between automobile and street car, evidence that the plaintiff was the guest of the automobile driver held not to justify any instruction as to contributory negligence, there being no other evidence tending to show that plaintiff's actions contributed to cause the collision.

5. Appeal and error $\Leftrightarrow$ 1064(1)—Court's statement in instructions that amount plaintiff claimed for damages from injury by street car was absurd held possibly prejudicial.

In action by person injured while riding in automobile which collided with street car, court's statement in instructions that the amount plaintiff claimed for damages was ab-

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Dorothy Chapman against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Arnold Praeger and William A. Sumner, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, E. E. Morris, and C. W. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment for defendant on a verdict of a jury. The action is for damages for the alleged negligence of defendant in operating a street railroad car, resulting in an accident causing plaintiff's injuries. The accident occurred about 9 o'clock at night on November 12, 1922, on Colorado street, in the city of Pasadena. The plaintiff was riding in an automobile driven by John L. Ramsey. She was his guest. He was driving his car westerly on said street and up an incline of about 8 or 9 per cent. Defendant's car was coming down this street in an easterly direction when the street car and automobile came together in a head-on collision, demolishing and setting fire to the automobile in which plaintiff was riding, severely injuring her, and causing the death of said Ramsey. The plaintiff alleged said accident to have been caused by the defendant's neglect in negligently propelling said street car at a dangerous rate of speed and in not maintaining a sufficient headlight on said street car, and alleges that the car did not "signal any alarm or bell," and that, although the motorman of defendant's car saw said automobile when it was about 300 feet from his car, he left his position at the controller of said car without shutting off the power or applying the brakes or "sounding any bell, signal, or alarm." Other acts of negligence of defendant were also alleged. The defendant denies all of plaintiff's allegations of neglect and alleges that the accident was caused by the neglect of plaintiff, and that plaintiff and the driver of the said automobile were at the time of the accident engaged in a joint and common enterprise, and that neither of them exercised ordinary care and both of them so negligently "rode and drove the said automobile as to bring the same into collision with defendant's car and contributed to said injury and damage." The plaintiff in one part of her complaint alleges:

"That while the automobile in which said plaintiff was then and there riding, as aforesaid, and said street car were approaching each other approximately 300 feet apart, the driver of said automobile, said Ramsey, was attempting to pass and go around another automobile which was proceeding in the same direction * * * along said Colorado street, and that the said two automobiles were then and there abreast of each other; that while attempting to pass said automobile, the left-hand wheels of said automobile in which plaintiff was then and there riding were between the rails of defendant's street car track; that instead of permitting said Ramsey to pass and go around him, the driver of said automobile, who was unknown to plaintiff, speeded up his automobile and would not permit said Ramsey to pass him; that there was not sufficient room for said Ramsey to drive his said automobile between defendant's street car and the other automobile which he was attempting to pass. That by so speeding up, the driver of said automobile caused said Ramsey's automobile to be boxed in, and caught in a trap, and placed in a position of danger of collision with said street car."

Then follows an allegation that defendant's motorman saw the automobile in which plaintiff was riding in such position of danger while said automobile and said street car were 300 feet apart, and then follow allegations of alleged neglect of the motorman to ring any bell or give any warning or shut off his power or apply his brakes "at once," by deserting his post and leaving no person in control.

The race of the two automobiles seems to have been an admitted fact, and plaintiff seems to allege the above facts as showing that defendant had a last clear chance to avoid the accident. The allegation, however, does not correspond with plaintiff's testimony, which was more favorable to her than the allegations of her complaint. During the argument of counsel for defendant, said counsel commenced to reply to the contention of plaintiff's counsel that no bell was rung, and plaintiff gave no warning of the approach of his car, when the court interrupted him and said:

"Mr. Gortner, you need not say anything about a bell not being rung. It doesn't make any difference whether it was rung or not. The car was lighted, and the headlight was burning so that anybody who had eyes and was looking could have seen it, and I am going to hold that there was no duty on the motorman to ring his bell. The only question to be considered was whether the motorman was negligent in leaving his post, and you can confine your argument to that point."

[1] The court was speaking of issues made by the pleadings and in support of evidence which had been introduced and upon which counsel for plaintiff had argued to the jury contending that the facts plaintiff had alleged in regard to the warning and lights had been proved. Whether the facts had been proved or not, it was not for the court at that stage of the trial to decide. Plaintiff had testified that it seemed to her that the street car did not have a light on it; that she saw no light, although looking ahead; that she heard no bell, whistle, or gong—she was not directing the driver of the automobile in which she was riding and it was not going over 20 or 22 miles per hour—that she did not see the street car at all until it suddenly loomed up. Defendant had contended that plaintiff was negligent while riding in the automobile and thereby contributed proximately to the accident; that she and the driver were engaged in a joint enterprise; and that both plaintiff and the driver by their alleged negligence contributed directly and proximately to the accident. Yet the court stated before the jury that the only question to be considered was whether the motorman was negligent in leaving his post. The operation of a street car in a public street, especially where there is a traffic congestion, is in itself a source of danger to those occupying the street, and the operator owes to the public the duty to use all precautionary warnings usual and in common use with such operations.

[2] Without considering the evidence in conflict with plaintiff's testimony, the jury could have found that no bell was being rung by defendant, and that there was no light on the defendant's car, and that the plaintiff did not see the defendant's car until the collision was inevitable. From the evidence, the jury could have found that the motorman saw the car in which plaintiff was riding when it was at least 300 feet away and approaching on the street car track. Adding to this testimony the physical fact of the collision and plaintiff's injuries, if this were the only evidence, the jury could have found for plaintiff, and hence the action of the court in confining the consideration of the jury to the question as to whether the motorman was negligent in leaving his post, and deciding that the car was lighted up, and that the headlight was burning, and that it was immaterial whether the bell was rung, was an invasion of the province of the jury and was error. If the car was not lighted and had no headlight, or one so dim as not to be effective, then the fact of whether a bell was ringing was material and should have been submitted to the jury. However, from the fact that the court instructed the jury on the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence, it seems that the court did not intend to pass on the question of contributory negligence in said statement confining the argument relating to defendant's negligence to the alleged neglect of the motorman in leaving his post. Although plaintiff's testimony was in conflict with that of witnesses produced by her, the jury had the right to believe her testimony to be true. We hold that the court erred in its instructions on the question of defendant's neglect, in confining their consideration to the action of the motorman in leaving his post. Under the circumstances of the case, the jury should have been permitted to consider whether the car was lighted, the condition of the headlight, and whether the bell was ringing or gong sounding.

The jury were instructed that if plaintiff was guilty of a want of ordinary care, no matter how slight that want of ordinary care was, if it proximately contributed to her injury, they could not find a verdict for her. Yet there was no evidence of want of care on her part. The court did, however, instruct the jury:

"The negligence of the driver of the automobile in which plaintiff was riding, if there was any, was not imputable to her."

This was in accordance with Dale v. Denver City Tramway Co. (C. C. A.) 173 F. 787, 19 Ann. Cas. 1223; Dyer v. Erie Railway Co., 71 N. Y. 228; Noakes v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 195 N. Y. 543, 82 N. E. 1126.

[3, 4] The court instructed the jury that:

"If she acquiesced in and knowingly and willingly took part in an effort to race with another automobile and thereby contributed directly or proximately to the happening of said accident and collision in any degree, then your verdict should be for the defendant."

There was no evidence on which such a finding could have been made. An instruction on facts supported by no evidence is often misleading to the jury and prejudicial to one or more parties to the action. Although it stated the law accurately, it should not have been given, because there was no evidence on which to base it. Appellant and respondent were not engaged in a joint enterprise. There was no community of interest in the object or purpose of the driver of the automobile, and appellant was not charged with any duty of directing the driver. In fact, it is common knowledge that the interference of a passenger with a driver of an automobile is generally an element of danger rather than safety. The evidence in this case did not justify any instruction as to contributory negligence as against appellant. Curran v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., (Cal. App.) 247 P. 236; Thompson v. Collins et al., 139 Wash. 401, 247 P. 458.

[5] The statement by the court in its instructions that the amount claimed by plaintiff was absurd was possibly prejudicial in that the court thereby inferentially accused her of making a false claim for damages, and such a statement thereof in itself may or may not be sufficient ground for reversal.

After careful examination of the entire case, including all of the evidence introduced, we believe that the party appealing sustained and suffered substantial injury by reason of the errors hereinbefore referred to.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

HAND et al. v. CLEESE et al. (Sac. 3793.)★
 Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1927.

1. Waters and water courses ☞152(8)—Evidence that claimants' ditch carried three to five inches of water held to support judgment giving them three inches of water.

In contest concerning water rights, testimony of two witnesses that certain claimants' ditch carried from three to five inches of water held to support judgment giving them three inches of water, based on more than five years' appropriation.

2. Waters and water courses ☞158(2)—Construction of contract, giving each of rival claimants to water half of supply to which they were entitled, held proper.

In action to enjoin interference with water rights, where plaintiff's predecessor who had appropriated all water in canyon had agreed to give defendant's predecessor free use of water from ditch for purposes of irrigation and agriculture only, in view of fact that plaintiff's predecessor repaired ditch and did not abandon water rights, and other facts and circumstances, judgment construing agreement to award each of rival claimants half of water in ditch remaining after allotment to third party, who had rights through prior appropriation, was proper.

3. Waters and water courses ☞152(2)—Plaintiffs' changing route of water supply held not to affect rights thereto.

In action to enjoin diversion of water, fact that plaintiffs, more than five years before commencing action, had diverted water through natural depression instead of through ditch built by their predecessor in interest did not affect their rights, in view of fact that such change injured no one.

4. Waters and water courses ☞158(3)—Failure to repair ditch held not to cause forfeiture of right to water.

Failure of parties to repair water ditch pursuant to contract by their predecessor in title would merely give rise to action to recover one-half amount expended for repairs and would not cause forfeiture of water rights, since forfeitures are not favored.

5. Appeal and error ☞1061(2)—On submitting findings before date for hearing of motion to dismiss for want of prosecution, failure to hear and pass on such motion held not prejudicial.

Where court continued defendant's motion to dismiss case for want of prosecution until certain date unless findings were submitted in meantime, and findings were submitted and signed before such date, failure to hear and pass on motion to dismiss was not prejudicial to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Hand and another against John P. Cleese and others to enjoin the diversion of water. From a judgment settling the water rights, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville, and Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. E. Dillinger, of Placerville, for respondents Gasparini.

Abe Darlington and Henry S. Lyon, both of Placerville, and Chas. A. Swisler, of Sacramento, for respondents Hand and Celio.

LANGDON, J. Plaintiffs brought this action to enjoin the defendants from diverting the waters of a stream known as "Johnson's north canyon," and from interfering in any way with the flow of said waters to plaintiffs' lands through ditches thereon. Plaintiffs' land does not border on the stream, and their rights have been acquired by appropriation. From the judgment of the trial court to the effect that plaintiffs and defendant Cleese are the owners as tenants in common of a specified amount of water of said stream, and that plaintiffs are entitled to use one-half thereof on their lands, and that defendants Gasparini are the owners of and entitled to use on their land a small quantity of the water of this stream, defendant Cleese has appealed.

There is no serious dispute about the correctness of the findings of fact, and they find support in a voluminous record of the proceedings at the trial. These findings disclose the following facts:

That at the time of the commencement of this action the plaintiffs were, and ever since have been, and for many years prior thereto they and their grantors and predecessors in interest had been continuously the owners of and in possession of certain lands, particularly described in the complaint and in the findings, which were located in county of El Dorado, state of California, and known as the "Johnson ranch," and on which they raise hay and other crops.

At the time of the commencement of this action the defendant John P. Cleese was the owner, in possession of and entitled to the possession of, and for many years prior thereto he and his predecessors and grantors had been the owners of, in possession and entitled to the possession, of certain lands situated in the county of El Dorado, state of California, adjoining the lands of plaintiffs.

The defendants Guiseppe Gasparini and Amelia Gasparini were at the time of the commencement of this action, and for many years last past have been, the owners of certain land situated in said county of El Dorado, together with a certain private ditch leading from Johnson's north canyon.

Since prior to the year 1864 there has been a certain water ditch, known as and called

"Johnson's ditch," commencing in a certain canyon, known as Johnson's north canyon, in the southeast quarter of section 36, township 11 north, range 11 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, in said El Dorado county, and running thence to and through and over a portion of the lands of the defendant John P. Cleese and thence to the lands of the plaintiffs, which said ditch has been used at all times since its construction, and since prior to the year 1864, and is now used to divert and convey a portion of the waters flowing in said Johnson's north canyon, said canyon at all of said times having therein and flowing at the head of said ditch a stream of natural water varying in quantity according to the season of the year from twelve inches, miners' measurement, during the summer and fall to a greater quantity at other seasons of the year. Said ditch was constructed prior to the year 1864 by one J. C. Johnson, who then lived on the lands known as the "Johnson ranch" and said ditch was thereafter used by him to convey, and he did thereby actually appropriate and convey, the waters of said Johnson's north canyon to and on the said Johnson ranch, where the said water was used by him for irrigating and domestic purposes from the time said ditch was constructed until he moved away from said lands about the year 1874.

Said water was also used on said Johnson ranch, through and by means of said ditch, for mining purposes by the said J. C. Johnson and by his grantee, A. J. Blakeley, who also used said water on said Johnson ranch for irrigating purposes from the time he acquired said ranch and ditch by deed from said Johnson and wife on June 23, 1874, until the time of his death October 12, 1916. And each year since the death of said A. J. Blakeley, his successors in interest, including the plaintiffs in this action, in said Johnson ranch and ditch have, until prevented from so doing by defendant Cleese in July, 1920, used a portion of the waters of Johnson's north canyon, through and by means of said ditch, for irrigating crops growing in said Johnson ranch.

This Johnson ditch, before reaching said Johnson ranch, crossed over and through certain land known as the "Maxwell ranch," which is now owned by the defendant Cleese, and which adjoins the said Johnson ranch,

For many years prior to the commencement of this action, the defendant Cleese and his predecessors in interest in said Maxwell ranch used a portion of the water of said Johnson ditch for irrigating purposes on the Maxwell ranch, but until the month of July, 1920, such use of said water by the defendant Cleese and his predecessors in interest in said Maxwell ranch was by permission and with the consent of the said J. C. Johnson and his successors in interest, including the plaintiffs herein.

On the 11th day of January, 1864, the said J. C. Johnson, who then occupied, claimed, and owned the said Johnson ranch, and who is the predecessor in interest of the plaintiffs herein, and one Michael Maxwell, who then occupied the said Maxwell ranch and who was the predecessor in interest of said defendant Cleese, entered into and executed an agreement in writing, as follows:

"J. C. Johnson & M. Maxwell. Agreement.

"Memorandum of an agreement made this 11th day of January, A. D. 1864, between John C. Johnson and Michael Maxwell, both of the county of El Dorado and state of California, witnesseth that whereas said Johnson and Maxwell are owners and occupants of adjoining farms in John Canyons in said county, and said Johnson being desirous to reopen and construct his water ditch, a part of the upper portion of which runs through the premises of said Maxwell, in consideration of the premises said Maxwell hereby grants to said Johnson the right of way over his said premises to reopen and construct anew and keep in repair said ditch, and to assist in the construction and keeping in repair the same so far as the same shall extend on the premises of said Maxwell, and said Johnson in consideration of the premises hereby agrees that within a reasonable time he will reconstruct and thereafter keep in repair said ditch by the assistance of said Maxwell as to the extent as aforesaid, and to allow said Maxwell to the extent of his said premises the free use of water from said ditch for purposes of irrigation and agriculture only, and said Johnson further agrees in consideration as aforesaid that he will not sell or permit to be used any water for mining purposes to be used upon the land or premises of said Maxwell.

"State of California, County of El Dorado—ss:

"On this 11th day of January, A. D. 1864, before me John Bush, a justice of the peace in and for said county, personally appeared John C. Johnson and Michael Maxwell, personally known to me to be the persons described in and who executed the foregoing instrument as parties thereto, and who each for himself acknowledged to me that he executed the same freely and voluntarily, for the uses and purposes therein specified. Given under my hand this 11th day of January, 1864.

"John Bush, Justice of the Peace."

The foregoing agreement after being executed, was recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of El Dorado, state of California, on the 11th day of January, 1864.

In the month of July, 1920, the defendant Cleese, by opening the said ditch on his said lands at a point therein above the lands of the plaintiffs, diverted the waters of said ditch therefrom and prevented any of said waters from flowing to the said lands of plaintiffs and prevented plaintiffs from having or using any of said water on their lands, and since said time said defendant has repeated said acts and prevented plaintiffs from having or using any of said water on their said lands, and in July, 1920, defendant Cleese refused, and still refuses, to allow plaintiffs to take or to have or use on their lands any of the waters diverted by means of and flowing in said ditch and denies plaintiffs' right to take or have or use any of said waters.

Defendant Cleese intends to and, unless restrained, will continue to use all the water of said canyon, and will prevent any portion of said water from flowing through said ditch to plaintiffs' land, and will prevent plaintiffs from taking or having or using any of said water on their said land.

Prior to the said month of July, 1920, there was no dispute between the defendant Cleese or his predecessors in interest and the plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest concerning the ownership or right to the use of any of said water, nor, prior to said last-named time, did the defendant Cleese or his predecessors in interest prevent, interfere with, or obstruct the taking or use of any of said water by the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest or dispute their right to take or use said water. The acts of the defendant Cleese in refusing to allow plaintiffs the use of said water, if continued, will cause great and irreparable injury to the plaintiffs.

For more than five years before the commencement of this action the said water flowing in said ditch had not been conveyed to plaintiffs' said land through the said ditch, but at a point on the lands of defendant Cleese near the boundary between his lands and the said lands of plaintiffs the portion of said water used by plaintiffs and their predecessors was diverted from said ditch and was thereafter by them conveyed on to the lands of plaintiffs down, along, and through a natural depression in the land, and thence by means thereof onto the lands of plaintiffs where the same was used for irrigation purposes by the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest.

Prior to the month of July, 1920, no objection was ever made by defendant Cleese or his predecessors in interest to the aforesaid change in the manner of conveying said water to the lands of plaintiffs, nor to the taking and conveying of said water from said ditch in the manner above described.

The trial court further found that the defendant Cleese was not, and has not been, for more than five years prior to the commencement of this action, or at all, and is not now the owner in possession and entitled to the possession, enjoyment, or use of all of the waters of said stream known as Johnson's north canyon, and that said defendant Cleese has not, during all or any of said time or at all, continuously, uninterruptedly, peaceably, openly, notoriously under a claim of right, adversely to said plaintiffs and to all the world, taken and diverted all of the waters of the said canyon through the ditch described in the complaint and carried the same to his land where the same was used by him for irrigating his said lands and for other useful and beneficial purposes. And said Cleese is not now the owner of the right to take, divert, appropriate, and use all of the water of said stream.

The stream or water course known as Johnson's north canyon has, for time immemorial, existed and flowed by, through, over, and upon a portion of the land of defendant Cleese, and said land has at all times been and is now riparian to said stream. Said Johnson ditch was constructed by the said J. C. Johnson, plaintiffs' predecessor in interest, as the waters of said canyon to the extent of more than one hundred inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, were actually appropriated by the said Johnson by means of said ditch prior to the year 1864, and at the time of said appropriation the land now owned by defendant Cleese was public land of the United States and unpatented. Ever since the 11th day of January, 1864, and until the month of July, 1920, the defendant Cleese and his predecessors in interest have recognized and acquiesced in the said appropriation of said water of said canyon by means of said ditch and the right of the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest to take and use the said water.

The plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest did not at any time abandon the said Johnson ditch or their right to the water of said Johnson's north canyon, nor did they, until prevented from using water by the defendant Cleese in July, 1920, cease or discontinue the diversion of said water by means of said ditch or the use of said water for beneficial purposes on the lands of plaintiffs.

The capacity of said ditch as constructed by the said Johnson was in excess of one hundred inches of water, measured under a four-inch pressure. The capacity of said ditch at the present time is sixty-three inches of water, measured as aforesaid.

The trial court further found that the plaintiffs and the defendant Cleese own and are entitled to divert and use sixty-three inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, of the water in said Johnson's north canyon, flowing therein at the head or intake of said Johnson ditch, the plaintiffs owning and being entitled to one-half of said water, and the defendant Cleese owning and being entitled to the other one-half thereof, and they, the said plaintiffs and said defendant Cleese, are entitled to use said Johnson ditch for the purpose of diverting and conveying the said water for use by them on their said lands.

The defendants Gasparini are and they and their predecessors in interest for more than five years last past before the commencement of this action, and during all the times mentioned in the complaint, have been continuously, adversely, openly and notoriously the owners of and entitled to three miners' inches continuous flow of the waters flowing in said Johnson's north canyon at the head or intake of their said ditch, and said defendants have for many years, and for more than five years last past, diverted said water through said private ditch and put said water to beneficial use on their said land for mining and for irrigating gardens and other crops thereon. That the amount of water required and used for irrigation by said defendants Gasparini was and is three inches.

[1, 2] The facts herein stated, as found by the court, leave no doubt as to the propriety of the judgment rendered. The trial court recognized the difficulty of determining the exact amount of water to be allowed to defendants Gasparini—a difficulty that arises in most cases of this character—but the court decided the question upon the testimony of two witnesses to the effect that the ditch carried from three to five inches of water to the premises of Gasparini.

As pointed out by the trial court, the ditch which carries the water from the canyon had become known by Johnson's name, and the canyon itself had taken this designation through his work in it constructing the original ditch. Later, when the ditch required considerable repairs and when the predecessors of defendant Cleese had acquired the land from the government, Johnson entered into the agreement set out herein. It is artificially drawn, which gives appellant some ground for argument as to its meaning, but the ditch is referred to as "Johnson's ditch" and as "his" (Johnson's) ditch, and it seems entirely clear from the whole instrument that at that time the right of Johnson as an appropriator of the water was recognized and acquiesced in by the predecessors in interest of Cleese. The circumstances surrounding the making of the agreement in question, and the needs and uses to which the water was being applied at that time, make it apparent that Johnson did not intend to contract to repair the ditch and then deprive himself of the use of the water upon his land.

Appellant contends that the record shows that Johnson abandoned the water which he had acquired by appropriation. While there is testimony upon which to base this contention, there is also evidence in the record which supports the findings of the court to the effect that plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest did not at any time abandon their right to the water of said Johnson's north canyon, nor did they, until prevented from using the water by the defendant Cleese in July, 1920, cease or discontinue the use of said water for beneficial purposes on the lands of plaintiffs.

[3] The court also found, as hereinbefore set out, that for more than five years before the commencement of this action the water had not been diverted to plaintiffs' land by means of the Johnson ditch, but had been carried to said lands over a natural depression. Plaintiffs had the right to change this means of diversion of the waters to which they were entitled, since said change injured no one. These findings regarding the continued beneficial use of plaintiffs make it unnecessary to pass upon the position taken by the trial court that the parties were tenants in common of the ditch and water by virtue of the agreement hereinbefore set forth. Such a relationship would not be essential to plaintiffs' recovery herein unless it were also true that they had abandoned the water, in which case the possession and use of one tenant in common would be the possession and use of the other (Unger v. Moonney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100), unless the tenant out of possession was informed that his cotenant was holding adversely.

The uncertainty of the agreement between the parties presented difficulties to the trial court in the division of the water, and these difficulties were recognized by the court. While the agreement granted to Maxwell "the free use of water from said ditch for the purposes of irrigation and agriculture only," it is perfectly clear from the terms of the agreement and from the surrounding facts and circumstances that Johnson intended to retain the use of a considerable portion of the water for himself for mining and domestic purposes, and he had the right to fully protect himself in these matters, for he had appropriated all the water. The trial court, considering all these facts and circumstances, concluded that the intention was to divide the water equally. This seems a fair construction of the instrument—in fact, a liberal one in favor of appellant—and in the absence of exact information on the question the court could do no better than to follow the maxim that equality is equity.

[4] It is also contended by appellant that, since by the agreement set forth herein the parties were to share the expense of repairing and renewing the ditch from time to time, the plaintiffs have lost their rights to the water by their failure to perform their obligation in this respect. Upon this question we are in accord with the trial court that such failure to repair would merely give rise to a suit to recover one-half of the amount expended by defendants in repairs. Equity abhors a forfeiture and, in the absence of a positive rule of law attaching such a penalty in a case like the present, the courts will not enforce so drastic a remedy. In the case of Smith v. Stearns Ranchos Co., 132 Cal. 178, 64 P. 261, 716, the court refused to forfeit the right of a water user because he failed to pay the expense of maintaining and repairing the canal through which the water was to be conveyed and compelled the company to sue for the amount due for repairs, etc.

[5] One more point is made by appellant, predicated upon the failure of the plaintiffs to prepare findings after the court had decided this case on December 15, 1923. On September 6, 1924, defendant Cleese moved to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. The court did not hear this motion, and appellant contends this was an abuse of discretion. It appears that the court continued the motion until October 16, unless findings were submitted in the meantime, and they were submitted and signed before that date. It appeared, therefore, that at the time to which the motion was continued the findings had been signed and filed, and no reason for the granting of the motion existed. No prejudice resulted to defendant, therefore, by the failure to hear and pass upon such motion.

We find no error in the record. On the contrary, the findings follow closely the evidence in the case, and it would seem that the judgment clearly follows the findings made.

The judgment is affirmed.

CHARLES L. DONOHUE CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF GLENN COUNTY et al.★
(Sac. 4029.)

Rehearing Denied Sept. 19, 1927.

1. Mandamus $\S$ 168(4)—Evidence that attorney signing stipulation extending time for trying case represented defendant held to justify refusal to dismiss action for delay (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583).

On application for mandamus to compel dismissal of action to foreclose mortgage for failure to bring case to trial within 5 years after defendant corporation filed answer, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583, evidence that attorney signing letters constituting stipulation for extension of time for bringing case to trial was acting for corporation, and that attorney who filed answer for corporation was present when cause, pursuant to stipulation, was reset for trial beyond expiration of 5-year period, held to show good cause for refusal to dismiss action.

2. Mandamus $\S$ 43—Mandamus requiring dismissal of action can be granted only on entire absence of showing of good cause for refusal.

Only when there is entire absence of showing constituting good cause for denying motion to dismiss action may mandamus to compel dismissal be properly issued.

Original application by the Charles L. Donohue Company for a writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court of the County of Glenn, Claude F. Purkitt, Judge. Writ denied.

W. T. Belieu, of Willows, and Frederick Olds, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

George B. Freeman, of Willows, for respondents.

SHENK, J. [1] This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent superior court and the judge thereof to dismiss an action pending in said court for the foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate and entitled Frank Freeman v. Charles L. Donohoe, Charles L. Donohoe Company, a Corporation, et al. The Charles L. Donohoe Company, the petitioner herein, presented a motion in the trial court to dismiss the action under section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, on the ground that the action had not been brought to trial within 5 years after the said company had filed its answer and that it had not stipulated in writing that the time might be extended. After quite an extended hearing of the motion the court found and determined that a written stipulation had been entered into between the parties concerned in this proceeding extending the time beyond the 5-year period.

A transcript of the evidence taken on the hearing of the motion is before us and is relied on by both the petitioner and respondents. From this record it appears that a disputed question of fact arose before the trial court as to whether a written stipulation had been entered into as required by the statute. The statements in writing which the respondents contend amount to a written stipulation were embodied in numerous letters exchanged between the attorney for the plaintiff in said action and an attorney who for some years prior to the motion to dismiss and long before the expiration of the 5-year period had charge of the legal affairs of the Donohoe interests, including those of the Donohoe Company. This correspondence need not be set out in detail. It is sufficient to say that the letters exchanged between the two attorneys were abundantly sufficient in themselves, as determined by the trial court, to constitute a written stipulation extending the statutory time. But petitioner contends that the letters transmitted to plaintiff's attorney by the attorney representing the interests of the Donohoe Company were not signed by the attorney who filed the answer on behalf of said company. The evidence shows that the attorney who entered into the written stipulation for the extension of time not only represented to the attorney for the plaintiff for a long period of time, but also stated in open court, in the presence of the respondent judge and in the presence and hearing of the officers actively in charge of the affairs of the Donohoe Company, that he was acting in all matters in which the Donohoe Company was interested. This attorney also stated to the respondent judge in chambers that he was so acting. The attorney who filed the answer for the Donohoe Company was present in court when the cause was, pursuant to said stipulation, reset for trial beyond the expiration of the 5-year period.

[2] Under the evidence the trial court was justified in concluding that the petitioner and the attorney who filed its answer so assented to and sanctioned the said stipulation in open court as to render it in effect their own stipulation. Such being the case, the respondents have shown good cause why the motion to dismiss the action was denied. It is only when there is an entire absence of any showing constituting good cause presented in the superior court upon the hearing of the motion to dismiss that a writ of mandate to compel the dismissal of the action may properly issue. Matter of Ford, 160 Cal. 334, 349, 116 P. 757, 35 L. App. 477, 219 P. 85; 16 Cal. Jur. p. 819 et seq. In view of the written stipulation found by the court to have been made and assented to by the parties, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the other points urged by the respondents.

The peremptory writ is denied.

SCOTT et al. v. FRUIT GROWERS' SUPPLY CO. (Sac. 3895.)

Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1927.

4. Waters and water courses ☞107(3)—Evidence held to show spring was tributary of creek, hence riparian defendant could not so divert waters from spring as to deprive creek riparian owners of water rights.

Evidence held to show that a certain spring was a tributary of named creek, hence defendant could not so divert waters from the spring into his millpond as to deprive plaintiffs of their riparian rights in the creek waters.

2. Waters and water courses ☞137—Riparian owner's frequent temporary diversion of water extending over prescriptive period gave him no prescriptive rights against other owners.

Riparian owner's frequent temporary diversion of water extending over prescriptive period gave him no prescriptive rights against other owners, since water always returned to land of other owners within a short time after use by diverter.

3. Waters and water courses ☞105—Upper riparian owner was not entitled to divert creek's tributary waters to nonadjacent lands, his diversion right being no greater than other riparian owners'.

An upper riparian owner was not entitled to divert waters from a spring tributary to the creek to nonadjacent lands for irrigation purposes, his diversion right being no greater than that of other riparian owners.

4. Waters and water courses ☞138—Upper riparian owner is presumed to be exercising only riparian rights, hence cannot secretly acquire prescriptive right against lower owners.

Upper riparian owner is presumed to be exercising only his riparian rights in the use of water, hence he can acquire no title by prescription unless it is brought home to the lower riparian proprietors that the upper proprietor asserts a right other than his riparian right.

5. Waters and water courses ☞142—Upper riparian owner acquiring prescriptive right to use all water on certain land may not divert it to different lands to lower owner's injury (Civ. Code, § 1412).

An upper riparian owner who has acquired the prescriptive right to use all water on certain land does not, under Civ. Code, § 1412, thereby acquire the right to use the water on land other than that for which the prescriptive right was acquired, to the injury of other riparian owners.

6. Waters and water courses ☞142—Prescriptive rights are stricti juris and should not be extended beyond the actual user.

Prescriptive rights are stricti juris and should not be extended beyond the actual user.

7. Waters and water courses ☞128—Water Commission Act relative to 10 years' nonuser was not applicable in riparian owner's controversy, since yearly use for irrigation purposes was shown (Water Commission Act, § 11, as amended by St. 1919, p. 513).

In view of finding that the lower riparian owners had used stream's waters each year for irrigation purposes, the Water Commission Act, § 11, as amended by St. 1919, p. 513, relative to 10 years' nonuser, was not applicable in upper riparian owner's prescriptive claim.

8. Waters and water courses ☞127—Argument of balance of convenience has no place in law governing riparian rights.

The argument that waters are of great value to the appropriators and of small value to other riparian owners has no place in the law governing riparian rights.

9. Waters and water courses ☞145—Appropriator of water may not change point of diversion to injury of others, since he has only water's use, not its ownership.

An appropriator of water may not change the point of diversion so as to injure or deprive others of their water rights, since by the appropriation he has acquired only the use of the water, not its ownership.

10. Waters and water courses ☞152(3)—Injunction held proper remedy, where upper riparian owner was depriving lower owners of water's use.

Where one riparian owner is depriving other owners of the use of stream's waters, latter are not restricted to damage action, but may proceed by injunction.

11. Waters and water courses ☞152(3)—Riparian proprietors may restrain taking of water to nonriparian land without showing damage.

In an action by certain riparian owners or proprietors to restrain others from taking stream's waters to nonriparian lands, a showing of damages is not requisite.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by L. P. Scott and others against the Fruit Growers' Supply Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Pardee, of Susanville, Farrand & Slosson, of Los Angeles, and Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for appellant.

N. J. Barry, Hardin Barry, and Barry & Barry, all of Susanville, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Lassen county, which enjoins defendant and appellant from conducting the water of Bagwell springs through a pipe line constructed by appellant in 1924 from Bagwell springs to its millpond on the south bank of the Susan river, in Lassen county, Cal. The geographical and topographical conditions involved in the controversy are best illustrated with a map and chart, but the findings of the trial court have described such conditions substantially as follows:

Susan river comes out of the mountains to the west of the town of Susanville and flows in an almost straight easterly direction. A short distance after the river comes out of the mountains it is joined on the north side by a tributary called Piute creek. Piute creek flows in a southeasterly direction and joins Susan river at an acute angle. Between the point where Piute creek comes out of the mountains and where it flows into Susan river there are certain ranches. The ranch closest to the mountains is the Cain ranch, owned by the appellant, and Piute creek flows across this ranch. Next below is the Long ranch, also owned by appellant, and Piute creek flows across this ranch. Next below the Long ranch are the lands of the plaintiffs Gehrig, Scott, Taylor, and Accomasso. Piute creek flows across all the lands of these last-named plaintiffs. The lands of the plaintiff Boggs are on the north of and border on Susan river just below the point where Piute creek flows into Susan river. The Boggs lands have always been irrigated from the waters of Piute creek by a ditch connected with Piute creek before it reaches Susan river. On the south side of Susan river, a little below the point where Piute creek flows into Susan river, are the lands of the defendant upon which its mill and millpond are situated. The lands of the interveners lie below all the lands of plaintiffs and defendant, along Susan river. The Cain ranch, the Long ranch, and the ranches of plaintiffs, except plaintiff Boggs, are riparian to Piute creek and for many years have been irrigated by the water of said creek. The Long ranch lies in a basin, most of it north of Piute creek. Near the northern boundary of the Long ranch there is a spring of water known as the Bagwell spring, which flows 68 inches of water in all seasons of the year. This spring is considerably higher than Piute creek, and the waters thereof flow in an almost southerly direction in a well-defined channel between well-defined banks and into Piute creek, and this spring is therefore tributary to Piute creek. None of the waters of Bagwell springs ever have or can reach the Cain ranch, which is entirely dependent for water upon Piute creek proper before the confluence of Bagwell springs branch with Piute creek. After the 1st of July of each year, the waters of Bagwell springs constitute practically all the waters of Piute creek, the waters of Piute creek above that point being used on the Cain ranch.

Up to the month of July, 1924, the waters of Bagwell springs were used for the irrigation of the Long ranch and the ranches of the plaintiffs, and what was left over went into Susan river and went down to the interveners. The Long ranch and the plaintiffs' ranches were settled about 1860. The Longs connected the first ditch with the Bagwell springs branch. After the waters were taken out by the Longs and applied to the land there would be a space of from 24 to 48 hours when the plaintiffs would get no water. Some time during that time, however, the waters of the spring branch, after irrigating the Long ranch, would of their own accord return to the stream and thence flow down Piute creek, and Piute creek, where it flowed over the lands of the plaintiffs, would have the usual amount of water, and during all of those years the plaintiffs have used the waters of Piute creek for raising orchards and gardens and for domestic purposes. This condition continued until the month of July, 1924. Appellant's millpond is on the south side of Susan river, almost opposite the confluence of Piute creek with Susan river. There is a ditch leading from Susan river into the millpond. This ditch comes out of Susan river above the point where Piute creek flows into Susan river. It does not appear that the millpond of defendant ever had a drop of water from Piute creek prior to July, 1924. At that date the defendant and appellant, by means of a cement dam and pipe line, conveyed the water directly from Bagwell springs to its millpond on the south side of Susan river. This pipe line runs to the east of all the lands of plaintiffs outside the watershed, and never a drop of this water can return to Piute creek or to the lands of plaintiffs. This action was brought to enjoin this diversion.

[1] The record presents the initial question. Is Bagwell springs a tributary of Piute creek? The argument presented by respondents is predicated upon the theory that it is such a tributary, and the appellant challenges that position and the finding of the trial court in consonance therewith. The findings of the court with reference to the matter is:

"That there is a certain tributary of said Piute creek which arises in the south half of section 19, township 30 north, range 12 east, being what is known as and called Bagwell springs, the water of which stream flows in a general southeasterly direction in a well-defined channel between well-defined banks into said Piute creek at a point above all of the lands of plaintiffs and above the points of diversion of all the plaintiffs from time immemorial has so flowed."

This finding is supported by the testimony of the witnesses Long, Whalen, Jensen, Jenkins, Brockman, and several others, and it is idle for appellant to attack it because some conflict appears in the evidence offered at the trial.

The next question presented is as to whether the appellant may divert the waters from this tributary of Piute creek outside the watershed and into its mill pond, so as to deprive plaintiffs of their riparian rights in Piute creek.

[2] Appellant claims that it and its predecessors have openly, notoriously, and adversely used the water of Bagwell springs for the irrigation of the Long ranch, and that they have acquired the riparian rights of plaintiffs by prescription. The finding above quoted, to the effect that the water of the springs would always return to the creek after about 24 hours of use for irrigation on the Long ranch, and the testimony appearing in the record supporting such finding completely answer the position of appellant upon this question.

The attack upon the findings regarding the diversion of all the water of Bagwell springs by appellant by means of its pipe line, and the carrying of the same outside the watershed, is answered by the pleadings, the appellant admitting such diversion of all the waters of said springs to its millpond, but contending merely that such waters were not tributary to Piute creek.

[3-6] Two theories are advanced by appellant for a reversal of this judgment. The contention is made that, as an upper riparian proprietor, it was entitled to divert the waters from the riparian land to the millpond. This position is clearly untenable. "A riparian proprietor on whose land a stream rises has no more right than other riparian proprietors." Weil, Water Rights, § 294, p. 453; Geddis v. Parrish, 1 Wash. 587, 21 P. 314; Neilson v. Sponer, 46 Wash. 14, 89 P. 155. The other contention is that a right to the water of the spring has been acquired by appellant by prescription. This contention is answered by the evidence referred to herein and by the findings of the court based thereon to the effect that the appellant, in irrigating the Long ranch, merely diminished the waters of Piute creek for a period of from 24 to 48 hours, and thereafter the water returned to the creek for the use and benefit of the lower riparian owners. The presumption is that in the use of water an upper riparian proprietor is exercising his riparian rights, and no title by prescription can be given unless it is brought home to the lower riparian proprietors that the upper riparian proprietor asserts a right other than his riparian right. Oliver v. Robnett, 190 Cal. 51, 210 P. 408; Peake v. Harris, 48 Cal. App. 363, 192 P. 310; Pabst v. Finmand, 190 Cal. 124, 211 P. 11. It is also true that, even though the appellant had acquired a prescriptive right to irrigate the Long ranch with the entire flow of Bagwell springs, it would not have an incidental right to use the water on land other than that for which the prescriptive right was acquired (Southern California Inv. Co. v. Wilshire, 144 Cal. 69, 77 P. 767), where such diversion resulted in injury to others (Civ. Code, § 1412). Prescriptive rights are stricti juris and should not be extended beyond the actual user. North Fork Water Co. v. Edwards, 121 Cal. 662, 54 P. 69. Since the prescriptive right is limited by the extent of the use which conferred the title, the place of use cannot be changed, where to do so would interfere with the rights of others. Southern Cal. Inv. Co. v. Wilshire, 144 Cal. 68, 77 P. 767. In Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 80, 41 P. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390, it was said:

"Upon the question of the right of the owners of the Hargrave & Comfort ditch to extend it five or six hundred feet over the northwest quarter of section 20, now the land of Cook, the better to facilitate the obtaining of their water, we do not deem it proper, upon this appeal, to do more than point out that, while an appropriator of water upon government land retains his rights when the land passes into private ownership, by virtue of the confirmatory statutes of the United States * * * and, while in the exercise of these rights, he may change the point of diversion to another place upon the servient tenement, he is nevertheless limited in so doing to the exigencies of the situation, and has no right to make such change arbitrarily and at will. He may do so when under certain circumstances it is required to enable him to take the amount of water to which he has ownership, and then only when 'others are not injured by the change.' Civ. Code, § 1412. His rights are the rights of the grantee of an easement, and extend, in the matter of changing the point of diversion, no further than the boundaries of the servient tenement, and even when entering upon this he is under obligation only to make reasonable changes with reasonable care, and also to repair, so far as possible, whatever damage his labors may have occasioned (Gale and Whately on Easements, 235); as to lands other than those subject to his easement, and as to other claimants and owners, he can make no change at all which injuriously affects them or their rights."

[7] It is contended by appellant that error was committed by the trial court in holding that plaintiffs' action was not barred by the provisions of the Water Commission Act of the state of California. The portion of said act relied upon is the following portion of section 11 thereof, as amended May 11, 1919 (Stats. of 1919, p. 513):

"If any portion of the waters of any stream shall not be put to a useful or beneficial purpose to or upon lands riparian to such stream for any continuous period of ten consecutive years after the passage of this act, such nonapplication shall be deemed to be conclusive presumption that the use of such portions of the waters of such stream is not needed upon said riparian lands for any useful or beneficial purpose."

Since the trial court found that within from 24 to 48 hours after the diversion of the water of the springs for use upon the Long ranch, said waters returned to the stream "and thus went on down Piute creek on said Long ranch, and thence through its natural course through the lands of the plaintiffs, and plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest have ever since about the same time, to wit, the year 1863, diverted and used the waters of said stream upon their said lands for the irrigation thereof and for domestic purposes," the above-quoted provision of the so-called Water Commission Act becomes immaterial.

[8] Appellant contends for a doctrine which has been designated "the balance of convenience," and urges that as its needs are very great for this water and its investment very large, those circumstances should weigh against the plaintiffs' rights, which have reference only to small pieces of land of comparatively little value. Such argument has no place in the law governing riparian rights. It was rejected in the case of Miller & Lux v. Maderia Canal & Irrigation Co., 155 Cal. 59, 99 P. 502, wherein it was said:

"The argument that these waters are of great value for the purposes of storage by appropriators and of small value to the lower riparian owners defeats itself. If the right sought to be taken be of small worth, the burden of paying for it will not be great. If, on the other hand, great benefits are conferred upon the riparian lands by the flow, there is all the more reason why these advantages should not without compensation be taken from the owners of these lands and transferred to others."

[9] Appellant also claims to be an appropriator of all the water of the springs. Apart from the fact that the appropriation, if such there was, was not made upon government land (Cave v. Taylor, 133 Cal. 566, 65 P. 1089; Holmes v. Nay, 186 Cal. 231, 199 P. 325; San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Co. v. Worswick, 187 Cal. 674, 203 P. 990), it is not the purpose of this action and it is not the effect of this judgment to deprive defendant and appellant of the use of the waters of the springs for irrigation of the Long ranch, but merely to enjoin it from diverting the waters from the watershed, and it is settled that even an appropriator of water may not change the point of diversion to the injury of others (Kidd v. Laird, 15 Cal. 163, 76 Am. Dec. 472; Butte T. M. Co. v. Morgan, 19 Cal. 609; Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 214, 31 P. 41; Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 72, 41 P. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390). Furthermore, under the appropriation doctrine, one acquires only the use of the water, and not the ownership in the corpus thereof. Ortman v. Dixon, 13 Cal. 34; McDonald v. Askew, 29 Cal. 201; Nevada County & Sacramento Coal Co. v. Kidd, 37 Cal. 282; Shenandoah Mining & Milling Co. v. Morgan, 106 Cal. 409, 39 P. 802. The water flowing off the Long ranch after 24 hours' use was therefore subject to appropriation by lower proprietors, and they used it to irrigate their lands, as shown by the testimony and findings.

[10, 11] The only remaining point to be considered is the contention of appellant that injunction was not the proper remedy; that damages only should have been allowed, if any relief was granted to the plaintiffs; and that plaintiffs have not shown damage. The trial court found the plaintiffs had been substantially damaged by the diversion, and this finding is supported by testimony set out in respondents' brief and copied from the record. However, riparian proprietors may restrain the taking of water to nonriparian land without showing damage. Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co. v. People's Ditch Co., 174 Cal. 446, 163 P. 497.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment is affirmed.

WEBB v. VERCOE. (L. A. 8550.)

Supreme Court of California. Aug. 12, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 8, 1927.

1. Trusts $\S$ 110—Evidence held to sustain findings of fact establishing resulting trust in land sold on foreclosure to mortgagee.

Regardless of whether action is considered one to declare resulting trust or to redeem property from foreclosure sale after expiration of statutory period, evidence that mortgagee agreed to buy land on foreclosure and accept payment out of income of property held to sustain court's findings of fact and judgment establishing resulting trust in favor of plaintiff.

2. Judgment $\S$ 251(1)—Issues under pleadings and submitted to court held sufficient to warrant declaring resulting trust in land purchased by mortgagee on foreclosure or permitting redemption after expiration of statutory period (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 580).

Issues as framed by pleadings and submitted to court held sufficient, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 580, to warrant either declaring resulting trust for mortgagee's repudiation of agreement to buy land on foreclosure and accept payment therefor out of income of property, or to warrant permitting redemption after expiration of statutory period.

3. Mortgages $\S$ 610—Trusts $\S$ 359(1)—Remedies by proceeding to declare resulting trust in property, purchased by mortgagee on foreclosure, and to redeem property after statutory period are practically same.

Remedies by proceeding against mortgagee purchasing on foreclosure to declare resulting trust and by proceeding to redeem from foreclosure after expiration of statutory period are practically same.

4. Trusts $\S$ 92½—Mortgagee's buying property on foreclosure with agreement to permit redemption by payment from income and repudiation of such contract creates resulting trust (Civ. Code, $\S$ 853).

Where mortgagee bought property at foreclosure sale with agreement to permit redemption therefor out of earnings of property and afterward repudiated such agreement, there was legal fraud giving rise to resulting trust, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 853, which need not be evidenced by writing.

5. Mortgages $\S$ 600(2)—In allowing redemption from mortgage foreclosure after statutory period, court may fix interest regardless of statute (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 702).

Proceeding to redeem from mortgage foreclosure after statutory period is equitable one, and in decree therefor court may fix terms which it thinks proper and is not governed as to interest by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 702, fixing rate 1 per cent. per month in case of redemption of realty.

6. Mortgages $\S$ 591(1)—Trusts $\S$ 100—Equitable owner may sue to redeem after expiration of statutory period or claim resulting trust (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 701).

In view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 701, giving judgment debtor right to redeem, equitable owner of property has right to insist on resulting trust through legal fraud of mortgagee repudiating agreement to buy property on foreclosure and accept payment out of earnings therefrom, or may assert right to redeem after expiration of statutory period.

7. Trusts $\S$ 359(1)—Action to establish resulting trust in land purchased by mortgagee on foreclosure held not to involve rule pertaining to express trusts.

Action to establish resulting trust in land because of mortgagee's repudiation of agreement to buy land on foreclosure and let payment be made out of income thereof, even if regarded as action to redeem after expiration of statutory period, did not involve rule pertaining to express trusts.

8. Perpetuities $\S$ 4(15)—Action to establish resulting trust on mortgagee's repudiating agreement to buy on foreclosure held not to involve perpetuities.

Action to establish resulting trust because of mortgagee's repudiating agreement to buy land on foreclosure and accept payment out of income thereof, even if regarded as action to redeem after expiration of statutory period, held not to involve law against perpetuities.

9. Equity $\S$ 65(1)—Doctrine of clean hands held not involved in action to establish resulting trust for mortgagee's repudiating agreement to buy on foreclosure and accept payment from income.

Action to establish resulting trust in lands for mortgagee's repudiation of agreement to buy land on foreclosure and permit redemption thereof out of income of property, even if regarded as action to redeem after expiration of statutory period, held not to involve doctrine of clean hands.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Lillie T. Webb against Adele Vercoe, to establish a resulting trust. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied. SHENK, J., votes for a rehearing.

Wm. Chambers and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jos. Musgrove and Carl B. Sturzenacker, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff declaring a resulting trust in real property standing in the name of defendant.

By the amended complaint it is alleged that on November 3, 1917, and for a long time prior thereto, plaintiff was the owner and in possession of certain real property, "subject to a first mortgage in the principal sum of $11,000, and to a second mortgage in favor of the defendant in the principal sum of $5,000"; that on said date the owner of said first mortgage began an action to foreclose same; that defendant proposed to plaintiff, who was his sister and who was unable to pay said incumbranches, that "said foreclosure suit be allowed to proceed to judgment, and that the property be sold * * * and that defendant would purchase the property for the benefit of plaintiff, and that the amount of said purchase price should be considered as a loan by the defendant to the plaintiff, and that plaintiff should remain in possession and the management of the said property, and should improve the same, and should receive from the income derived from the property a wage sufficient to enable her to live, and that the balance of the income, after payment of necessary expenses, should be turned over by the plaintiff to defendant, to be applied on account of the said loan, and that the defendant would, as soon as the amount of the said loan and interest at 7 per cent. per annum was paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, either from the proceeds of said property or otherwise, whether it took 5 or more years, convey the title of said property to the plaintiff, and that the defendant would hold the title to the said property in trust for the plaintiff, and as security for said loan, until such time as the said loan and interest were repaid, as hereinbefore alleged; that plaintiff having all confidence in the defendant, and relying upon the sisterly love and affection of the defendant, did accept the said proposal of defendant, and did permit the said foreclosure suit to proceed without making other effort to raise the money to redeem said property from such foreclosure."

By the answer this agreement was denied, but the court found its existence in practically the identical words of the complaint. The complaint also contained the allegation "that the legal title to said property on November 3, 1917, stood in the names of the plaintiff's three daughters, in trust for the benefit of plaintiff, who was the real owner thereof." This allegation, which was denied also, the court found to be true.

On stipulation of the parties the court appointed a referee to state the account between them, and his report was to the effect that the amount due defendant from plaintiff was the sum of $27,801.25. Thereafter the court gave its judgment declaring that defendant held the title to said real property involved in trust for plaintiff, and that upon payment by plaintiff to defendant of said sum of $27,801.25 within 90 days after entry of the judgment defendant should execute and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed of conveyance to said property free and clear of all incumbrances; that in case of her failure to do so, the clerk of the court be made a commissioner to execute such deed, the deed so executed by the clerk to operate as a transfer to plaintiff; that upon and after payment by plaintiff of said sum to defendant and a deed by said defendant or said clerk to plaintiff, defendant be restrained and enjoined from thereafter asserting any right, title, or interest in or to said property, and that plaintiff be entitled to re-enter possession of the premises, and for costs of suit.

The facts show that on the 3d day of November, 1917, a suit to foreclose the first mortgage on said property was filed, and thereafter the defendant, who held the junior mortgage thereon, also began an action to foreclose it; that a combined decree of foreclosure and sale was made and a sale under said foreclosure occurred on the 24th day of March, 1919, at which time defendant became a purchaser for the purchase price of $20,030.-35; that thereafter and on the 25th day of May, 1920, defendant received a sheriff's deed to the property.

[1] At the outset it must be stated that defendant urges that the evidence does not furnish proper legal support for the findings of fact made by the court. It is unnecessary to dwell at length upon the evidence, but we will set forth the following quotations gleaned from various letters which passed between plaintiff and defendant during the years 1918, 1919, and 1920:

In a letter dated April 18, 1918, plaintiff wrote defendant, who was in Europe at the time, as follows:

"You take the ranch over in your name so that no one can touch it and let me manage it at no expense to you. Rendering you a complete statement & account of all moneys spent by me on it and money made from produce, hogs, rabbits, etc. Pay all the money I can make into your bank to your credit until I gradually reduce the mortgages. I just see my way clear to make good money this year on hogs. When one stops to consider, I have done very well to have held my own this long and not lost everything. At least I have a fine deep well pumping plant that cost $3,000 practically all paid for, will have on May 11th, worth many thousands to that land. If Sentous forecloses, this fine property is sure to be lost as it is impossible to renew mortgages at this time. Much expense can be also saved by your taking up the mortgage right now. I pray and trust you will save the place to enjoy yourself some day as much as any one else."

To the above letter defendant replied:

"* * * Upon receipt of your letter I cabled Mr. Harris [attorney for defendant] as follows: 'Save property Deed to me, Mrs. Webb given management, Revert to her repayment debt. * * * * *'"

Again she wrote plaintiff:

"I am glad to also hear that you are living out on the ranch and your account of the development of the trees, etc., also of local conditions, is most interesting."

Again:

"You are doing the only possible thing to bring you that success, and that is by living on the place and giving everything your personal attention and get out of debt as quickly as you can. That, I agree with you, is the best way to make money and gain success."

Again:

"I note all you say re your plans, etc., also hope for the discovery of oil. I pray with you—that all may come out happily in the end. * * * To save the ranch exhausts my resources—as you can imagine. * * *

Again:

"Now please put all your energy and thought into making the ranch a success and at the same time provide a good and comfortable home for yourself and your daughters—until such time as you can buy it back."

Lastly, and after the property had been purchased, defendant wrote:

"If you read over my former letters you will see that I told you that you are to have every chance of redeeming your property upon payment of what I have spent in buying it in—which was to save it for you and your children, if possible. If years go by, it will be the same with the added interest—so I don't think you need worry yourself as to my intentions. My happiness will be to see you and your children in possession—free of debt."

The oral testimony given at the trial was also of such a character that the court, viewing the whole case, was well warranted in concluding that the written declarations of the defendant were to the effect that plaintiff need not attempt to redeem her property from the foreclosure sale, but could rely upon the defendant to furnish the money to purchase at such sale and to thereafter take a sheriff's deed, treating the transaction as a loan and holding the legal title as security for its repayment; this, too, upon the terms found by the court, to wit, interest at 7 per cent. per annum; and that plaintiff should have an indefinite time within which to repay defendant and secure thereby title to the property.

Counsel for respondent contends that the transaction between the parties forms an express trust, and that in the correspondence between them may be found the full requirements of the written declaration thereof required by the statute. He disclaims that it is an action to redeem from a mortgage foreclosure sale after the statutory limit for redemption upon a showing of grounds for equitable relief, and also disclaims that the transaction was one creating a resulting trust in real property.

[2, 3] Appellant, on the other hand, spends her efforts in attempting to show that the transaction was not one creating an express trust, and that the writings are insufficient to support such contention. We find it unnecessary to dwell upon this particular phase of the doctrine of trusts, for we have reached the conclusion that the transaction may be properly characterized both as conduct and statements, oral and written, out of which the law creates a resulting trust, and also as an agreement to permit plaintiff to redeem property from foreclosure sale after expiration of the statutory period therefor. Indeed, the two remedies are practically the same. We regard the issues as framed by the pleadings and as submitted to the court on the trial to be amply sufficient, under section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to warrant either or both of these conclusions. In Bradley v. Bradley, 165 Cal. 237, 240, 241, 131 P. 750, 751, it is said:

"It is a matter of indifference under this pleading whether it be said that plaintiff is seeking to enforce a voluntary trust which has been repudiated by the trustee or whether it is seeking to enforce an involuntary trust arising in law from that repudiation. In its creation the trust was voluntary, and however at variance it may be thought to be with the mandate of the statute as to the creation of trusts in land, it is of such character that equity will not permit the trustee to take advantage of the existing confidential relations in which the trust itself originated and by repudiating the trust obtain an unconscionable advantage over the confiding trustor and beneficiary. So numerous are cases upon this subject that it must suffice to refer to Lauricella v. Lauricella, 161 Cal. 61, 118 P. 430; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 583, 108 P. 506; Jones v. Jones, 140 Cal. 587, 74 P. 143; Kimball v. Tripp, 136 Cal. 631, 69 P. 428."

[4] It is not controlling that respondent disclaims the transaction to be what we think it is, for we are taught that oftentimes the right hand may not "know what the left hand doeth." Testing the sufficiency of the transaction as one creating a resulting trust and, therefore, one which need not be in writing, we are able to appeal to a long line of decisions in this state to the effect that a transaction such as the one here under consideration will be properly denominated a loan by defendant to plaintiff, and a taking by defendant of the legal title to the property in controversy as security for repayment thereof, and the repudiation of this relation by the defendant a legal fraud giving rise to a resulting trust in the property. Civ. Code, § 853.

In the case of Sandfoss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 481, 487, a verbal agreement was made by two of several judgment creditors with an execution debtor to purchase all of the property involved at the sheriff's sale for the benefit of said execution debtor, and to advance their own money, if necessary for that purpose, and when they should have repaid themselves for said advances, with interest, out of the rents, issues, and profits derived from the property, to reconvey the portions unsold to the execution debtor. The court there said:

"It is well settled that where one purchases and pays for property with his own money, and takes the deed in the name of another, a trust by operation of law is raised, and the statute of frauds does not apply. * * *

"If, however, we consider the averments of the complaint in the light which is most favorable to the defendants, we have a verbal agreement on their part with an execution debtor, whose land is about to be sold by the sheriff, to purchase it with their own funds, and hold it for his benefit. Such an agreement is equivalent to a loan of the money and a taking of the title as security for its repayment; or an agreement by one person to purchase land for the benefit of another, under circumstances which would amount to a fraud upon the latter, if the former was allowed to repudiate his promise, and, therefore not within the statute of frauds.

"In relation to such a contract the High Court of Errors and Appeals of the State of Mississippi said: 'It is not now an open question that when a party agrees before the sale to purchase property about to be sold under an execution against a party, and to give such party the benefit of the purchase, that the agreement is binding and will be enforced. The defendant, upon the faith of such an agreement, may have ceased his efforts to raise the money for the purpose of paying off the execution, and thus preventing a sale of his property. It will not do to say that the party promising was moved merely by friendly or benevolent considerations, and may, therefore, at his option, decline a compliance with his agreement. Such considerations constitute the foundation of almost every trust, and the trustee should be held to account as nearly as possible in the same spirit in which he originally contracted.'"

In the case of Brown v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 589, 593, 126 P. 493, 495, defendant loaned plaintiffs the amount necessary for them to complete the purchase of certain lands, the lands, however, being conveyed to her as security for the money so loaned, upon the understanding that she should hold same in trust for said plaintiffs until a reconveyance was demanded by them, or the land sold and the money repaid to her, plaintiffs at all times having possession of the property. The court said:

"The substance of the cause of action thus set forth is that the consideration for the transfer of the land was paid by Frank Spencer, John Spencer, and the plaintiffs, and the conveyance thereof was made to Eleanor Spencer. In such cases a trust is presumed to result in favor of the persons paying the consideration, and the grantee will be declared a trustee for them as to the land. Civ. Code, § 853. The loan of the money by Eleanor to the purchasers was, in legal effect, a transfer of the money to them. The consequence was that when the money was paid in settlement of the purchase price, it was their money, and not Eleanor's, that was so paid. The fact that it was paid directly to the vendors by her agent does not alter the legal effect of the transaction. The transfer being made to Eleanor, she became a trustee holding title to the land for the other interested parties. No writing was necessary to create a trust of this character. It is a trust which the law implies from the facts of the case and may be created without writing. The case falls exactly within the rule of the aforesaid section of the Civil Code. Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 546, 34 P. 113; Hidden v. Jordan, 21 Cal. 99; Millard v. Hathaway, 27 Cal. 139; Sandfoss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 486; Walton v. Karnes, 67 Cal. 255, 7 P. 676; Ward v.

Matthews, 73 Cal. 16, 14 P. 604; Hellman v. Messmer, 75 Cal. 170, 16 P. 766; Moultrie v. Wright, 154 Cal. 523, 98 P. 237; Title, etc. [Ins. & Trust] Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 491, 111 P. 360. Upon the facts alleged the plaintiffs were entitled to the relief prayed for."

In the case of O'Rourke v. Skellenger, 169 Cal. 270, 272, 146 P. 633, 634, defendant agreed with the heirs of a deceased mortgagor that he would advance money and buy the land involved at the foreclosure sale, thereafter holding it in trust for the benefit of the estate and the heirs. The court said:

"The decisions of this court establish the proposition that, under the circumstances stated, the defendant will be held bound as trustee of the land for the benefit of the heirs of McCabe, and that in equity he is entitled only to be reimbursed for his outlays, with interest, with a lien on the land to secure him in the repayment thereof. The consideration for the purchase of the mortgage from Forster, and of the land at the foreclosure sale, is, under the circumstances stated, deemed to have been paid by the heirs, and a resulting trust is created accordingly. The rule is stated in Brown v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 592, 593, 126 P. 493, and many of our decisions in which may be found illustrations of the applications of the rule, are there cited."

In the case of Parker v. Catron, 120 Ky. 145, 148, 85 S. W. 740, 741, 742 (117 Am. St. Rep. 575), defendant, pursuant to an oral agreement, purchased at a judicial sale for plaintiff land of which plaintiff was in possession, and in which he owned an interest. The court said:

"It is earnestly maintained that the agreement of Catron, being in parol, is within the statute of frauds. * * * Constructive trusts are held not within the statute because they rest in the end on the doctrine of estoppel, and the operation of an estoppel is never affected by the statute of frauds. Morris v. Shannon [12 Bush] 75 Ky. 89. If Parker had not misled Catron, he might have gotten some one else to buy in the land for him; and if Parker had not let him deal with the land as his own, and held himself out as having bought it in for him, he might still have protected himself. To permit Parker to shield himself behind the statute of frauds, and keep the land, would be to sanction a fraud and deny effect to familiar principles of estoppel. In Martin v. Martin [16 B. Mon.] 55 Ky. 8, Draffin bought in Martin's land at a commissioner's sale for him under a verbal agreement to this effect, when there was no right of redemption at such sales. It was held that Draffin held the land in trust for Martin, and that the trust was not affected by the statute of frauds. The same conclusion was reached in Miller v. Antle [2 Bush] 65 Ky. 407, 92 Am. Dec. 495, and Green v. Ball [4 Bush] 67 Ky. 586. It is insisted that these cases are not in point, for the reason that Catron here did not own the land. But he had it in possession and was living upon it. He had a lien on it for the money which he had paid to redeem it from the execution sale. The arrangement with Parker was made to protect his interest, and created no less a constructive trust when his interest in the land was equitable than if he had held the legal title. It would be no less a fraud on Catron to permit Parker to keep the land in the one case than the other. The estoppel arises equally in either case. An agency to sell land may be created by parol. Talbot v. Bowen [1 A. K. Marsh.] 8 Ky. 437, 10 Am. Dec. 747; Isaacs v. Gearheart, 12 B. Mon. (51 Ky.) 231. A verbal partnership to buy land is also not within the statute. Garth v. Davis & Johnson [120 Ky. 106], 85 S. W. 692, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 505 [117 Am. St. Rep. 571]."

Perry on Trusts and Trustees (6th Ed.) vol. 1, § 171, pp. 268, 269, gives the situation here in an illustration of the doctrine as follows:

"Thus, where one buys land at an execution sale, or sale under a trust deed, under an agreement with the debtor that the latter may redeem, the purchaser holds in trust; it would be a fraud to allow him to repudiate the contract. (a) Mere declarations and admissions of the party to be charged accompanying the transfer of title have been held sufficient to raise a trust."

Treating the transaction as one to redeem the property from the foreclosure sale after expiration of the statutory period of redemption, we find the principles involved fully discussed in the three Bunting Cases, from which the following quotations are taken:

The first case, Benson v. Bunting, is reported in 127 Cal. 532, 59 P. 991, 78 Am. St. Rep. 81. Plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mortgage employed defendant's attorneys to make the bid at the sale, and misrepresented through them to defendant that he had twelve months in which to redeem. Defendant, relying on the truth of the representations, neglected to redeem within the six months' statutory period, but tendered a full redemption within twelve months, which tender was refused. It was held that said refusal operated as a fraud upon defendant; that he was entitled to equitable relief and plaintiff was estopped to insist upon the statutory period on the ground that defendant was lulled by his assurances into a false security, notwithstanding the assurances were not in writing, and were made without consideration. In the second case, Benson v. Bunting, 141 Cal. 462, 75 P. 59, the above decision was upheld notwithstanding there was no specific finding therein made that plaintiffs offered to redeem. In the third action, Bunting v. Haskell, 152 Cal. 426, 429, 93 P. 110, 111; which involved questions in connection with tender of the money necessary to effect redemption within thirty days under the judgment rendered in said above-mentioned second action, the court said:

"But was the redemption authorized by the decree in Benson v. Bunting [141 Cal. 462, 75 P. 59] the redemption provided for in section 702 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure? As a general rule, the redemption allowed by statute cannot be effected after the expiration of the statutory period allowed therefor. Tilley

v. Bonney, 123 Cal. 118, 123, 55 P. 798; Davidson v. Gaston, 16 Minn. 202, 230 (Gil. 202). It is well settled, however, that courts of equity may, upon a proper showing of fraud, mistake or other circumstances appealing to the discretion of the chancellor, relieve judgment debtors whose property has been sold on execution from a failure to redeem within the statutory period. In such cases equity 'in its discretion will grant relief on a proper bill, and allow the judgment debtor to redeem after the expiration of the redemption period.' 17 Cyc. 1330; Grafam v. Burgess, 117 U. S. 180, 6 S. Ct. 686, [29 L. Ed. 839]; Brance v. Foust, 130 Ind. 538, 30 N. E. 631; Smith v. Huntoon, 134 Ill. 24, 24 N. E. 971, 23 Am. St. Rep. 646."

To the same effect, see Wallace v. Dodd, 136 Cal. 210, 211, 68 P. 693.

[5] The evidence is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that defendant agreed to extend the period of redemption beyond the time fixed by the statute, but in this behalf she earnestly insists that the court should have fixed the interest charge at 1 per cent. per month from date of sale to date of commencement of this action. In this she is in error, for the proceeding to redeem after the statutory period is an equitable one and bears no relation whatever to section 702 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A court of equity may, therefore, in its decree fix such terms for redemption as it may think proper and is not governed by the provisions of said section. See three Bunting Cases hereinbefore cited, especially Benson v. Bunting, 141 Cal. 462, 465, 75 P. 59, 60, where it was said:

"Appellant contends that the court erred in fixing the amount of interest which respondents must pay in order to redeem, and that more interest should have been required. The court allowed 2 per cent. per month interest during the six months' statutory period of redemption, and thereafter the legal rate of interest of 7 per cent. per annum. The contention of appellant is that 2 per cent. per month should have been allowed until the time of actual redemption under the judgment; but this contention is not maintainable. Appellant having denied the right of redemption and prevented the exercise of it, cannot recover the extraordinary interest which respondents would have avoided if they could have exercised their right of redemption. Indeed, respondents argue with great force that they should not have been required to pay the 7 per cent. per annum interest, or any interest at all, during the long period after the repudiation of their right to redeem; but respondents are not appealing, and we cannot consider any alleged error against them. However, the appellant, if the case was rightly decided against him in other respects, has no just reason to complain as to the amount of interest allowed him."

See, also, Bunting v. Haskell, supra, where it is said:

"But such redemption, when authorized by the decree of a court of equity, finds its support, not in the provisions of the statute allowing redemption within a given time as a matter of right, but in the provisions of the decree granting to a party the privilege of redeeming upon terms fixed by the court as just."

[6] The point is also made that inasmuch as plaintiff owns only the equitable title to the estate she may not assert either the right to redeem nor the claim to a resulting trust in the real property. This contention, however, is without merit, as a judgment debtor has a right to redeem. Code of Civil Procedure, § 701. And as the equitable owner of the property, plaintiff has the right to insist upon a resulting trust. Parker v. Catron, supra.

[7-9] Neither the rule pertaining to express trusts nor the law against perpetuities is involved in this action. The same may be said about the doctrine of "clean hands." As above stated, treating the transaction either as a resulting trust or as an action in equity to redeem from judicial sale, the pleadings, findings, judgment, and evidence are all amply sufficient.

85 Cal. App. 233

NORTON et al. v. HOULETTE.

NORTON v. SAME.

(Civ. 5056.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 25, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1002—Jury's finding on conflicting evidence that automobilist injuring bicyclist was negligent held conclusive on appeal.

In action for injury to bicyclist, jury's finding in effect that defendant automobilist was negligent in colliding with bicycle on which boy was riding while holding to another automobile, based on conflicting evidence, held conclusive on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1064(1)—Instruction to consider probable permanent effect of plaintiff's injuries and probable likelihood that he would be less able to earn money held not prejudicial as fixing uncertain damages (Civ. Code, § 3283).

In action for personal injuries to boy from being run over by automobile, instruction that jury should determine damages which plaintiff might suffer because of impaired or diminished earning capacity and to consider probable permanent effect of his injuries and probable likelihood, if any, that he would be less able to earn money has reference to determining extent of injury, and, while not to be commended, was not prejudicial as making damages fixed therefor uncertain, contrary to Civ. Code, § 3283.

3. Appeal and error ⇨882(12)—Defendant requesting instruction on last clear chance cannot complain of instruction based thereon.

In action for personal injuries to boy from being struck by automobile, defendant, at whose request instruction was given concerning situation involving last clear chance, cannot complain of instruction involving doctrine of last clear chance.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨706(8)—Instruction allowing recovery if automobilist ought to have realized bicyclist's inability to escape from dangerous position and automobilist had last clear chance to avoid injury held proper, under evidence.

In action against automobilist for running over boy who was riding on bicycle and holding to rear of automobile in front of defendant's, evidence held to render proper instruction that if defendant was aware of plaintiff's dangerous situation so that he realized or ought to have realized plaintiff's inability to escape therefrom, and if defendant had last clear chance to avoid injury by exercise of ordinary care and failed to do so, to find for plaintiff.

5. Negligence ⇨83—To render "last clear chance" doctrine applicable, person responsible for injury, seeing or knowing of peril or facts reasonably showing peril, must have neglected ordinary care to avoid injury.

Before doctrine of "last clear chance" applies, it must appear that person responsible for injury, seeing or knowing peril of injured person or knowing facts from which reasonable man would believe him to be in peril, has not used ordinary care to avoid injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Separate actions by Mrs. Mark Norton and husband, and by Harry Flood Norton, an infant, by Mrs. Mark Norton, guardian ad litem, against P. E. Houlette, consolidated for trial and on appeal. From a judgment for plaintiffs in each case, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Garnett and Joe Crider, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Barksdale D'Orr and G. A. McElroy, both of Los Angeles, and F. M. Bottorff, of Berkeley, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. One of the actions herein involved was brought by the guardian of a minor for damages arising out of a personal injury alleged to have been sustained by said minor and to have been caused by and through the negligence of defendant. The other action was brought by the parents of the minor against defendant to recover damages on account of expenses incurred by said parents in connection with the medical treatment of the minor, made necessary by the injuries received by him. The two cases were consolidated for the purpose of trial, and defendant appeals from a judgment against him in each of such cases.

Briefly stated, the essential facts appear to be that Henry Flood Norton (the minor) was riding a bicycle near the left rear wheel of an automobile and with his right hand was holding onto such automobile, while with his left hand he grasped the handlebar of the bicycle on which he was riding; that in an automobile driven and owned by him, defendant was closely following plaintiff on his bicycle and the automobile onto which plaintiff was holding; that by reason of the negligence of either plaintiff or defendant, plaintiff fell from the bicycle and was run over by the automobile operated by defendant and received the injuries for which compensation was sought from defendant in the action herein.

[1] One of the points made by appellant for reversal of the judgment is that neither of the verdicts rendered by the jury is supported by the evidence. In that connection it need only be said that on the trial of the action evidence was received in effect that in attempting to drive his automobile around or past plaintiff and the automobile onto which he was holding, without any fault on the part of plaintiff, the automobile driven by defendant collided with the bicycle on which plaintiff was riding, thus causing plaintiff to fall to the ground, and thereupon that one of the front wheels of defendant's automobile passed over the body of plaintiff, which resulted in the injuries of which he complained. While in volume, perhaps more evidence was received which tended to show due care on the part of defendant than was introduced which would justify a finding of negligence, nevertheless, under well-established principles of law, the decision reached by the jury in the premises is conclusive as to the facts.

[2] It is next contended by appellant that the trial court erred in giving to the jury the following instruction:

"I instruct you that if you find for the plaintiff, Harry Flood Norton, it will be your duty to determine from the evidence the amount of his damage which would be compensation for his injuries. In doing so, you should carefully consider from the evidence the nature, extent, and character of the injury sustained. You should also determine whether or not the injuries to the plaintiff are permanent; and you should allow him for all damages which naturally and directly resulted from his injuries, whether in the past or in the future. You should allow him such damages for bodily pain, suffering, and mental anguish as under the evidence you believe him entitled to, and you should allow him such damages for physical disability, if any such there be, as from the evidence you believe him entitled to.

"The law establishes no exact rule by which to fix the amount of damages for bodily pain, suffering, and mental anguish, but leaves it to you to determine from the evidence the reasonable amount thereof. The measure of such damages is the fair and impartial opinion of the jurors as made up from the evidence under the instruction of the court.

"If you should find from the evidence that the plaintiff will suffer damage by reason of impairment or diminished capacity for earning money, then in estimating this element of plaintiff's damage you will take into consideration the character of his injuries, their probable permanent effect, if any, upon his strength, endurance, and activity, and the probable likelihood, if any, that he would be less able to earn money after he has become 21 years of age, or after being emancipated by his parents (that is, permitted to work for himself) before reaching the age of 21."

Appellant directs particular attention to the language of the instruction which authorizes the jury in determining the damages which the plaintiff might suffer by reason of impaired or diminished earning capacity, to consider the "probable permanent effect" of plaintiff's injuries, and the "probable likelihood, if any," that plaintiff would be less able to earn money, etc. Reliance by appellant is principally placed in the case of Melone v. Sierra Railway Co. of California, 151 Cal. 113, 91 P. 522, where an instruction was condemned which permitted the jury to take into consideration such physical and mental suffering as the plaintiff "may undergo in the future." It was there pointed out that section 3283 of the Civil Code permitted such damages only as had already resulted or which were certain to result in the future.

As a limitation upon the language of the instruction to which appellant has directed attention, it will be noted that the instruction also contained the following:

"You should also determine whether or not the injuries to the plaintiff are permanent, and you should allow him for all damages which actually (naturally) and directly resulted from his injuries, whether in the past or in the future."

By consulting the dictionary authorities, it will be seen that in the use of the word "actually" the jury was instructed to establish as a fact the resulting damage, and by the use of the word "directly" was limited to what grew out of the particular injury in question. The further admonition to the jury was that in arriving at the damage, it must consider the evidence, and if it should be found that the plaintiff would suffer future damage by reason of impairment or diminished capacity for earning money, then, in estimating that element of plaintiff's damage, the jury might take into consideration the character of plaintiff's injuries, their probable permanent effect, if any, upon his strength, endurance, and activity, and the probable likelihood, if any, that he would be less able to earn money, etc. It thus appears that the jury having reached a conclusion as to the extent of the injury, it then was authorized to fix the damage, which must be certain, under section 3283 of the Civil Code. For the damage, the jury was directed that it must look to the evidence—the person's capacity to earn money, etc. In other words, the use of the words "probable" and "likelihood" have reference to determining the extent of the injury, and not to the element of fixing the damage resulting therefrom. While, as contended by respondent, upon an analysis of the several parts of the requested instruction, including that part thereof to which reference has just been had, and upon a proper construction being placed upon the language thereof to which objection is made by appellant, the instruction as a whole may be distinguished from the instruction under consideration in the Melone Case—in view of the fact that by certain other cases decided by the appellate and the Supreme Courts of this state, instructions containing language which apparently was as much in conflict with the literal language of section 3283 of the Civil Code as is the wording to which appellant objects of the instruction here under consideration, were upheld—in the instant case, we are constrained to rule that while not to be commended, the instruction of which complaint is made was not prejudicial to the rights of defendant.

In the case of Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos Interurban Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 379, 388, 104 P. 986, 990, the jury was given an instruction which, among other things, contained the following language:

"* * * You are the judges of the fact as to the extent and severity of the injuries sustained by the plaintiff, and also as to the fact of the existence of neurasthenia, or traumatic neurosis, as well as the degree of such disease, and of the probability of its permanency. * * *"

In commenting on that portion of the instruction to which attention has been directed, among other things, the court said:

"The theory of learned counsel for appellant apparently is that the jury were practically told by this instruction that they might allow damages for such future loss as they thought might 'possibly or probably' follow on account of the injuries, the true rule in this regard being, as stated in Melone v. Sierra Ry. Co. [of California] 151 Cal. 117 (91 P. 522), that plaintiff can recover only 'such damages as by the evidence it is reasonably certain he will suffer in the future.' We do not so construe the instruction. It was not an instruction on the subject of damages at all. * * * The whole purpose and effect of this instruction was to impress upon the jury that they were the sole judges as to the extent and severity of the injuries sustained, the then condition of the plaintiff in the respect specified and the probability of its permanency, and that in all these matters the burden was on the plaintiff to establish his case by a preponderance of evidence. It was nowhere intimated to the jury that they might award damages for future losses which were only possible or probable and not reasonably certain to ensue."

In Rouse v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 27 Cal. App. 772, 774, 151 P. 164, an instruction to the jury was upheld which contained a statement of law that "the jury will consider what, if anything, has been or will probably be the plaintiff's loss of earning power;" and a similar conclusion was reached by the Supreme Court in Stein v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 159 Cal. 368, 373, 113 P. 663, 665, with reference to a part of an instruction to the jury that it might consider "whether the injury was temporary in its nature, or was likely to be permanent in its character." Likewise, in Walker v. Southern Pac. Co., 162 Cal. 123, 121 P. 369, where it appeared that the jury was instructed as to the various elements of damages which might be considered, including "the pecuniary loss likely to be sustained by him (plaintiff) during life."

In discussing the feature of probabilities as an item of damage, in Ruppel v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 1 Cal. App. 670, 82 P. 1073, 1074, the following is quoted from Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) vol. 4, § 1263:

"If they [the jury] are satisfied from the history of the family, or the intrinsic probabilities of the case, that they were sustained by the loss of bodily care or intellectual culture, or moral training, which the mother had before supplied, they are at liberty to allow for it."

And see Storris v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 134 Cal. 91, 66 P. 72; Brown v. Beck, 63 Cal. App. 686, 697, 220 P. 14; Jones v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 54 Cal. App. 744, 754, 202 P. 919.

[3] It is also urged by appellant that the trial court erred in giving to the jury an instruction involving the doctrine of "last clear chance." The record, however, shows that at the request of defendant an instruction was given to the jury concerning the identical situation to which he now makes objection. In such circumstances it is clear that appellant is in no position to complain.

[4] Aside from that fact, however, evidence was introduced by defendant on the trial of the action, in substance, that as defendant in his automobile was following plaintiff on his bicycle, defendant saw the front wheel of the bicycle collide with the left rear wheel of the automobile on which plaintiff was holding, which caused plaintiff to fall to the ground. Other evidence in the case in effect tended to show that after plaintiff was thrown from his bicycle it would have been possible for defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, to avoid injuring plaintiff. Accordingly, it is clear that an instruction to the jury, correctly stating the principle of law embraced in the doctrine of "last clear chance," was appropriate. The instruction to which appellant takes exception was as follows:

"I instruct you that if you believe from the evidence that at the time of said injury the plaintiff, Harry Flood Norton, was negligent, and as a result of said negligence he was in a situation of danger from which he could not escape by the exercise of ordinary care, or of which danger he was unaware, and that the defendant, P. T. Houlette, was aware of plaintiff, Harry Flood Norton's, dangerous situation, under such circumstances that he realized or ought to have realized the boy's inability to escape therefrom (italics are ours), and that defendant, P. T. Houlette, had a clear chance to avoid injuring plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care, and that defendant, P. T. Houlette, failed to do so, then you will find for plaintiff. But, if plaintiff became aware of the danger and was able to escape by the exercise of ordinary care, but failed to do so, he cannot blame the burden of the resulting injury upon the defendant. In that case your verdict should be for defendant."

Appellant's criticism is especially directed to the words italicized in the instruction to wit, "or ought to have realized the boy's inability to escape therefrom."

[5] It may be said that in the abstract the law is well settled that before the doctrine of "last clear chance" will apply, it must appear that the person responsible for the injury, seeing or knowing of the peril of the injured person, or knowing facts from which a reasonable man would believe him to be in peril, has not used ordinary care to avoid the injury. Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, 175 Cal. 1, 5, 164 P. 798, and cases there cited.

Part of the testimony given by the defendant included the following:

"A. And when this yellow roadster came up alongside the car he (plaintiff) twisted his wheel, his front wheel of his bicycle around, and touched the wheel of the car; I saw him, he fell in a pile on the road with his wheel on top of him, and I was at that time, oh, I should say 18 or 20 feet behind him at that time, going at a speed of about 20 miles an hour, and I threw my brakes, my emergency brake, threw out my clutch, my foot brake; at this time I threw my car to the left and tried to avoid him; my front wheel passed over him. * * *

"Q. When did you begin to put on your brakes? A. Just as soon as the boy fell, I suppose possibly I might have run along 3 or 4 feet, you might say, before I got my brakes on."

It thus becomes evident not only that defendant "ought to have realized the boy's inability to escape," but that as a matter of fact he actually knew of the boy's extreme peril and, as might have been deduced by the jury from his testimony, exercised ordinary care to prevent the happening of the accident. It therefore is manifest that that portion of the instruction to which objection is made resulted in no prejudice to the rights of defendant. But, in addition thereto, in the case of Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 700, 218 P. 36, 37, the Supreme Court, in discussing the rule here under consideration made the following statement of law:

"The last clear chance rule presupposes: That the plaintiff has been negligent; that as a result thereof she is in a situation of danger from which she cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care; that the defendant is aware of her dangerous situation under such circumstances that he realizes, or ought to realize, her inability to escape therefrom; that he then has a clear chance to avoid injuring her by the exercise of ordinary care, and fails to do so."

Considering the facts and the law, it cannot be said that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court either in the giving of the instruction as a whole or in including therein the words to which attention has been directed.

As the judgment rendered in the action brought by the parents of the minor against defendant depended for its soundness upon the validity of the judgment in the action brought by the guardian of the minor, it follows that each of such judgments should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

Allegation in answer of auto stage company that accident, wherein plaintiff was injured while passenger on company's bus, was due solely to third party's negligence, held to constitute an affirmative defense under Code Civ. Proc. § 437.

3. Carriers ⚡316(4)—Bus company held to have burden of proving affirmative defense that accident injuring passenger was due to third party's negligence (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1869, 1981).

It is essential to a statement of a cause of action for damages resulting from negligence that the defendant's negligence be alleged.

7. Carriers ⚡316(4)—Passenger held not relieved of burden of proving bus company's negligence because company had burden of proving affirmative defense.

In passenger's action against auto stage company for injuries sustained from collision, plaintiff is not relieved of burden of proving his case by clear preponderance of evidence by the fact that defendant pleads an affirmative defense in addition to a want of negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by John J. Schropshire against the Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert and B. P. Gibbs, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendants Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, a corporation, and George L. Toomey from a judgment entered against them upon a verdict of a jury in the sum of $15,000.

The plaintiff sustained severe personal injuries as a result of a collision between an auto stage of defendant corporation upon which plaintiff was a passenger for hire, and a Ford automobile. Said accident occurred in the said city of Los Angeles. At the time and place of said collision said auto stage was being operated by defendant George L. Toomey, an employee of defendant corporation. The defendants' first and principal ground urged for a reversal of the judgment is that the trial court erred in instructing the jury upon the burden of proof and the preponderance of the evidence. In order to understand this point, it will be necessary to refer to the pleadings.

Plaintiff, among other things, alleges in his complaint (paragraph II):

"That on the 23d day of September, 1923, the plaintiff was being carried as a passenger for hire by said defendant corporation in one of its stages, and while the same was proceeding southerly on Ventura boulevard, the said stage was so negligently operated by the defendants, that at the intersection of Woodley avenue with said boulevard and in said intersection the defendant corporation's said stage struck a Ford automobile being operated easterly by one W. W. Grove, and thereupon left the highway upon said intersection, struck a pole at or near the southeast corner thereof, and ran into a palm tree, and was wrecked, and plaintiff was injured. * * *"

Paragraph IV:

"That in said accident, caused alone by the negligence of the defendants as aforesaid, plaintiff was hurt in his health, strength, and activity," etc.

The defendants by their answer make specific denial of the allegations of negligence alleged in plaintiff's complaint, and allege in a separate paragraph of their answer as follows:

"Further answering plaintiff's complaint, these defendants allege that said accident was due solely and alone to the careless and negligent manner in which the car of W. W. Grove was then and there operated, in that said W. W. Grove was then and there teaching or attempting to teach a probable purchaser of said automobile how to drive and operate said automobile."

This question is therefore squarely presented: Does the above-quoted portion of defendants' answer bring into the case new matter constituting an affirmative defense, or is said allegation merely supplemental to the denial of negligence and superfluous?

[1] The Code provides that the answer shall contain:

"1. A general or specific denial of the material allegations of the complaint controverted by the defendant. 2. A statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim." Section 437, Code Civ. Proc.

The expression, "new matter constituting a defense," as used in the Code, refers to something relied on by a defendant which is not put in issue by plaintiff. 21 Cal. Jur. 132. If the facts referred to in an answer constitute no part of the plaintiff's cause of action, then they come clearly within the definition of new matter used in the Code. Bank of Paso Robles v. Blackburn, 2 Cal. App. 146, 83 P. 262.

[2] Measuring the answer by these rules, it seems clear that the defendants, in addition to a special denial of any negligence on their part, have further alleged that the accident and resulting injuries to plaintiff were caused solely and alone by the carelessness and negligence of the operator of the Ford car, which brings into the case new matter not raised by the complaint, which constitutes an affirmative defense.

[3] The law in this state is well settled that the burden is on the defendants to prove new matter alleged as an affirmative defense. Sections 1869 and 1981, Code Civ. Proc.; Valente v. Sierra Railway Co. of California, 151 Cal. 534, 91 P. 481; Wilson v. California Cent. R. Co., 94 Cal. 172, 29 P. 861, 17 L. R. A. 685; 10 Cal. Jur. 786, 787, and cases there cited.

[4] The instruction complained of reads as follows:

"The defendant states in its defense that the accident was due solely to the negligence and carelessness of the driver of the Ford car, the car of Grove, and the burden is upon the defendant to prove that. That is an affirmative issue, and the burden is upon the defendant to prove that defense by a preponderance of the evidence in the whole case. Unless you find from a preponderance of the evidence on the whole case that this defense is made out, or if you find that the evidence is equally balanced, you will find against the defendant on that issue."

The appellant contends that this instruction is erroneous, for the reason that it imposes the burden upon the defendants of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the accident was due solely to the negligence of the driver of the Ford car, thereby in effect requiring the defendants to prove that it was in no way responsible for the accident, and wholly ignored the well-settled rules in this state that the burden of proof is always upon the plaintiff throughout the trial of the case to prove the negligence of the defendants, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. With this contention we cannot agree. This instruction refers solely to the affirmative defense raised by the defendants in their answer, as it concludes, "unless you find from preponderance of the evidence on the whole case that this defense is made out, or if you find that the evidence is equally balanced, you will find against the defendant on that issue," meaning obviously the issue raised by the affirmative defense in the answer that the operator of the Ford car was alone responsible for the accident, and had no reference to the negligence of the defendants. It is further evident that the instruction complained of related to the affirmative issue raised by the answer, by the fact that the court gave a number of instructions relative to the burden of proof and the preponderance of evidence as between the plaintiff and the defendants.

The court defined negligence and preponderance of evidence, and among other instructions gave the following:

"In this case the plaintiff having alleged negligence on the part of defendant, the burden is upon plaintiff to prove that negligence by a preponderance of the evidence, and also that that negligence, if there was any, proximately contributed to the injury."

The court also instructed the jury as follows:

"In determining the issue of negligence, the burden of proving it is on the party asserting it, but, in determining whether or not there has been such negligence, you will consider all of the evidence bearing on that subject, regardless of which party produced it. * * *"

"* * * While, if the evidence on that issue is, in your judgment, equally balanced or preponderates against such negligence, it is not proved, and you should find that the defendant was not negligent."

"In order, therefore, to find a verdict for the plaintiff, you must not only find from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was negligent, but also that such negligence was a proximate cause of the injury."

"Therefore, if you shall find that the driver of the Ford automobile suddenly and without warning swerved his automobile to the left, and before reaching the center of the intersection, and in front of the motorbus in which plaintiff was riding, and that thereafter the driver of the stage did all in his power to avoid the injury, then he was not guilty of negligence, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

"Of course if the driver of the Ford car violated any of the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, about which you have been instructed, then he was guilty of negligence as a matter of law; and, if that negligence was the sole proximate cause of the accident, your verdict would be for the defendant."

The appellants rely upon the case of Valente v. Sierra Railway Co., supra, as supporting their contention that the instruction complained of is erroneous. The facts and pleadings in the Valente Case are decidedly different from those in the case at bar. In that case there was a collision of the passenger train in which deceased was riding and a work train operated by the same defendant. The complaint there alleges the happening of the collision and death of Mrs. Valente resulting therefrom. These allegations of the complaint were admitted by the defendant in its answer. The complaint further alleged:

"That said collision was caused by and resulted from the carelessness and negligence of said defendant and its servants and agents in the management and operation of its said train and the death of Marie Valente was caused by and resulted from the carelessness and negligence of said defendant and its servants and agents in the management and operation of its said train."

These allegations were denied by the answer, which further alleged as follows:

"On the contrary, said defendant alleges that said collision and death of said Marie Valente therefrom was and were caused by and resulted from inevitable accident, without any fault or negligence on the part of said defendant or of its servants or agents in any way whatsoever."

Upon the trial of that case, evidence was introduced by the defendant to meet the prima facie case of negligence made by the showing of the accident. Under these circumstances the trial court, after instructing the jury that, by reason of the admission as to the collision and the death of Mrs. Valente therefrom, a presumption arose that the accident resulted from defendant's negligence, and that, in order to rebut such presumption, defendant must show that the collision resulted from some inevitable casualty or unavoidable accident or from some cause which human care and foresight could not have prevented, instructed the jury as follows:

"The burden of showing that the collision occurred by no fault of defendant and from some inevitable casualty or unavoidable accident or cause beyond the power of human foresight to prevent is on the defendant. In order to absolve itself from liability from any loss which may appear from the evidence to have been occasioned by such collision, it must establish by a preponderance of the evidence that such collision was caused by, or resulted from, some inevitable casualty or unavoidable accident or cause beyond human care or foresight to prevent."

This instruction under the pleadings was clearly erroneous, for the reason that the jury was instructed that defendant must show by a preponderance of the evidence that it was not negligent, etc., which, of course, is not the law. No affirmative defense was raised by the defendant in that case, and therefore no burden was cast upon the defendant to prove any issue by a preponderance of the evidence. The pleadings raised only the question of defendant's negligence, and all the proof that defendant was required to meet was the prima facie case made by the plaintiff. Learned v. Peninsula Rapid Transit Co., 49 Cal. App. 436, 193 P. 591.

[5, 6] The law is well settled that, as between the plaintiff and defendant in an action for damages resulting from negligence, it is essential to a statement of a cause of action that negligence on the part of a defendant be alleged, and, if denied, it must be proved by plaintiff by a clear preponderance of the evidence in order for plaintiff to recover.

[7] It seems equally well established that in such an action, where a defendant alleges in his answer new matter as an affirmative defense, the burden is on him to prove such affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence; otherwise such affirmative defense is not established. However, where a defendant in such an action merely denies negligence on his part, or where, in addition to denying negligence, sets up an affirmative defense, such as contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, or imputed negligence, or sole negligence on the part of some third party, he is not called upon to prove want of negligence on his part by a preponderance of the evidence, but only required to meet the prima facie case made by plaintiff, and the burden is still on plaintiff to prove negligence on the part of defendant by a preponderance of the evidence and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of. Or, in other words, the plaintiff is not relieved from the burden of proving his entire case by a clear preponderance of the evidence by the mere fact that defendant pleads an affirmative defense in addition to a want of negligence on his part.

When all the instructions are considered together, we think that the burden of proof and preponderance of the evidence were clearly and correctly defined to the jury under the issues made by the pleadings.

[8-10] It is next contended by the appellants that the court erred in permitting testimony relative to the speed of the bus a quarter of a mile distant from the place of the accident. The witness testified that he had been driving an automobile for about 14 years and was then driving one, and that the bus passed him while he was driving about 37 miles an hour. After qualifying in this manner, he answered the question propounded by the court as to the speed of the bus. His answer was, "Must have been going 40 miles an hour." The defendants contend that this testimony was too remote, and that the answer was irresponsible. We see no merit whatever in either of these contentions. The law in this state is well settled that, where a person observes the speed of an automobile, he or she can give at least an opinion as to its speed, and the weight of that opinion is for the consideration of the jury. Johnsen v. Oakland, S. L. & H. Electric Ry., 127 Cal. 608, 60 P. 170; Shimoda v. Bundy, 24 Cal. App. 675, 142 P. 109. The answer, "must have been going 40 miles an hour," simply means that in the opinion of the witness the bus was traveling 40 miles per hour. The place of the speed testified to was not too remote from the scene of the accident because the witness was overtaken in his own car by the bus and followed and observed it up to the place of the accident. The evidence further shows that there were no intervening crossings between the place where the witness saw the bus and the place of the accident.

[11, 12] The evidence in this case is conflicting, but this was a question solely for the jury. The jury evidently accepted plaintiff's and his witness' version of the accident, and, where there is any substantial evidence to support the judgment, it is not within the province of this court to disturb the judgment on that ground. From a careful examination of the record in this case, we think the evidence is amply sufficient to support the verdict of the jury and that there was no prejudicial error committed either in the instruction to the jury or the admission of testimony.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FORD. (Cr. 1498.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 26, 1927.

1. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 228(1)—In murder case, "corpus delicti" is proof of facts forming basis of offense and of criminal agency as cause thereof.

In a prosecution for murder, the "corpus delicti" consists of proof of the facts forming the basis of the offense and of the existence of a criminal agency as the cause thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Corpus Delicti.]

2. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 228(1)—Corpus delicti held established by evidence of death and finding of criminal agency.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence held to sustain the finding of the jury that the corpus delicti was sufficiently proved; the fact of the death being undisputed, and the finding that it was produced by a criminal means being warranted.

3. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 823(10)—Instruction on corpus delicti stating degree of proof necessary for consideration of confession held not prejudicial as leading jury to believe defendant had confessed, in view of all instructions and evidence.

In a prosecution for murder, where no confession was shown, instruction on corpus delicti, stating that it was not necessary to prove corpus delicti beyond reasonable doubt before proving extrajudicial confession, and that evidence of corpus delicti need not necessarily connect defendant with crime to justify admission and consideration of confession, held not prejudicial, in view of all of the instructions and the evidence.

4. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 309(4)—Instruction authorizing conviction of murder in second degree held warranted by evidence.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence held to warrant instruction authorizing jury to return a verdict of murder in the second degree, where there was no evidence of deliberation preceding act and no evidence of provocation and sudden passion.

5. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 152—Homicide will be deemed murder, unless there is evidence of circumstances of mitigation reducing crime to manslaughter.

Where the commission of homicide by the defendant is established, the homicide will be deemed murder, unless there is evidence produced affirmatively showing circumstances of mitigation which reduce the crime to manslaughter.

6. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 254—Conviction of murder in second degree held sustained by evidence.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of second degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Edward Ford was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Fred Noon, of San Diego, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was charged by information with the crime of murder. He was tried and by the jury's verdict convicted of murder in the second degree. The trial court denied his motion for new trial, and this appeal is from that order, and from the judgment and sentence based upon such verdict. A consideration of two grounds urged for reversal requires a statement of the facts proved and of some of the evidence introduced.

About the hour of 11:15 p. m. of September 17, 1926, appellant was seen by a police officer staggering on one of the main streets of La Jolla. At that time appellant appeared unable to talk, but said he "was shot"; he was wet and quivering; the officer took him to the hospital, where the only thing said by appellant was "girl shot too"; he had two bullet wounds in his forehead, and one on the top of his head; pieces of a flat bullet were extracted from under the scalp on the top of his head; the bullet was 32-caliber; there were powder burns on his forehead. On the following morning a woman's body was found in one of the summer houses at La Jolla park, near the beach; the deceased was one Anna Carleton; there was a bullet wound from left to right through the bridge of her nose, entering at the inner angle of the left eye, and a furrow was cut in the upper lid of the right eye; there was another bullet wound at the outer angle of the left side of her nose, near the alar, going straight through the head, into the base of the brain, which caused death; there were no powder burns on her face; however, there was a powder-stained bullet wound through the second joint of the ring finger of the left hand and powder stains on the inside of the little finger and the middle finger of the same hand. Tracks which the shoes worn by appellant fitted led away from the summer house to the driveway, and from the driveway to the beach, for about fifty feet; on the rocks at the beach about fifty feet from the summer house a 32-caliber revolver was found, which contained five empty shells, and its appearance indicated that it had been fired within twelve hours previously to the time when found. Proof was also introduced as to the position of the body of the deceased when discovered, as well as of various articles of the summer house at that time.

[1, 2] It is contended that the corpus delicti was not established. In a trial where the charge is murder, the corpus delicti consists of proof of the facts forming the basis of the offense, and the existence of a criminal agency as the cause of it. In the present case, the corpus delicti consisted of proof of the death of Anna Carleton and that it was produced by criminal means. The autopsy surgeon testified that it was his opinion that although it would have been possible for the deceased to have inflicted the wounds found upon her face, it would have been improbable that she did so; he said that the wound through the nose from one side to the other was a very serious one and would have stunned her; that the other bullet, which pierced the brain, produced death. Consequently, it would follow that whichever one was inflicted first would have prevented the other from being self-inflicted. The testimony of W. H. Churchman, a police sergeant, was of similar import. He pointed out that it would have been very difficult for the deceased to have inflicted the wound through the nose from left to right. In that connection he called attention to the fact that she could not have held the revolver in her left hand, for that hand was wounded. To have inflicted this wound in the nose by shooting the revolver with the right hand would have been next to impossible. That this is true is obvious. To realize how extremely unlikely it is that the deceased inflicted this wound, it is only necessary to visualize the position which her right hand would have been required to have held; she must have grasped the gun at the full length of her arm from her face, otherwise there would have been powder burns upon it, according to Churchman. There were no such burns. Then, with the right arm fully extended toward the left, she would have been compelled to turn the revolver so as to point it back toward her nose, for it will be remembered that the bullet entered on the left side, and holding the weapon thus, she would have pulled the trigger. Although at one point in his testimony Churchman stated that this would have been possible, later, in reply to another question, he said:

"And I think if I was just to be down straight with myself, I don't think it is possible; if I would just get at my own honest opinion about it, straight and straight, I do not think it is really possible to fix it that way."

If the members of the jury accepted the statements of these witnesses as true, or if they merely reasoned the matter out for themselves from the facts proved, they were amply justified in concluding that the deceased did not commit suicide, and that she died from a criminal agency. That death occurred is not disputed, and this testimony alone, if believed by the jury, would have justified them in concluding that a criminal agency was the cause of death. A number of other circumstances indicate that the deceased did not commit suicide, but it is not necessary to delineate them here. The essential elements necessary to complete proof of the corpus delicti were undoubtedly proved by evidence which justified the jury's conclusion in that behalf.

[3] Appellant contends that the court erred in giving a certain instruction, it being argued that by the use therein of the word "confession" the jury were misled into believing that a statement by the defendant which was introduced in evidence was a confession. The instruction concerning which complaint is made is as follows:

"Proof of the corpus delicti means proof of the body of the crime; that is, first, certain facts forming its basis, and second, existence of criminal agency or means as the cause of them.

And it may be proved by circumstances shown in evidence, or by inferences drawn from the facts proven.

"It is not necessary that the corpus delicti should be proved beyond a reasonable doubt before proof may be made of an extrajudicial confession. Prima facie evidence of the corpus delicti is sufficient; and it is for the court to say whether there is sufficient evidence of the corpus delicti to go to the jury, precisely as in the case of any other material fact.

"The evidence of the corpus delicti need not be of conclusive character, and need not necessarily connect the party informed against with the commission of the crime, in order to justify the admission and consideration of the confession of such parties so charged with the crime."

It is true, appellant made no confession. Some of the statements made by him, however, were of a character susceptible of a construction such as to render them admissions of a damaging character. This was not a case where it was proper to give the instruction in question; yet, in view of all of the instructions and the evidence before the jury, we cannot believe that its members were led to believe that the defendant had confessed to guilt of the crime with which he was charged or of which he was convicted. In this connection the court instructed the jury that he had not expressed or intended to express or to intimate any opinion as to what facts had been established or what inferences should be drawn from the evidence adduced, and that if any expression of his seemed to indicate an opinion relating to any of these matters, such expression must be entirely disregarded.

[4-6] Another point mentioned, but not strongly urged, by appellant is that it was error for the trial court to instruct the jury that a verdict of murder in the second degree might be returned. There is no merit to this claim. The proof established a case where such an instruction was peculiarly apt—in fact, necessary. The evidence against the appellant was almost entirely circumstantial; there was no definite proof of motive, nor as to what conduct or conversation immediately preceded the killing. Although the jury believed that the appellant slew the deceased, there was no evidence of that deliberation preceding the act which is necessary to constitute murder of the first degree. On the other hand, there was also an absence of proof of provocation and sudden passion which would bring the offense within the definition of manslaughter, and without which the only lawful verdict must have been one finding the defendant guilty of murder. This is so since upon the commission of homicide by a defendant having been established, the crime is murder unless there is evidence produced either by the prosecution or the defense affirmatively showing circumstances of mitigation which would bring the murder within the definition of manslaughter. Therefore the jury legally and logically returned a verdict of murder in the second degree, for the circumstances of the killing were certainly such as to show an abandoned and malignant heart.

The judgment is affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

85 Cal. App. 75

In the Matter of the Application of Joseph O. MORRIS, for Admission to Practice Law before the Courts of California. (No. 4925.) District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 12, 1927. Application for admission to the bar. W. T. Craig, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. William W. Clary, of Los Angeles, for respondent Los Angeles Bar Association.

WORKS, P. J. This is an application for admission to the bar, notwithstanding an adverse report of the state board of bar examiners. Issues were framed in the proceeding, which involve the questions whether petitioner possesses the requisite moral qualifications to entitle him to admission, and whether, petitioner having come from another state, he had been engaged in the actual practice of the law in a sister state "for a period of at least three years within the period of seven years immediately preceding the filing of his application" here, as required by section 279 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The proceeding went to a referee, who took evidence and who has made findings favorable to petitioner upon both issues. Since these findings were filed, the respondent has withdrawn its opposition to petitioner's admission. Notwithstanding this withdrawal, which we find to have been entirely proper, we have felt it our duty to examine the transcript of the evidence heard by the referee. From such examination we find that the findings are amply supported by the record. We deem it proper to say that the evidence presented upon the issue as to petitioner's moral qualifications is particularly full and satisfyng. We should also remark, in justice to the state board of bar examiners, that the evidence taken by the referee, because of certain inadvertences on the part of petitioner when before the board, is more complete than that heard by the board, and covers matters the omission of which left the board in a position of justified doubt as to petitioner's qualifications. The findings of the referee are adopted as the findings of the court. The clerk of the court will issue to petitioner a certificate in the usual form admitting him to the bar.

In the Matter of the Application of John Gardner SCOTT for Admission as an Attorney and Counselor at Law. (No. 5063.) District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 22, 1927. Application for admission to the bar, notwithstanding an adverse report of the State Board of Bar Examiners. Granted. Rupert B. Turnbull, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Albert E. Sherman, of Los Angeles, for State Board of Bar Examiners.

WORKS, P. J. This matter was confided to a referee, with directions to take evidence and to make findings upon the issues framed by the petition of the applicant and the answer of respondent thereto. The referee has performed his duty and all his findings are favorable to petitioner. Respondent has taken exception to none of the findings, but despite that fact we have thought it our duty to examine minutely the record made before the referee. As a result of that labor we determine that each of the findings is supported by a satisfactory preponderance of the evidence. The findings of the referee are adopted as the findings of the court. The clerk of the court will issue to petitioner a certificate in the usual form admitting him to the bar of the state.

Justice THOMPSON, deeming himself disqualified, does not participate in the foregoing opinion.

BOYER et al. v. MURPHY. (S. F. 11444.)

Supreme Court of California. Aug. 23, 1927.

1. Deeds ⚡100—Testimony of conditions surrounding execution of deed is considered only for aid in construing deed.

In action to quiet title in which principal issue is construction of deed, testimony concerning conditions surrounding execution of deed will be considered to extent only of assistance it affords in construing deed.

2. Deeds ⚡143—Whether grantor, sole owner of fee, reserved life interest for benefit of husband out of grant is determined by parties' intention.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 1066, 1636, in construing a deed whether the sole owner could create by reservation or otherwise a life interest for benefit of her husband, who was stranger to the title, is to be determined by the parties' intention, especially the intention of the grantor, regardless of the common-law rule that granting clause overrules repugnant habendum clause.

3. Deeds ⚡143—Deed by sole owner of fee reserving life estate to herself and husband held to establish life estate in surviving husband (McEnerney Act).

Where wife, declared sole fee owner in proceeding under McEnerney Act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78, as amended), granted remainder of fee reserving to her and her husband ownership and possession during their lives and life of survivor, life estate was reserved to grantor's husband surviving her.

4. Appeal and error ⚡731(5)—Objection, that failure of bill of exceptions to specify particulars in which findings are unsupported precludes review of evidence, is unavailing where findings are based on erroneous construction of deed (Code Civ. Proc. § 648).

Although Code Civ. Proc. § 648, requires bill of exceptions to specify particulars in which it is claimed findings are unsupported in action to quiet title, where decision on trial and on appeal was predicated entirely on construction of deed and there was no conflict in evidence, objection that sufficiency of evidence could not be reviewed for failure of bill of exceptions to contain particulars in which findings were not supported is ineffective on appeal, since findings were in reality conclusions of law.

5. Quieting title ⚡47(2)—Where conclusion depended on erroneous construction of deed, finding that defendant's claim was without right held unsupported conclusion of law, subject to reversal.

In action to quiet title where conclusion arrived at on merits was solely founded on deed which was wrongfully construed, finding that defendant's claim was without right amounted to no more than unsupported conclusion of law, which should be reversed on appeal.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Alice M. Boyer and another against Edward F. Murphy. Judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a motion to vacate it and to enter judgment for defendant, were reversed in the District Court of Appeal (258 P. 91), and defendant petitions the Supreme Court for a hearing. Reversed, with direction.

Herman J. Widman, Wm. M. Madden, and Charles J. Heggerty, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Haswell, Peterson & Martin, of San Francisco, Fred C. Peterson, of Oakland, and Ivan T. Crase, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. A hearing in this court was granted after decision by the District Court of Appeal in and for the Third Appellate District (53 Cal. App. Dec. 813), for the reason that, while satisfied with the reasoning of said opinion, we arrived at the conclusion that the order of reversal and direction to the trial court with which the same concludes should be modified. We therefore adopt the opinion of Mr. Justice Hart of said court (with the exception of its concluding order and direction) which reads as follows:

"This is an action by the plaintiffs to obtain a decree quieting their alleged title to certain improved real property situated in the city of San Francisco, as against the alleged claim of defendant to an interest or estate therein 'adverse to said plaintiffs.'

"The complaint alleges that the claim so made by the defendant 'is without any right whatever, and that said defendant has not any estate, right, title, or interest whatever in said land or premises, or any part thereof.' The prayer, besides asking for an adjudication that defendant has no interest, etc., in said real property and that he be enjoined from asserting such claim, asks that 'an account be taken of all the rents, issues and profits of said property, which have accrued to the defendant since the 1st day of April, 1919, and for such other relief,' etc., as may be justified in equity. The answer consists of specific denials of the material allegations of the complaint.

"The court found (finding No. 2) that defendant 'claimed an interest or estate therein (the real property specifically described in the complaint and the findings) adverse to plaintiffs, but that said claim was without right by said defendant, and said defendant had no right, title, or interest of any kind, character, or description in and to said described premises, either as set out in defendant's answer or otherwise'; that (finding No. 3) 'on the 21st day of March, 1919, the premises described in such complaint were the separate property of Teresa Doyle Murphy, and that at said time defendant, Edward F. Murphy, did not have any right, title, or interest in and to said property of any kind, character, or description'; that (finding No. 4) 'on the 21st day of March, 1919, the said Teresa Doyle Murphy, and Edward F. Murphy, defendant herein, executed and delivered to the plaintiffs James E. Murphy and Alice M. Boyer a certain indenture in writing, which indenture in writing is in certain words and figures, as follows, to wit,' following which is a deed executed by Teresa Doyle Murphy and Edward F. Murphy, conveying the fee in said property (therein specifically described) to the plaintiffs herein, the habendum clause of said deed reading as follows:

"To have and to hold the said premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the parties of the second part, and to their heirs and assigns forever, reserving to the parties of the first part the ownership and possession thereof during the lifetime of the parties of the first part and the survivor of them."

"The court further found that Teresa Doyle Murphy died in the city and county of San Francisco on April 1, 1919; 'that in and by virtue of said instrument in writing the said Edward F. Murphy did not take a life estate in and to the said premises described herein, or take any interest of any kind or character in and to the premises described therein.'

"The conclusions of law are in accord with the findings, and judgment was entered for the plaintiffs in conformity to the prayer of the complaint. Defendant made a motion for a new trial and also a motion to vacate the judgment made and entered and to give and enter a judgment in favor of the defendant. Both motions were denied.

"The defendant appeals from the judgment and also from the order denying his motion to vacate the judgment made and entered and in lieu thereof to make and enter a judgment in his favor. The appeals are supported here by a record made up in the form of a bill of exceptions.

"From the testimony it appears that the defendant, Edward F. Murphy, and Teresa Doyle Murphy were husband and wife, and were the parents of the plaintiffs; that, in the month of April, 1906, the records pertaining to the title to real property in controversy, as were all the public records of the city and county of San Francisco, were destroyed by fire; that thereafter, and on December 30, 1912, Teresa Doyle Murphy, separately and alone, in pursuance of the provisions of an act of the Legislature popularly known as the 'McEnerney Act,' instituted an action in rem, 'against all the world' in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, to secure a decree restoring the records pertaining and also quieting her title to the real estate in dispute; that, after due proceedings had under said act, said superior court, on April 30, 1913, rendered its judgment in said action restoring the records affecting said property and quieting Teresa Doyle Murphy's title thereto as follows:

"(a) That plaintiff was at the time of the commencement of this action the owner in fee-simple absolute, and in the possession of the real property above described and of the whole thereof.

"(b) That her title thereto be and the same is hereby established and quieted against all the world as of said date.

"(c) That at said time no other person had any estate, right, title, interest, or claim in or to said property or any part thereof, either legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent."

"On the 1st day of April, 1919, Teresa Doyle Murphy passed out of this life and said deed was, subsequent to the date of her death, duly recorded in the official records in the office of the county recorder of said city and county.

"The defendant testified that the deed referred to in the complaint and the findings was jointly executed by him and his wife; that he and his wife bought the property at a probate sale in 1897 or 1898, and was acquired 10 years after their marriage; that when they acquired the property 'in 1898, there was a little cottage and two flats thereon. Sometimes,' defendant continued, 'the flats were rented, and sometimes I would collect the rents and sometimes my wife would. When I did, I would give them to my wife. We were living in the cottage in the rear during this time. After the fire in 1906, we constructed two flats on the property, that is, the cottage on the rear was moved to the front and became a part of those two flats, and my wife and I lived in one of the flats, and rented the other. Sometimes I would make payments to the bank on the mortgages (the property having been mortgaged to secure a loan of $2,000 to be used as in part payment of the purchase price of the property), and sometimes my wife would. I have taken rent money and paid it to the bank on these mortgages.' He further testified that 'up to the fire and earthquake in 1906, the property in question was occupied by myself and wife—a part of it, a little cottage—and from that time until the death of my wife, my wife and I were in possession of the property.' He testified that his wife 'did not receive any gifts of any property—not a dollar of money or anything else that I ever knew of. She never inherited any property from any relative.'

"Defendant proceeded to testify, without objection, that some of the money—about $1,000, which he had earned as wages prior to his intermarriage with Teresa Doyle Murphy and which he had on deposit in a bank—was contributed to the payment of the purchase price of the property and that, from time to time after his said marriage, he contributed portions of his wages to the same purpose; that the money received by him and his wife for rent of certain parts of the premises and such of his wages as he intended should be applied to the extinguishment of the mortgage debt on the property were placed in a single deposit in the bank, and the two funds were therefore commingled. All this testimony—that is, all of the defendant's testimony to the effect that much of his earnings as a laborer or mechanic had been used as in part payment of the indebtedness against the property or the purchase price thereof—was, on motion of counsel for the plaintiffs, at the close of defendant's direct examination, stricken out upon the theory that such testimony would involve a collateral attack upon the judgment obtained by Mrs. Murphy under the McEnerney Act (St. [Ex. Sess.] 1906, p. 78).

[1] "The foregoing constitutes a statement in substance of all the testimony received respecting the defendant's connection with or relation to the property here in dispute; and, while it is set forth herein, it is to be understood that we attach importance to the testimony to the extent only of whatever assistance it may afford and has afforded in the construction of the deed in question and may lend support to the result at which we have arrived as to the effect of said deed with respect to any interest in the property therein described which

Mrs. Murphy thereby sought to vest in her husband, the defendant herein.

[2] "The theory upon which the case was tried and decided below is that, inasmuch as Mrs. Murphy was the sole owner in fee of the property described in the deed, it was not legally competent for her to create, by way of a reservation or otherwise, out of the fee in said property, which she at the same time granted to the plaintiffs in remainder, a life interest therein to and for the benefit of her husband, he being a stranger to the title. The polestar in the determination of this question is the intention of the parties to the deed, particularly that of the deceased wife of the defendant, to be ascertained by a consideration of the deed itself, and, if necessary, the circumstances surrounding the execution thereof, by the light of the rules by which any other contracts are construed or interpreted, where construction or interpretation is necessary to ascertain the intention of the parties to such instruments as to the scope and effect thereof. Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 300, 301, 37 P. 1049; Pacovich v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 150 Cal. 39, 45-47, 87 P. 1097; Parks v. Gates, 186 Cal. 151, 155, 199 P. 40; Duncan v. Wolfer, 60 Cal. App. 120, 212 P. 390; Devlin on Deeds (3d Ed.) §§ 843, 843a, 844a, 850. In 17 Ruling Case Law, § 6, p. 619, the rule now generally followed in the construction of deeds is thus stated:

"It was a rule of the common law that if the habendum or any later clause in a deed was repugnant to the granting clause, the granting clause would override the repugnant clause or clauses, and under this rule if a grant is to one and his heirs and the habendum clause or a later clause is to the grantee for his life, or life of another, the habendum or later clause is considered void as being repugnant to the meaning conveyed by the words 'his heirs' as previously used. The modern tendency, however, is to abandon the strict common-law rule of construction, the broad doctrine being asserted that in the construction of deeds as in the construction of other instruments the intention of the parties thereto as gathered from the whole instrument must govern. In jurisdictions which adhere to this doctrine it is held that where a deed appears from the premises to give a fee, but the habendum makes it clear that a life estate is intended, the grantees will take a life estate only. And where the granting part of a deed creates a life estate only, it has been decided that the use of the word 'heirs' in the warranty clause is not sufficient to show that the real intention was to convey a fee."

"Referring to the same subject, our Supreme Court, in Barnett v. Barnett, supra, approves the rule as it is above declared in Ruling Case Law. It is there said:

"A grant is to be interpreted in the same manner as any other contract (section 1066), so as to give effect to the intention of the parties, if that intention can be ascertained (section 1636); and for the purpose of ascertaining that intention 'the whole of the contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other' (section 1641). The intention, it is sometimes said, is to be gathered from the four corners of the instrument, and in case of a grant the habendum, as well as any other portion of the instrument, is to be considered. The ordinary use of the habendum is to define or limit the quality of interest, or the estate which the grantee is to have in the property granted, and, although usually made a separate portion of the instrument, is not necessarily so, but may be wholly omitted, and the interest or estate granted may be defined or limited in the premises or granting part of the conveyance. Montgomery v. Sturdivant, 41 Cal. 290. The rule that if the habendum is repugnant to the premises it is to be disregarded, is only another form of the rule that "if several parts of a grant are absolutely irreconcilable the former part prevails." Civ. Code, § 1070. The intention of the parties to the grant is to be gathered from the instrument itself, and determined by a proper construction of the language used therein, but for the purpose of ascertaining this intention the entire instrument, the habendum as well as the premises, are to be considered, and, if it appear from such consideration that the grantor intended by the habendum clause to restrict or limit or enlarge the estate named in the granting clause the habendum will prevail over the granting clause. Faivre v. Daley, 93 Cal. 670 [29 P. 256]; Pelissier v. Corker, 103 Cal. 516 [37 P. 465]. "It is in such case to be considered as an addendum or proviso to the conveying clause, which by a well-settled rule of construction must control the conveying clause or premises, even to the extent of destroying the effect of the same." Bodine's Adm'rs v. Arthur, 91 Ky. 53 (14 S. W. 904), 34 Am. St. Rep. 162."

[3] "It will not be questioned that Teresa Doyle Murphy intended to convey the fee in the premises to the plaintiff as a remainder over after the determination of a life estate therein to herself and her husband 'and the survivor of them.' The language of the habendum clause of the deed so plainly and unequivocally confirms this proposition as to remove it beyond the realms of disputation. This conclusion is not only clearly warranted by the language itself of said clause of the deed, but is reinforced by the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant. Thus it was shown (and this particular part of the defendant's testimony did not fall within the scope of the motion to strike and the order striking out certain of the testimony given by him) that the premises in controversy were acquired jointly by him and his wife some 10 years after the date of their intermarriage, and that the couple jointly held continuous actual possession thereof and together resided thereon down to the date of the death of the wife on April 1, 1919. Under these circumstances, it was only natural that the wife, having, long after they acquired the property, obtained a decree under the McEnerney Act adjudging her the sole owner in fee of the property, should not only desire but intend to provide for her life companion, to be enjoyed during the remaining years of his rapidly waning life, at least such an interest in the premises as would assure him an abiding place at the 'old homestead' and, peradventure, vouchsafe to him, in his old age, protection against want of the common necessities of life. There is, however no serious claim here that the deceased wife of the defendant did not intend and attempt to carve out of the fee in the property a life interest therein for the benefit of herself and husband 'and the survivor of them.' The point urged here by the plaintiffs is, as stated, that

Mrs. Murphy utterly failed legally in whatever attempt she might have made to provide for a life estate in her husband, to be enjoyed by him after her death, if she predeceased him. In other words, we may pardonably repeat, the contention of the plaintiffs is that the defendant being a stranger to the title to the property, his wife, the sole owner of the fee therein, could not legally create in him a life interest or estate in the premises, and that, therefore, the instant she died the life estate reserved in the property to herself terminated and simultaneously therewith the right of the plaintiffs to the enjoyment of the estate passing to them, under the terms of the grant, inured to them. Obviously, in so far as the habendum clause of the deed applied to the wife of the deceased, there was a reservation of a life estate out of the fee. Undoubtedly, as before stated, Mrs. Murphy intended and undertook to create a life estate in her husband (the defendant).

"But, whether the life interest which Mrs. Murphy sought to withhold from the fee for the benefit of her husband constitutes a reservation, in the technical sense of that term, is a matter of no particular consequence in determining the rights of the defendant herein, although it may be well enough to say that the authorities generally, to which our attention has been called, in considering whether the attempted creation, for the benefit of a third party, of a life estate out of the fee in real property which has been granted by the owner of the fee to another, declare that to create a life estate by way of a reservation, the party for whom such estate purports to be created must be a party or not a stranger to the deed or grant (they do not say to the title) conveying the fee in remainder. See Devlin on Deeds (3d Ed.) § 222, p. 318; 18 Cor. Jur. § 339, p. 342, and cases named in the footnotes; 8 R. C. L. § 148, pp. 1091, 1092, and cases cited in footnotes; Butler v. Gosling, 130 Cal. 422, 426. We have found one case in which the rule as so expressed has been interpreted to mean: 'When the books and the cases say that a reservation in a grant, in order to be valid, must be for the benefit of the grantor, or some one of the grantors, and that a reservation cannot be made for the benefit of a stranger to the deed, it is meant and the language used connotes that the reservation must be for the benefit of that grantor who, having an interest in the thing granted, may logically reserve from the operation of the grant a part of the estate or thing granted, or some right growing out of or appurtenant thereto.' Lemon v. Lemon, 273 Mo. 484, 496, 201 S. W. 103.

"But, as before in effect declared, we are not required to express an opinion herein upon the question whether that part of the habendum clause of the grant purporting to reserve a life estate out of the fee in the real property in dispute to the defendant is, strictly speaking, a reservation, for, as pointed out above, the language of the grant, particularly the reddendum words embraced within the habendum clause, must be so construed as to give effect to the intention of Mrs. Murphy with respect to the interest in the fee which evidently she desired to withhold therefrom for the benefit of her husband, regardless of the technical form in which it may be found to be necessary to sustain and carry out such intention, provided, of course, that such intention may be worked out, as in our opinion it may be, without doing violence to any of the canons of construction established and commonly invoked as a guide to the ascertainment of the meaning and intent at the bottom of contracts in general. If, therefore, the clearly manifested intention of Mrs. Murphy to provide a life interest for her husband in the property in question cannot be sustained upon the theory that such intention has been evinced in the form of a reservation, as that term in law is technically understood, then, it is clear that the provision for the defendant, in order to enforce the manifest intention of Mrs. Murphy, may, in practical effect, be invested with the force of a reservation by construing it as an exception to the estate granted to plaintiffs, whereby Mrs. Murphy, for the benefit of her husband, excepted, for a specified time, from the operation of the grant to plaintiffs of the fee, an interest which must cease to exist in the manner expressed by or necessarily implied from the language of the habendum clause of the grant before the right of the plaintiffs to the enjoyment or beneficial use of the estate passing to them arises or inures to them. Or, stating the proposition in other language, the plaintiffs, being granted the whole of the estate in fee, subject to a certain interest therein which was expressly withheld or excepted therefrom by their grantor, are not in the very nature of the situation entitled to the enjoyment of the beneficial use of the fee until the excepted interest shall have ceased to exist, or has terminated, according to the terms of the instrument creating it. This construction legally facilitates the carrying out of the plain or manifest intention of Mrs. Murphy and is in consonance with the theory according to which the courts and other authorities hold that deeds of like character to the one here should be construed, where it is necessary to do so, to effectuate the clear intention of the grantor with respect to several different estates sought to be carved out of a single fee in real property. A few excerpts from the statement of the rule as it is formulated by the text-writers which we conclude controls in the construction of the deed in question, and which rule as so stated is predicated upon or approved by the cases generally, will be sufficient for our purposes here.

"Mr. Devlin, in his very excellent work on Deeds, vol. 2 (3d Ed.) § 982, says:

"A stranger to a deed cannot take title by reservation. But it may operate, when so intended by the parties as an exception from the thing granted."

"In 8 Ruling Case Law, § 148, p. 1092, the rule is thus stated:

"Generally it is declared that a reservation must be in favor of a grantor or party executing the conveyance, and not to a stranger.

"A better statement of the rule is that, a reservation in a deed to a stranger being by right of authority invalid as a reservation, the tendency of the courts is to effectuate the intention of the grantor by treating it as an exception.

"A reservation is none the less made to a grantor if it is so made that others can derive advantage from it; it will be considered as made to him when valuable rights are secured to him, though others may be benefited by it."

"In 18 Corpus Juris, § 339, p. 340 et seq., it is stated:

"A reservation is a clause in a deed whereby the grantor reserves some new thing to himself out of that which he granted before. It differs from an exception which is ever of part of the thing granted and of a thing in esse at the time. The office of an exception is to take something out of the thing granted that would otherwise pass. While this distinction between a reservation and an exception has been uniformly recognized, the terms "reservation" and "exception" are often used interchangeably; and the technical meaning will give way to the manifest intent, even though the technical term to the contrary is used."

"Again, in the same volume of the same work, section 340, page 343:

"The true rule is said to be that, where words taken according to their technical meaning do not create a legal reservation and are notwithstanding construed to amount to a reservation, it is always done with a view to advance the intent of the parties, but not to defeat or destroy it. And words not technically amounting to a reservation are not to be so construed unless to effectuate a manifest intention. Where not repugnant to the grant, a reservation or exception may appear in any part of the deed.' See, also, the many cases cited in the footnotes, which support the text.

"In Martin v. Cook, 102 Mich. 267, 272, 60 N. W. 679, on page 680, the grantor reserved to himself and to his daughter, who was a stranger to the deed and to the title, an estate for the lives of both in the property conveyed. The court said:

"While the rule that a reservation in favor of a stranger to the instrument is invalid as a reservation has been adhered to, yet, in order to effectuate the intention of the grantor, such a reservation has uniformly been treated as excepting from the grant the thing reserved.' See, also, Burchard v. Walther [58 Neb. 539] 78 N. W. 1061; In re Dixon [156 N. C. 26] 72 S. E. 71.

"Nothing further need be said upon the question under consideration than what is declared in the above authorities. The case here unquestionably falls within the rule as to exceptions as declared therein.

[4] "In conclusion, it is proper to say that, in taking up this record for consideration, we did not overlook the point made by respondents at the outset of the argument presented in their brief, that the 'attempt on the part of the appellant to attack the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of fact' cannot be reviewed for the reason that the bill of exceptions does not contain a specification of the particulars in which it is claimed that the findings are not thus supported. Code Civ. Proc. § 648. While the rule as declared in that section of the Code in cases where the appeal is supported by a bill of exceptions, and where the findings are challenged for want of sufficient evidence to support them, should generally be followed, yet in the instant case the decision below, as is the decision here, was predicated entirely upon the construction of the deed constituting the foundation of this action. There was little evidence received in the case and in that there was no conflict whatever, viz.: The testimony of the plaintiff Mrs. Boyer, giving the date of her mother's death, the defendant's testimony, of which a synoptical statement is hereinabove given, and the deed. The findings, which might be sufficient as such under other circumstances, are in the present situation in reality conclusions of law following the construction of the deed.

[5] "The conclusion arrived at upon the merits, as stated, and as is obvious, is wholly founded on a construction of the grant. The finding, therefore, that the defendant's claim of interest in the property is without right, etc., amounts to no more than an unsupported conclusion of law. See Carr v. Carr, 15 Cal. App. 480, 495, 496 (115 P. 261); Rosenberg v. Bump, 43 Cal. App. 376, 398 (185 P. 218)."

The judgment and order of the trial court are reversed, with direction to said court to make and cause to be entered its judgment herein decreeing the plaintiffs herein to be the owners in fee of the parcel of land described in the complaint herein, subject, however, to the right of the defendant to have and enjoy freely the use and possession thereof during the term of his natural life.

PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. v. STATE BOARD OF EQUALIZATION et al. (S. F. 12535.)★

Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1927.

Rehearing Granted Aug. 1, 1927.

1. Taxation ☞59—Owner of property must pay tax thereon (Pol. Code, § 3628).

Owner of property subject to taxes has duty of paying tax thereon, in view of Pol. Code, § 3628.

2. Taxation ☞116—Use fixes status of property relative to whether it is operative within provision authorizing state tax on property of certain corporations in lieu of other taxes (Const. art. 13, §§ 1, 14a).

Use of property determines whether it is operative, within meaning of Const. art. 13, §§ 1, 14a, providing for state tax on property used by telephone and certain other companies in lieu of all other taxes, but it is its use by owner that fixes its status.

3. Taxation ☞124½—Constitutional provision authorizing state tax on gross receipts of certain companies in lieu of other taxes limits property exempted to that owned and excludes leased property (Const. art. 13, § 14).

Provision of Const. art. 13, § 14, that, in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, telephone and other companies shall pay tax measured by given percentage of gross receipts, limits property on which such tax must be paid to property owned by companies, and cannot be held to include leased property not owned by them.

4. Taxation ☞155—State tax, imposed on gross income in lieu of other taxes of telephone companies, remains essentially property tax (Const. art. 13, § 14).

State tax, imposed by Const. art. 13, § 14, on gross receipts of telephone companies in lieu of all other taxes, merely creates a new method of taxing property and franchises, and tax so imposed remains essentially a property tax.

5. Taxation ⚡37—Provision in Constitution authorizing state tax on gross income of certain companies in lieu of other taxes prevails if conflicting with statutory definition (Pol. Code, § 3665b; Const. art. 13, §§ 1, 14a).

If Pol. Code, § 3665b, defining term "operative property," within meaning of Const. art. 13, §§ 1, 14a, providing for state tax on gross income of certain companies in lieu of all other taxes, is not in harmony with Constitution, the provision in the Constitution must prevail.

6. Taxation ⚡251—Companies claiming exemption of operative property from local assessments and taxation must show property belongs to them: "belonging to" (Const. art. 13, § 14; Pol. Code, §§ 3665b, 3665c, 3668e).

Under Const. art. 13, § 14, authorizing state tax on gross receipts of certain companies in lieu of other taxes, and Pol. Code, §§ 3665b, 3665c, 3668e, for carrying such scheme of taxation into effect, in order that companies whose property is subject to taxation for state purposes may claim exemption of operative properties from local assessment and taxation, it must appear that property belonged to claimant, since term "belonging to," under provision authorizing lien on property and franchises belonging to company, means "to be property of."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Belong—Belonging.]

7. Taxation ⚡155—That leased buildings contribute to telephone company's receipts is immaterial on determining exemption from local taxation (Const. art. 13, § 14).

The fact that buildings leased by telephone company contribute to company's receipts is immaterial in determining exemption from local taxation, under Const. art. 13, § 14, unless such property comes within constitutional definition of property set aside for taxation for state purposes.

8. Taxation ⚡47(4)—Telephone company voluntarily agreeing to pay tax on leased property may not use fact as basis for claim of double taxation (Const. art. 13, § 14).

If a telephone company in leasing buildings voluntarily assumes contractual obligation to pay the tax it is not required by law to pay, it will not be permitted to use that fact as basis for claim of double taxation by virtue of state tax on gross receipts, under Const. art. 13, § 14.

9. Taxation ⚡80—Ordinarily owner of property is liable for taxes notwithstanding leasehold interest therein.

Ordinarily, property is taxed to owner notwithstanding leasehold interest therein, and which party shall bear burden is not a matter of public concern.

Preston, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Original application by the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company for writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to the State Board of Equalization and others, to compel the listing of certain leased property as operative. Writ denied.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, and Oscar Lawler, of Los Angeles (Lawler & Degnan, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Frank L. Guereña, Deputy Atty. Gen., Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and J. A. Tucker, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Dixwell Pierce, of Sacramento, amicus curiae.

WASTE, C. J. This application for a writ of mandate involves the question whether or not improved real property, leased by a telephone company and used by it in the operation of its business in this state, is subject to local taxation. Pursuant to section 3665c of the Political Code the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company, in April of this year, filed with the state board of equalization its annual report, showing in detail (among other items) all its property which it claimed came within the definition of operative property. It included in the report improved real property located in the cities of San Francisco, Oakland, and San Jose, which, while used exclusively in the operation of its telephone business, is not owned by the telephone company, but by others, and leased to it. The several county assessors protested against the inclusion of these properties as operative, on the sole ground that they are leased, and not owned, by the telephone company. The board of equalization, after due hearing, advised the telephone company that it has sustained the protests of the assessors on the ground specified. This application for a writ of mandate is to compel the board to reverse its ruling and to list the leased properties as operative, thereby rendering them exempt from local taxation.

[1] Prior to 1910 the Constitution of California provided that all property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, should be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. Under the amendment of that year, providing for the separation of state and local taxation and for taxing certain public service corporations for state purposes only, it is now provided that all property in the state, except as otherwise in the Constitution provided, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed according to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law, "or as [in the Constitution] provided," and that "in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county, and municipal," all telephone and other enumerated companies "shall annually pay to the state upon their franchises * * * poles, wires, pipes, canals, conduits, rights of way, and other property, or any part thereof used exclusively in the operation of their business in this state," a tax measured by a given percentage of gross receipts, equal, in the case of telephone companies, to 5½ per cent. upon the gross receipts from operation within the state. Const. art. 13, §§ 1 and 14a. The underlying theory of taxation in this state has always been that the owner of property subject to taxation must pay the tax. It needs no citation of authority to that effect. Our whole scheme of taxation rests upon that theory. Pol. Code, § 3628. Petitioner is here contending, however, that in the case of the "operative" property of companies liable to taxation for state purposes only, it is unity of operation in the use of property, regardless of ownership, and not ownership, that determines who shall pay the tax. It takes the position that, as the leased buildings are used in its business and as part of its telephone system, they are operative property and contribute to its revenues, and, consequently, to the amount of its taxes, in no way different from property owned by it, for which reason it contends that it should not pay the gross receipts tax to the state and also pay the local taxes on property the use of which yields the gross receipts. The false quantity in its reasoning is that petitioner will not be liable for the tax if the leased property be locally assessed. No matter how we may decide the controversy, the amount to be paid by the petitioner as its state tax will not be affected. It must pay the fixed percentage on its gross receipts. Neither will the amount of local taxes which the petitioner is required to pay by the tax laws of the state be affected. For the usual purposes of taxation this state does not recognize any segregation of interest between a leasehold and the reversion. The whole tax is assessed against the owner of the fee, and the tax, in the absence of any agreement between the lessor and the lessee, will be paid by the owner. If the petitioner in this case is compelled to pay the local tax, it is because it has voluntarily agreed with the lessors to do so.

[2, 3] The question involves a construction of the section of the Constitution. It is undoubtedly true that property used in the public service frequently acquires a value in the use which is something greater than the value of the property not engaged in such use. By the systemization and unification of such properties in use they in the aggregate acquire a special value by virtue of this unity of use. It is on the theory that a fair tax upon gross earnings of the utility bears such a relation to the values of these properties under their unity of use as to justify a tax upon revenue as being a legal and commutated, or substituted, tax for other taxes which previously were or might be levied that the courts have sustained the present method of taxing public service companies. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 420, 425, 143 P. 700. Petitioner cannot claim that before the change in the method of taxing public service companies went into effect it was liable for taxes levied on leased property occupied by it and used in its business. This court has always considered the present form of taxing such companies to be in fact what it purports to be; namely, a tax upon the property of the utility as it is described in the Constitution. Pullman Co. v. Richardson, 185 Cal. 484, 489, 197 P. 346. We are now asked to enlarge section 14, supra, beyond its commonly accepted scope, and to place upon its provisions an interpretation which we believe the entire context of the section does not warrant. We may concede that it is the use of the property that determines whether or not it is "operative" in character (San Bernardino v. State Board of Equalization, 172 Cal. 76, 79, 155 P. 458), but it is "use by the owner" that fixes its status. We are of the view that the provision in section 14, that, in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, telephone and other companies shall annually pay to the state upon their franchises, etc., and other property, or any part thereof used exclusively in the operation of their business, a tax measured by a given percentage of gross receipts, limits the property on which such tax must be paid to property owned by the companies, and cannot be held to include leased property not owned by them. In addition to what we accept as the plain meaning of the constitutional provision, through the use of the pronoun "their" in pointing out the property liable for the substituted tax, we cite, in support of our conclusion, the reason for and history of the adoption of the amendment (see San Francisco v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 166 Cal. 244, 135 P. 971), circumstances connected with its adoption, and legislative action following its ratification. While such matters are not conclusively binding on the court, they are of assistance in the present case, for they confirm our view as to the proper construction to be applied in the case.

[4] While the constitutional amendment of 1910 worked a radical change in the system of taxation in this state, the purpose of which was to divide the subjects of state and local taxation by imposing upon persons and corporations engaged in certain callings the obligation to pay taxes to be applied exclusively to state purposes, the tax imposed by article 13, § 14, is not radically different from the tax provided by the Constitution before the amendment. Under the old system, the property and franchises of the companies, now specially set apart, were taxed for both state and local taxes. The amendment merely creates a new method of taxing such property and franchises, and appropriates the revenue so raised to state purposes solely. San Francisco v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., supra. The tax so imposed remains essentially a property tax. Pullman Co. v. Richardson, 185 Cal. 484, 487, 197 P. 346. In submitting the proposed change to the people in 1910, the commission on revenue and taxation, in its analysis of the provisions of the constitutional amendment, contained in its report (page 18), says (italics added):

"It [the amendment] leaves the old sections unchanged, except in so far as they are modified by the new section. * * * The amendment provides that certain taxes on the property of certain classes of companies, as named and described below, shall be exclusively for state purposes. It leaves the old system of ad valorem taxation on property in general, other than that of the classes named, for the use of the counties, cities, school and other districts. * * *

"The taxes reserved for the state are:

"(1) On the operative property of railroad companies, etc.

"(2) On the property of sleeping car, * * * etc., companies, etc.

"(3) On the property of express companies, etc.

"(4) On the property of telegraph and telephone companies, etc.

"(5) On the property of all light, heat and power companies, etc.

"All the nonoperative property of the above corporations is left subject to location taxation."

It seems most reasonable to say that the commission, in explaining to the voters the nature of the change to be brought about by the new system of taxation, used, and expected the people to understand, the expression "property of" in the plain and ordinary sense of "belonging to," and as indicating ownership in the public service companies which at that time were assessed for and were compelled to pay local as well as state taxes on all property owned by them. Property not owned by the companies, but leased to them, was not assessed to them, and they were not required by law to pay taxes, state or local, thereon.

[5, 6] When, following the adoption of the amendment, it enacted the necessary procedural statutes for carrying the new scheme of taxation into effect (see Stats. 1911, p. 530), the Legislature declared (see Pol. Code, § 3665b) that the term "operative property," as used in the Code and as applied to telegraph and telephone companies doing business in the state, shall include (subd. [d]):

"The franchises, rights of way, poles, wires, pipes, conduits, cables, switchboards, telegraph and telephone instruments, batteries, generators, and other electrical appliances, and exchange and other buildings used in the telegraph and telephone business and so much of the land on which said buildings are situate as may be required for the convenient use and occupation of said buildings."

In subdivision (e) occurs the following:

"* * * The operative property of the companies enumerated in this section shall also include any other property not above enumerated that may be reasonably necessary for use by said companies exclusively in the operation and conduct of the particular kinds of business enumerated in section 3664a of this Code."

Because of the occurrence of the phrase "exchange and other buildings used in the telegraph and telephone business" in subdivision (d), and of the general definitions last quoted (subd. [e]), petitioner argues that the Legislature has made unity of use in the business the test of whether or not the property is operative. We need not discuss this contention further than to say that, if the definition of "operative property" in the Code is not in harmony with the Constitution, the provision in the Constitution must prevail. San Diego, etc., Ry. v. State Board, 165 Cal. 560, 565, 132 P. 1044; Lake Tahoe Ry., etc., Co. v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 551, 556, 143 P. 786, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1196. But we are of the view that, considered in their entirety, the Code sections are in harmony with the Constitution on this matter. The next succeeding section (3665c) makes it mandatory upon each of the public service companies, when filing its annual report to the state board of equalization, to report in such detail as the board shall prescribe "all of its property (italics added) in this state which comes under the definition of operative property" in section 3665b. By another provision (section 3668c) the Legislature made the taxes for the support of the state, under the provisions of the Constitution, supra, and the sections of the Political Code enacted to carry them into effect, a lien upon all the property and franchises of every kind and nature "belonging to" the companies subject to taxation for state purposes, the tax to have the effect of an execution duly levied against "all property of the delinquent." The primary meaning of the phrase "belonging to" is "to be the property of." 7 C. J. 1039. The judgment is not satisfied nor the lien removed until the tax, penalty, and costs are paid, or the property sold for payment. We therefore conclude that, in order that the companies whose property is subject to taxation for state purposes may claim an exemption of their operative properties from local assessment and taxation, it must first appear that the property belongs to the claimant, that is, in the sense that it is owned by it.

The further contention that, unless it be held that leased property may be operative property, it will be subjected to double taxation, and that a "serious constitutional question" will arise, is answered by the decision of this court in Bank of California v. Roberts, 173 Cal. 398, 403, 160 P. 225. If petitioner has voluntarily assumed a contractual obligation to pay a tax it is not required by law to pay, it should not be permitted to use that fact as the basis for a claim of double taxation.

We have examined the authorities relied upon by the petitioner to support its claim for an exemption of the leased buildings from local taxation. Almost the precise question submitted by the application now before us was considered in Southern California Telephone Co. v. Hopkins (C. C. A.) 13 F. (2d) 814, in a case involving certain parts of "talking sets" leased by the telephone company from another corporation and used as integral parts of certain instruments in the operation of the company's business. The Circuit Court of Appeals held that unity of use, and not ownership, determined whether or not the property was properly classed as "operative," under the provisions of the California Constitution. The cause has been transferred to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it now awaits final decision. We find ourselves in direct disagreement with the construction adopted by the federal court, because of what we believe to be the plain intent and meaning of the constitutional provisions. In Merrill Ry. & L. Co. v. City of Merrill, 119 Wis. 249, 96 N. W. 686, the court was construing a statute subjecting those engaged in operating street railways to a charge graduated upon their gross revenues, in lieu of other taxation, and which provided that other property "owned and actually and necessarily used by such person, company, or corporation in the operation of its business" should be exempt from taxation. By a divided court it was held that, under a liberal construction, the word "owned," as used in the statute, might be satisfied by something less than absolute and entire ownership, and that a leasehold interest was not subject to local taxes. Mr. Justice Marshall, dissenting, was of the view that the court should have gone only so far as to hold exempt all property which would be taxable by the general system of taxation to the railroad company if it were not for such license method. "To go further," he says, "and include property taxable to other persons under such general system and justify it by the power of the court to judicially construe, goes outside the limits of such power into that of legislation." In City of Superior v. Allouez Bay Dock Co., 166 Wis. 76, 164 N. W. 362, unity of use of the property taxed does not appear to have been considered, the question being whether or not the defendant dock company was, in legal effect, a railway company under the terms of the statute, and hence not subject to an income tax. Neither does that question appear to have been involved in City of Detroit v. Detroit Manufacturers' R. R. Co., 149 Mich. 530, 113 N. W. 365. The question was whether or not the defendant was a railroad company organized under the general railroad law, or to be considered a street railway. The cases from Illinois (e. g., People v. Wiggins Ferry Co., 257 Ill. 452, 100 N. E. 956) hold that, for the purpose of taxation under the peculiar statute of that state, a railroad company is the owner of land occupied by it for its right of way, without regard to where the fee title to the land rests. We deem it unnecessary to cite the further authorities relied on by petitioner. Other than the two first above cited, they deal with questions so unlike those involving our own Constitution and statutes that they are useful only by way of illustration. After reading all these decisions, we are still of the view that this court is not justified in extending the provisions of section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution, providing a substituted tax for public service corporations, by applying it to property not taxable to them by our system of taxation before the amendment was adopted.

[9] During the argument, the suggestion was offered that relief, to a certain extent, might be accorded to the petitioner through regarding its interest in the leased properties as operative property, the value of such interest to be considered as proper deductions by the respective local assessors when making the assessments against the owners. The law makes no specific provision for separate assessment of leasehold interests to the lessor and reversion to the owner. While it has come to be regarded as settled law that, where the state or other public authority owns the reversion, the private owner of a leasehold interest is not exempted from paying the tax upon his interest because the interest of the state is not taxable, in the ordinary case the value of the leasehold is included in the value assessed to the owner of the fee. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co. v. Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 18, 23, 179 P. 393. Assessment of possessory rights under leases for the extraction of oil and like substances from the land has been held to be proper, because of their essential difference from the ordinary possessory interests under leases. Mohawk Oil Co. v. Hopkins, 196 Cal. 148, 236 P. 133. In ordinary cases, however, the whole property is taxed to the owner, and which party shall bear the burden is not a matter of public concern.

The respondent board of equalization having correctly ruled that the property here in question is not subject to taxation for state purposes, the application for the writ is denied.

WASTE, C. J. This application for a writ of mandate involves the precise question this day decided in Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. State Board of Equalization (S. F. No. 12535) 259 P. 42, which is whether or not improved real property leased by a telephone company, and used by it in the operation of its business in this state, is subject to local taxation.

Pursuant to section 3665c of the Political Code the Southern California Telephone Company, in April of this year, filed with the state board of equalization its annual report, showing in detail (among other things) all its property which it claimed came within the definition of operative property. It included in the report certain real property, together with the improvements thereon, situate in the city of Los Angeles, and not owned by it, but leased to it, and used exclusively in the operation of its telephone and telegraph business in said city. The county assessor of Los Angeles county protested against the inclusion of this property as operative property, on the sole ground that it was leased and not owned by the telephone company. The board of equalization, after due hearing, advised the telephone company that it has sustained the protest of the assessor on the ground specified. This application for a writ of mandate is to compel the board to reverse its ruling and to list the leased property as operative.

For the reasons and on the grounds stated in the decision in Pacific Telephone & Telegraph

Co. v. State Board of Equalization, supra, the application for a writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. CLARK. (Cr. 2818.)

Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1927.

1. Criminal law ☞1131(5)—Appellate court may dismiss appeal of fugitive from justice.

Appellate court, independent of statutory authority, has power to dismiss appeal of defendant, who is a fugitive from justice.

2. Constitutional law ☞271—Dismissing appeal because of prisoner's escape is not denial of due process.

Dismissal of an appeal on account of the escape of prisoner is not denial of due process of law.

3. Criminal law ☞1131(7)—Appellate court, if having power to reinstate appeal dismissed because of prisoner's escape, should do so only when denial will work palpable injustice.

Appellate court, if it has power to reinstate an appeal dismissed on account of escape of prisoner, should exercise such power only in cases where it is plainly made to appear that a denial of its exercise would work a palpable injustice or wrong on appellant.

4. Homicide ☞253(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of first degree murder.

In prosecution for murder, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for murder in the first degree.

5. Homicide ☞338(3)—Admitting evidence of deceased's statement to companions as to being stabbed held not prejudicial, in view of testimony of defendant's using knife.

In prosecution for murder, admission of evidence as to deceased's statement to companions just after leaving defendant's place that he had been stabbed held not prejudicial, in view of positive testimony as to defendant's using a knife in encounter between him and deceased.

6. Criminal law ☞1170½(2)—Overruling objection to question of witness as to what defendant directed her to do in house where they were living held not prejudicial where answer was indefinite.

In prosecution for murder, overruling objection to question asked witness relative to what defendant had directed her to do in house in which they were living held not prejudicial, where answer to question was "several things;" being so general and indefinite as to mean nothing whatever.

7. Homicide ☞174(6)—Evidence that defendant, on morning after encounter with deceased, secured gun held admissible as indicating consciousness of guilt.

In prosecution for murder, evidence that defendant, on morning after his encounter with deceased, secured a gun from another and had it with him at time of arrest held admissible as tending to indicate a consciousness of guilt.

8. Homicide ⇨172—Evidence indicating that defendant was selling liquor and keeping disorderly house, necessary to establish conditions under which deceased and others entered defendant's place, held admissible.

In prosecution for murder, evidence establishing conditions under which deceased and companions entered defendant's place, which tended to show that defendant was engaged in illegal selling of liquor and keeping disorderly house, held competent and relevant, notwithstanding it constituted proof of other offenses.

9. Criminal law ⇨1131(7)—Appeal dismissed because of escape from custody will not be reinstated, where record on appeal presents no showing justifying reversal.

Where record on appeal from conviction of first degree murder presents no sufficient showing that would justify reversal of judgment, motion to reinstate appeal after dismissal because of escape from custody will be denied in that it would accomplish no useful purpose, since consideration of appeal after reinstatement would only result in affirmance of judgment.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Earl J. Clark was convicted of first degree murder, and he appeals. On defendant's motion to reinstate appeal after dismissal because of his escape from custody. Motion denied.

John F. Groene and Buel R. Wood, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. Motion to reinstate appeal heretofore dismissed by this court for the reason that appellant had escaped from jail subsequent to the taking of said appeal and was a fugitive from justice at the time of the dismissal thereof. The appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to suffer the death penalty. He appealed to this court from the judgment of conviction. On the 8th day of March, 1926, said appeal, after the same had been argued herein, was submitted for decision. On the 16th day of March, 1926, appellant escaped from the county jail of the county of Los Angeles, where he was being detained pending the determination of his appeal. After his escape from jail, and prior to his recapture, this court, on April 7, 1926, upon motion of the Attorney General, made an order that said appeal stand dismissed unless appellant, within 30 days from said date, return to the custody of the sheriff of said county of Los Angeles. Appellant failed to return to the custody of said sheriff within said period of 30 days, and this court, on the 6th day of June, 1926, entered its order finally dismissing said appeal. Thereafter appellant was apprehended and returned to the custody of said sheriff, and on the 8th day of March, 1927, he presented his motion to set aside and vacate said order of dismissal and to reinstate his appeal. The Attorney General resists said motion and bases his objection to the granting thereof on the ground that this court has no jurisdiction over said appeal after its order of dismissal, and, therefore, that it has no power to reinstate the same.

[1, 2] There is no statute governing the subject in this state. That the court, independent of statutory authority, has power to dismiss the appeal of an appellant who is a fugitive from justice has long been accepted as a proper exercise of the jurisdiction of the appellate courts of this state. People v. Redinger, 55 Cal. 290, 36 Am. Rep. 32; People v. Elkins, 122 Cal. 654, 55 P. 599; People v. Sitz, 21 Cal. App. 54, 130 P. 858. It is also the settled law in other jurisdictions. 17 C. J. 195, and cases cited. In the state of Texas the right is given by statute. Cobb v. State, 69 Tex. Cr. R. 619, 154 S. W. 1195; section 880, Texas Code Crim. Proc. The dismissal of an appeal on account of the escape of a prisoner is not a denial of due process of law. Allen v. Georgia, 166 U. S. 138, 17 S. Ct. 525, 41 L. Ed. 949. There is little to be found in the reports as to the power of a court, after the dismissal of an appeal upon this ground, to thereafter set aside the order of dismissal and reinstate the appeal, after the appellant has voluntarily surrendered himself, or has been returned to custody. The Texas statute provides that the order dismissing the appeal shall be set aside if it shall be made to appear that the accused has voluntarily returned to custody within 10 days after the date of said order. Under this statute it has been held that the court was without power to set aside the order of dismissal, except in the case of the voluntary return of the accused to custody within the 10-day limit, and that the recapture of the prisoner and his forcible return to custody within 10 days after his escape therefrom did not give the court power to set aside the order of dismissal. Lunsford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 118; Ex parte Wood, 19 Tex. App. 46; Loyd v. State, 19 Tex. App. 137. On the contrary, the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in which state there is no statute governing the subject, has held that it has power to reinstate the appeal of an appellant, dismissed by reason of his escape from custody. State v. Thibodeaux, 48 La. Ann. 600, 605, 19 So. 680, 682. As to its power in this regard, the court said:

"Considering this a case in which the accused has been sentenced to the extreme penalty of the law, and that our decrees should in doubtful cases favor the liberty of the citizen, and the right of appeal, we have concluded to grant the application and reinstate defendant's appeal."

[3] We think it unnecessary, however, to decide the question whether this court has or has not the power to reinstate an appeal dismissed on account of the escape of the prisoner. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the court has such power, it should only be exercised in those cases where it is plainly made to appear that a denial of its exercise would work a palpable injustice or wrong upon the appellant. We are satisfied in the present action that no advantage would accrue to the appellant by the reinstatement of his appeal. We have already referred to the fact that the appeal in this action was perfected and the cause argued and submitted for decision while appellant was in legal custody. The record on the appeal is, therefore, before us. Both the opening and closing briefs of appellant and respondent's brief are on file herein, and this court has had the benefit of argument of counsel on behalf of the respective parties. We think, therefore, that it is proper for us to look into the record of this appeal on file herein and, with the assistance of the argument of counsel already presented and their briefs before us, to consider the merits of said appeal before finally ruling upon the motion to reinstate the same; for, if the appeal is without merit, it would be a useless proceeding for this court to reinstate the same, and thereafter, upon the consideration of its merits, to deny it. Such a course would simply prolong this proceeding without securing to the appellant any beneficial results.

[4] An examination of the record shows that the contention of the prosecution was that the deceased, Silva, met his death as the result of a murderous assault made upon him by the appellant, in which appellant, with a knife, stabbed the deceased in the lower part of his abdomen, as a result of which Silva died a few hours thereafter. The main contention of appellant on this appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury finding the appellant guilty, and particularly that there is no evidence that in said assault the appellant used a knife upon the deceased, or that he had a knife in his hands during said assault. This contention can best be met by a brief review of the testimony of those present at the time of the encounter between appellant and the deceased.

The evidence shows that the deceased, Silva, and three companions, Kilbey, Utrecht, and Lane, were sailors on the vessel City of Los Angeles, which, on the evening of the 18th of April, 1925, was lying in the harbor of San Pedro. These four, on that evening, in company with two taxicab drivers, Densmore and Card, went to appellant's place, located some 4 or 5 miles from San Pedro. This place was a dwelling house which appellant had recently rented and moved into, and in which he was illegally selling intoxicating liquor. There was also residing in this house a young girl named Mamie Stephens, and the evidence tended to show that she was being kept at said place by appellant for immoral purposes. After arriving at the house, the six men were served with drinks by appellant. They had been in the house about a half hour when the altercation took place between the appellant and the deceased. It began in the room occupied by the girl, Mamie Stephens, but was soon transferred to the adjacent and main room, where the other men were. Whether it arose over the accusation by appellant that Silva and his companion had not paid for the drinks they had received from appellant, or over the girl, Mamie Stephens, or for both of these reasons, is not clear, nor is it material. As to the details of this encounter, the persons present testified at the trial, and we will briefly refer to such evidence, and particularly to that portion which tends to show whether appellant used or did not use a knife upon the deceased.

The witness Kilbey testified:

"I was sitting at the doorway there, the entrance to the bedroom in the sitting room, and all of a sudden there I heard the door open and here comes Silva backing out with his hands up like this. * * * As soon as the door opened, he simply backed out with his hand on the defendant, pretty close to him. Right directly I got up and I followed Lane out, Mr. Lane out of the house."

The witness Lane testified:

"Of course, as quick as he opened the door I seen the condition of things, I started out.

"Q. What do you mean, you saw the condition of things? what did you see? A. I saw Mr. Silva come out like this with his hands lifted.

"Q. Over his head? A. Over his head; so I seen there was trouble, and I thought I would get out of it and walked out, and Mr. Kilbey followed me. * * *

"Q. Where was Silva when you saw him there? A. Standing in the middle of the door coming out of room 2.

"Q. Right in the threshold? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you see Clark at that time? A. Clark was right in front of him, standing with his right hand behind him in that manner (indicating).

"Q. Did you see where his left hand was? A. It was at his side.

"Q. Is that all you saw at that time? A. That is all I saw; I was leaving the room."

Mamie Stephens' testimony was as follows:

"Silva started to walk out of the room and kind of walked backwards and Clark was shoving him, he wasn't really shoving him but pushing him along, and Silva went out of the room, and I don't know what he said, when he turned around to say something Clark had his hand on his shoulder, and he had his hand behind him—Clark had his hand, his right hand behind him, and I thought I saw a knife in his hand, so I—

"Mr. Groene: I object to what she thought, your honor, as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

"The Court: Yes; describe what you saw.

"Mr. Groene: I move that it be stricken from the record.

"A. (continuing). Well, he had something in his hand, and I went over and picked at whatever he had, and he pushed me, and I went on in the bathroom, and I changed my dress into a pair of sailor pants and went on the outside."

Utrecht's testimony:

"Then Clark grabbed hold of Silva by the coal lapel; he had one end (hand) up against Silva's body, and I was on my feet there and I got over near the bedroom door, and Kilbey and Lane and Card came in there from the other room. He heard the argument between Silva and Clark, and he said, 'Come on, fellows, let's get out of here,' and Clark and Silva then, they were arguing, one saying he paid for the drinks and the other saying he hadn't paid for them, and all of this time Clark had one arm up to Silva that way, and Silva assumed that attitude; then I saw Clark's arm go this way three times right at Silva's body, and then I saw Densmore, he came in from the bathroom into the bedroom, and then into the sitting room where we were."

Testimony of the witness Card:

"Q. Where were you at that time? A. I was right in here, in the kitchen doorway.

"Q. Yes; and you saw Silva coming out of that door? A. Well, he was coming out kind of fast and making considerable noise.

"Q. What did he say? A. Kind of conglomeration. I could not understand his words, except that he was going to pay something.

"Q. Then what happened? A. Then Clark got abold of him some way by the coat, and I don't know, he made several rapid motions with his right hand, and he stepped back from the doorway, then with his right hand behind him, and he says, 'I will kill you, I will kill you.'

"Q. Then what happened? A. Then Silva, he had been having his hands in the air, kind of gesticulating, he had— He was about ready to go and quit."

Testimony of witness Densmore:

"This Clark then, he says, 'Well,' he says, 'I don't care, I want you to get out of here, the whole bunch of you.' So then Silva said something to him about all right, he would leave; and then Clark told him, he says, 'If you fellows want trouble, I will give it to you,' and he stood with one hand on Silva's collar and his right hand was in back of him, so when he made that remark he pulled his right hand out and he cut Silva three times in the stomach—

"Q. Did he say anything at that time? A. Not that particular moment, but at about two seconds later after he had cut Silva, he told him then, 'I will kill you, you son of a B, I will kill you.' * * * So then he turned Silva loose. Silva says, he says, 'I will go.'"

Later on, we find the following in this witness' testimony:

"Q. (by Juror): Did you testify that you saw the defendant make two or three distinct jabs that afternoon at Silva, the deceased? A. When he stabbed him?

"The Juror: Yes. A. He struck one blow and then he kind of withdrew the knife—that is to say, this way, and give two more, but it was not withdrawn clean from the man's body.

"The Juror: You saw the knife in his hand? A. Yes, sir."

The witness Densmore, a short time after the affray between the appellant and the deceased, took the appellant and the girl, Mamie Stephens in Densmore's machine away from the house in which the affray took place. He testified that, as they were leaving the premises, in answer to a question asked him by the prosecution:

"Well, before he (Clark) got into the car he threw something in an underhanded way out into the grass, and after I had backed the machine out on to the street and started away from the house, then he spoke up to me and says, through the window, he was sitting in the back with the girl, and I was sitting in the front seat, and there was a window between, and he opened the door and stuck his head out of the window and he said, 'They will never find that.' I said, 'What?' He says, 'That knife.' He said, 'I broke it all up and threw it away.'"

The next day, and after the arrest of the defendant at Culver City, where he had gone with the girl, Mamie Stephens, the officers found on the premises, where the encounter between appellant and the deceased had taken place, the handle of a knife, in which, according to the testimony of one of said officers, "the blade or the middle part had—was fresh. It looked as if it had recently been broken."

This evidence was, without doubt, sufficient to justify the jury in believing that the wound inflicted upon the deceased had been made by a knife in the hands of the appellant. While only Densmore testified positively that he had seen the appellant stab the deceased with the knife, the others saw the encounter between the two men, and some of them testified to movements made by appellant with his hands, which strongly corroborated the testimony of Densmore that appellant used a knife upon the deceased. But, independent of the evidence of these last-mentioned witnesses, the testimony of Densmore is positively and directly to the effect that the appellant used a knife in his assault upon the deceased. His testimony alone is sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury, and with it in the record, this court would not be justified in setting aside the verdict on the ground of its insufficiency.

Immediately after the trouble between the two men, Silva, with his three companions and Card, left in the latter's taxicab, and were taken by Card to San Pedro, where they immediately boarded their ship. The only unusual circumstance regarding the evidence as a whole is that Silva gave no outward evidence that he had received a serious wound. While he did say, on his way back from the house of the defendant to his ship, that he had been stabbed, he did not act the part, nor did this remark seem to make any perceptible effect upon his companions. On arriving at the harbor he insisted on paying for the taxicab, and, with his companions, Kilbey, Utrecht, and Lane, went on board their vessel, each man going to his own room. But within a few minutes—one witness gives the time as about 3 minutes—he heard Silva holler, and, hastening to his room, the three men found Silva, partially undressed, lying in his bunk with a severe cut or wound on the left side of his abdomen, slightly below the navel. It had taken them only about 30 minutes to drive from appellant's house to the place where their ship was docked. From the effect of this wound Silva died a few hours thereafter. There was no evidence tending in the slightest degree to show that Silva had or could have received the wound after he left appellant's house. He was not out of the sight of his three companions from the time they left appellant's house except for the short space of about 3 minutes after he left them to go to his room upon the ship. Their rooms were in close proximity to each other, and had any assault or encounter taken place between Silva and any other person they would have heard it. This circumstance therefore, while unusual, would not be sufficient to overcome the effect of the other testimony in the case, pointing to the guilt of the appellant.

[5] Appellant claims that it was error for the court, over his objection, to admit in evidence the statement of Silva, made to his companions in the taxicab just after leaving appellant's place, that he had been stabbed. Conceding this evidence to be inadmissible, as not being a part of the res gestæ and not made in the presence of the appellant, its admission could not have seriously prejudiced the appellant's case in view of the positive testimony of Densmore that the appellant used a knife in the encounter between him and the deceased.

[6] A further assignment of error is made by appellant to the action of the court in overruling his objection to a question asked of the witness Mamie Stephens as to what appellant directed her to do in the house in which they were living. The question was answered before the objection was made, and appellant did not ask to have the answer stricken out. The only answer, however, given by the witness to this question was, "Several things." It may be conceded that, as the objection was overruled, a motion to strike out the answer would have been denied. We fail to see, however, how the answer, "Several things," given by the witness, could have been harmful to appellant. It was so general and indefinite that it meant nothing whatever, and could not have helped the case of the prosecution, nor damaged that of appellant.

[7, 8] The further contention is made that the court erred in permitting witnesses to testify as to what occurred just prior to the men going to appellant's house, and as to events transpiring after leaving appellant's place. As to the evidence regarding events that transpired just prior to the appearance of the men at appellant's house, as far as we are able to gather from the record and from appellant's briefs, the only testimony given by the witnesses was that they rode out in a car driven by Densmore, and that Card was sitting alongside of him on the front seat of the car. The court sustained all objections to any evidence of conversations had between the men during the ride and prior to the beginning thereof, and, on motion of appellant's counsel, struck out all conversations which had been admitted without objection. We can see no ground upon which the appellant can base any claim of error in this regard. As to occurrences happening after the men left the appellant's place, these simply covered the acts of the four men in returning to their ship, were of slight consequence, and had no particular bearing, one way or the other, upon any phase of this controversy. The only one of these circumstances which might be questioned was the conversation between these men in which Silva stated that he had been stabbed, and which we have already referred to and considered. Under this assignment appellant takes exception to evidence to the effect that the next morning after his encounter with Silva he secured a gun from one James Valenti in San Pedro, and had it with him at the time of his arrest. This evidence was admissible as tending to indicate a consciousness of guilt. Appellant makes the further contention that he was injuriously affected by the introduction of evidence tending to prove that he was guilty of other crimes, such as the selling of intoxicating liquor and the keeping of a disorderly house. It is true that the evidence is capable of such a construction. But it was competent to show the conditions under which the men entered appellant's place, to the end that they might not appear to be intruders and unbidden guests of the appellant. The circumstances surrounding their visit indicate clearly that appellant was engaged in the illegal selling of liquor and in the keeping of a disorderly house, and that he was not adverse to Silva and his companions entering his place and purchasing his wares. This evidence showed that the men were in the house with the consent and approval of appellant, and if it showed the commission of other crimes by him, this fact did not affect its admissibility. It was competent and relevant, notwithstanding it was proof of other offenses. People v. Craig, 152 Cal. 42, 91 P. 997; People v. Hatch, 163 Cal. 368, 125 P. 907.

The final complaint of the appellant is that the district attorney in his opening statement to the jury and in his final argument of the case was guilty of such misconduct as to prejudice the rights of the appellant to have a fair and impartial trial. We have read in full the remarks of the district attorney before the jury, and we fail to find anything therein that could be reasonably construed as prejudicial to appellant's legal rights. Appellant has made but few specifications of misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer, none of which are well taken. We cannot feel that there is any merit in this contention.

[9] The record on appeal before us presents no sufficient showing that would justify a reversal of the judgment. It would accomplish no useful purpose, and it would avail nothing to the appellant to reinstate his appeal, as a consideration thereof could only result in an affirmation of the judgment. We therefore feel constrained to deny appellant's motion to set aside the order dismissing his appeal, and it is so ordered.

LU DY v. ZUMWALT et al. (Civ. 3298.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 15, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 14, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 13, 1927.

1. Mortgages ⇨154(4)—Record of lien given by land purchase optionee before exercise of option was not, under recording statute, notice to purchase-money mortgagee (Civ. Code, § 1213).

Recording of lien given by one who held only option to purchase, but who subsequently exercised the option, was not constructive notice thereof, under recording statute (Civ. Code, § 1213), to subsequent purchase-money mortgagee.

2. Mortgages ⇨158—Title of purchaser under option agreement did not, by relation, date back to agreement, hence lien given in interim was not superior to purchase-money mortgage.

Title of purchaser under option agreement did not by the fiction of relation date back to date of option, hence lien given in interim was not superior to vendor's purchase-money mortgage.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨18(½)—The only possible equity land purchase optionee has in the property is possible right to specific performance.

While the optionee of a land purchase agreement may be entitled to have such agreement specifically enforced, it is to that extent only that he can claim, if he can do so at all, an equity in the property involved in the agreement.

4. Mortgages ⇨158—Land purchase optionee had no such interest in land as to make lien then given superior to subsequent purchase-money mortgage.

Defendant's option to purchase land gave him no such interest in the land as to make a lien given by him under an irrigation contract before his actual purchase right was exercised superior to lien of purchase-money mortgage, although water lien was on record, but not known of by vendor, at time option was exercised.

On Petition for Rehearing.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨18(3)—Doctrines of relation and after-acquired title, relative to time one exercising land purchase option acquired title, held same in effect.

Where contention was made that the court incorrectly applied the doctrine of title by relation, instead of the doctrine of after-acquired title, to the question as to when one exercising a land purchase option acquired title, held, that the doctrines are, in effect, the same.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨18(3)—Option becomes binding contract only when exercised according to agreement, being not a sale, but right to exercise privilege.

Since an option is not a sale, but a right to exercise a privilege, only when that privilege has been exercised in the manner provided in the agreement does it become a binding contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by Sarah Elizabeth Ludy against I. G. Zumwalt and wife and the Western Canal Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Western Canal Company appeals. Affirmed.

Guy C. Earl and W. H. Spaulding, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ware & Ware, of Chico, and U. W. Brown and I. G. Zumwalt, both of Colusa, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this suit to foreclose a mortgage upon certain lands situated in Glenn county, given by the defendants I. G. and Mattie B. Zumwalt to plaintiff to secure the payment to the latter of a promissory note, dated January 13, 1920, for the sum of $42,601.30.

The complaint is in the usual form in foreclosure proceedings. It alleges, however, that the appellant Western Canal Company and certain other parties "have, or claim to have, or assert, some interest in or claim upon said mortgaged lands and premises, or some part thereof, the exact nature of which is unknown to plaintiff, and for said reason she cannot allege or state the nature thereof, but she alleges that all of said liens, claims, or interests of any of said defendants are subsequent to and subject to the lien of plaintiff."

The Zumwalts answered, denying that the note "is now due" and also the allegation of the complaint, which accords with a provision of the mortgage in that respect, that 2 per cent. of the amount found due as principal and interest on said note "is a reasonable amount for attorney's fee in the foreclosure of said mortgage," and setting up "a separate defense" to the effect that, prior to the commencement of this action, and since the 13th day of January, 1924, the plaintiff in writing extended the time for the payment of said note to January 13, 1925. At the trial, however, the Zumwalts withdrew their denial that the note was due and their affirmative defense that plaintiff had extended the time for the payment thereof, leaving as the only issue as between the plaintiff and the Zumwalts the question, raised by their answer, whether the attorney's fees claimed by the complaint and as provided for in the mortgage would constitute a reasonable sum to be awarded plaintiff for that purpose.

The appellant Canal Company, a corporation organized for the purpose, among others, of supplying water to owners of land conveniently adjacent to its water system for the purpose of irrigation, answered the complaint, and in its answer embodied, in effect, a cross-complaint, in which it set up a lien upon the lands in question, growing out of a contract with the Zumwalts, whereby it agreed to furnish the latter, at specified rates, for a number of successive years, sufficient water with which to irrigate the lands in controversy, alleged that said lien was prior and superior to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage, to foreclose which is the object of this action, and prayed that a decree be entered so adjudging.

The plaintiff answered the affirmative allegations of the so-called answer, and, after certain denials, and with more or less detail, recited the facts leading to the several transactions out of which the present controversy has developed and of which such consideration will hereinafter be given as will conduce to a proper understanding of the issues tried and determined below and now submitted here for review.

The findings by the trial court are favorable to the plaintiff, and, consequently, negative the claim by the appellant of a lien upon said lands prior in point of time to that of the plaintiff. As a matter of law the court concluded (conclusions of law) that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the Zumwalts for the sum of $41,601, as principal, and $1,554.62 and $1,383.24, accruing, respectively, as interest to the date of the verification of her complaint, and subsequent to such verification, to January 13, 1925; that plaintiff is entitled to judgment decreeing that her mortgage is a first lien and "prior to any lien or claim of any character or kind whatever of any defendants, including the Western Canal Company, upon the lands described in the complaint"; that the plaintiff is entitled to have her mortgage and lien foreclosed, and is entitled to a judgment of foreclosure of the same and of the sale of said lands described in the complaint; that she is entitled to a provision in said judgment that she has a first lien upon all of said land for the payment of the sums found by the court that she is entitled to; that Western Canal Company is entitled to a judgment against the Zumwalts for the sums of $2,159.81 and $6,723, and interest on said sums from, respectively, December 1, 1921, and from December 1, 1922; that appellant is entitled to have a provision inserted in said judgment that "it has a lien upon the said 866 acres of land (the land upon which plaintiff's mortgage and the appellant's lien subsist) in the foregoing findings mentioned for the payment of said sums for which it is entitled to judgment, which lien is second to and subordinate to the lien in plaintiff's favor, as aforesaid."

Judgment was entered in harmony with the findings and conclusions of law.

The appeal is by Western Canal Company upon the judgment roll alone, from so much of said judgment as adjudges or decrees that its lien upon said lands is secondary and subordinate to the plaintiff's mortgage lien thereon.

The facts as disclosed by the findings may be herein stated as they are set out in appellant's opening brief, and which are among the facts specifically found by the court:

"Plaintiff owned an undivided one half interest in a 923-acre tract of land in Glenn county. The other half interest was owned in equal shares by eight other persons, her children. On September 22, 1919, in consideration of the payment of $5,000 by defendant I. G. Zumwalt to said children, plaintiff and her children granted said Zumwalt an option for the purchase of said 923 acres. While said option was still alive, and on December 11, 1919, a contract was made between said Zumwalt and said appellant for the sale of water to irrigate all irrigable land in said tract, which proved to be 866 acres thereof, particularly described in the findings of fact and being all of said 923-acre tract 'save the sloughs and small waste parts and portions thereof.' On December 15, 1919, this water contract was recorded in Book 6 of Contracts and Agreements, at page 435, in the office of the county recorder of said county of Glenn, and later recorded, on January 5, 1920, in Book 44 of Mortgages, at page 188 thereof, in said office of said county recorder.

"At the time this contract was made, and at all times until after the commencement of this action, appellant was informed and believed that said I. G. Zumwalt owned all the property described in said contract, free and clear of any and all liens and incumbrances, except, of course, the lien of said contract for the payment of water bills, and had no actual information or actual knowledge to the contrary, and would not otherwise have furnished any water upon any of the lands described in said agreement. By the terms of said contract appellant was granted a permanent lien upon said lands as security for the payment of all moneys due or to fall due thereunder, such lien to be a first and prior lien.

"On January 13, 1920, plaintiff and her said eight children conveyed by deed the said 923 acres to said Zumwalt, plaintiff being at that time the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the said lands, and the eight children then owning each an undivided one-sixteenth interest therein. Simultaneously with the execution of said deed said Zumwalt paid said eight children in full for their aggregate one-half interest in said land the sum of $42,601.30, including said $5,000. Said Zumwalt paid plaintiff nothing in cash, but in consideration of her half interest in said property said Zumwalt executed and delivered at that time to plaintiff his note for $42,601.32, secured by a mortgage from said Zumwalt and his wife to said plaintiff covering said 923 acres; said note and mortgage being given to secure to said plaintiff her one-half share of the purchase price of said land as owner of the half interest therein. Plaintiff, at the time she took said note and mortgage, had no knowledge or information of said contract between said Zumwalt and Western Canal Company or that said Western Canal Company claimed any lien upon any of said land, and would not have accepted said note and mortgage had she known of said lien in favor of appellant. Said mortgage was thereafter, on January 16, 1920, recorded in the office of the said county recorder.

"Under the terms of said contract appellant did, during the year 1921, furnish on said lands water of the value of the principal amount of $2,159.81, and likewise during the year 1922 water of the value, under said contract, of $6,723.

"Said Zumwalt paid neither of said water bills nor any interest thereon. Having also defaulted in payment of his note to plaintiff, plaintiff brought suit to foreclose her said mortgage."

It may be added to the above statement that the court, both as a matter of fact and of law, found that I. G. Zumwalt and Mattie B. Zumwalt, prior to the execution of the deed by plaintiff and her children conveying the land in question to I. G. Zumwalt—

"had no right, title, or interest in the lands and premises described in plaintiff's complaint and they had no right, title, or interest therein at the time of the execution of said agreement in the form of Exhibit A (the agreement between appellant and I. G. Zumwalt for the furnishing by the former of water for irrigation purposes to said Zumwalt), or at the time of the recordation of said agreement in the form of Exhibit A on the 5th day of January, 1920, as alleged in the answer of said defendant Western Canal Company, except that said defendant I. G. Zumwalt obtained from the parties executing the deed as aforesaid, on September 22, 1919, in consideration of the payment of $5,000 by said I. G. Zumwalt, to the parties other than plaintiff executing the deed as aforesaid, an option for the purchase of the lands described in said deed, which said option was in full force and effect at the time of the execution and also at the time of recordation of said agreement in form of Exhibit A aforesaid," etc.

The court, among its findings, also made the following, which, it is to be noted, partakes as well of the nature of a conclusion of law as of a finding of fact:

"That the said mortgage so made, executed, and delivered by defendants I. G. Zumwalt and Mattie B. Zumwalt to plaintiff was and is wholly a purchase-money mortgage and was given, made, and executed in order to secure the payment to plaintiff by said I. G. Zumwalt and Mattie B. Zumwalt of the purchase price agreed upon at the time of the sale of said property to the said I. G. Zumwalt, as aforesaid."

The plaintiff urges several different points in support of the judgment. The most important of these are the following: 1. That, as the court found, the mortgage to foreclose which is the object of this action, is "a purchase-money mortgage," it having been given by the nonappealing defendants to secure the payment of the purchase price of the lands, and that it takes precedence over and is superior to the previously recorded lien growing out of appellant's water contract of December 11, 1919. 2. That, at the time of the recordation of the appellant's lien, the Zumwalts were in no way connected with the title of record to the mortgaged premises, hence the recordation of appellant's lien imparted no notice of the existence of such lien upon the mortgaged premises and therefore cannot hold the position of priority over the lien of plaintiff's mortgage.

[1] The briefs of counsel are devoted mainly to the discussion of the point first above stated, but the consideration thereof herein is not required or necessary, since it seems to be clear that upon the authorities, as well as upon principle, the judgment must be sustained upon the ground that as the Zumwalts, at the time of the making and the recordation of the water contract with appellant, or at the time plaintiff's mortgage was recorded, had no title of record or were in no manner connected with such title to the mortgaged premises, the lien attached to said premises by the water contract gave no notice to any one of the existence thereof on said lands, and was consequently subordinate or subservient to plaintiff's lien. Section 1213 of the Civil Code, relating to the recordation of conveyances of real property, or so much thereof as is pertinent to the present inquiry, reads as follows:

"Every conveyance of real property acknowledged or proved and certified and recorded as prescribed by law from the time it is filed with the recorder for record is constructive notice of the contents thereof to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees."

Bothin v. California Title Insurance & Trust Co., 153 Cal. 718, 723, 724, 96 P. 500, 503, was a case in which the Title Company issued to the plaintiff (Bothin) a policy insuring and guaranteeing the title to certain real property, numbered lot 71, situated in the city of San Francisco, and the plaintiff thereupon purchased said property. It was discovered after the transfer of the property had been made to plaintiff that one Partridge, prior to the date of the transfer of said lot to plaintiff, had conveyed to the trustees of a bank by a trust deed a lot in said city, which said trust deed included, though not by name or reference to the number thereof, 14 feet of plaintiff's said lot, and that the said bank had duly recorded said trust deed; that upon said lot so conveyed to the bank, at the time of said conveyance by Partridge, there was a building which extended onto and occupied said 14 feet of plaintiff's lot. The trust deed not showing by the description of the property therein contained that lot 71, or any portion thereof, was either by name or otherwise embraced within said description, the fact that it embraced any portion thereof could only be determined by a survey according to the calls of the trust deed. Action was by plaintiff to recover damages against the Title Insurance Company for a breach of the covenant of its insurance policy guaranteeing that there was no defect in the title of the lot or real property purchased by the plaintiff. The Supreme Court sustained the judgment of the trial court in holding that, inasmuch as the public records did not show that Partridge was in any way connected with the title of record to plaintiff's lot 71, or to any portion thereof, his trust deed to the bank did not and could not constitute notice that said 14 feet had thereby been conveyed to the bank by Partridge, or, contrary to the contention of plaintiff in said action, did not "create any defect in the record title" of said lot No. 71, or in any portion thereof. On this subject, the court, discussing the rule in such cases in its abstract as well as in its concrete application, said:

"One who is not connected by any conveyance whatever with the record title to a piece of property and makes a conveyance thereof, does not thereby create any defect in the record title of another when such title is deducible by intermediate effective conveyances from the original owners to that other. This we think so clear that it is idle to attempt to elaborate it. Such a deed would not even be constructive notice. Our Code provides that every conveyance of real property, acknowledged and recorded, is from the date of recordation constructive notice of its contents to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees. Civ. Code, § 1213. This language is very general, applying in terms to every conveyance, but it is held that this only contemplates conveyances by one having legal title to the property conveyed and is applied where there are conflicting conveyances made by persons claiming under the same common grantor. It does not apply to a deed by a stranger; one who is not connected in any manner with the title of record. No notice whatever is conveyed by such a deed. Long v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 218; Garber v. Gianella, 98 Cal. 529 (33 P. 458); Sharon v. Minock, 6 Nev. 377; Rankin v. Miller, 43 Iowa, 19; Edwards v. McKernan, 55 Mich. 526 (22 N. W. 20)."

In Garber v. Gianella, 98 Cal. 529, 33 P. 458, cited in the above extract from Bothin v. California Title Insurance & Trust Co., in an action in conversion, the plaintiff sued to and did recover judgment against the defendant for the alleged conversion of certain wheat. By a deed of conveyance from one Lorenzo Gianella, the plaintiff acquired title to and ownership of a certain tract of land. Prior to that transaction, the grantor had given his son, Vincenza Gianella (defendant), a lease of said land upon a money rent for the term of 5 years. The said lease was not acknowledged and never recorded. During the term of the lease, and before the transfer of said land to plaintiff, Vincenza Gianella subleased the land to one Boulware. By the terms of that sublease, Boulware was, as a consideration; to pay Vincenza a yearly rent or sum in the form of one-third of the crops "in the stack at the machine." Said sublease to Boulware was recorded at the request of Vincenza. The deed to plaintiff granted or conveyed to him the land, "together with the rents, issues, and profits thereof," and warranted, for the grantor and his heirs, peaceful and quiet possession of said premises in the grantee and his heirs and assigns against the grantor "and his heirs, and against all and every person and persons whomsoever lawfully claiming or to claim the same, shall and will warrant, and by these presents forever defend, subject, however, to a lease to Daniel Boulware, which said lease expires November 1, 1889." The deed contained nothing to indicate from whom Boulware obtained his lease. The wheat which the plaintiff (grantee of the land) claimed in his action was converted by Vincenza Gianella was that which Boulware delivered to the former under the terms of the sublease between Vincenza and Boulware. When negotiating for the purchase of the land, plaintiff was informed of the existence of the Boulware lease and of the fact that it would not expire until a year from the date (April 12, 1888) of the conveyance of the land to him. Affirming the judgment in favor of plaintiff, the Supreme Court, among other things, made the following observations which involve a statement of the reason of the rule now under consideration:

"The conveyance from Lorenzo Gianella to the plaintiff had the effect to transfer to him the entire ownership of the land, including its rents, issues, and profits, subject to only such limitations as were contained in the instrument of transfer, or of which the plaintiff had either actual or constructive notice. As the lease to the defendant from his father was not recorded, there was no constructive notice thereby to the plaintiff of its existence. The lease was a 'conveyance' of the land within the definition of section 1215 of the Civil Code, and the interest in the land that was thereby created in the defendant, though limited to a right to receive the products of the land, was as void as against the plaintiff, by reason of the failure to have it recorded, as if it had been an unrecorded conveyance in fee. The record of the lease from the defendant to Boulware was not constructive notice of the lease to the defendant, or that he had any interest in the land. The provisions of recording acts are for the protection of subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers from the common grantor, and do not affect the rights of strangers to the claim of title. Chicago v. Witt, 75 Ill. 211; Losey v. Simpson, 11 N. J. Eq. 249; Traphagen v. Irwin, 18 Neb. 198 [24 N. W. 684]; Ely v. Wilcox, 20 Wis. 523 [91 Am. Dec. 436]; Long v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 227; 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, §§ 658, 701. Records are only constructive notice of a title of which they enable a party to obtain actual notice or knowledge by means of a search."

The following California cases are to the same effect: Millett v. Lagomarsino, 4 Cal. Unrep. 883, 38 P. 308; Dobbins v. Economic Gas Co., 182 Cal. 616, 189 P. 1073, the opinion being written by Mr. Justice Olney, and the doctrine under consideration therein stated with the clearness characterizing his judicial opinions. To the California cases named may be added the following from other jurisdictions in which the proposition in hand is discussed, and in which the conclusions announced are in harmony with our own decisions: Heffron v. Flanigan, 37 Mich. 274; Donovan v. Twist, 105 App. Div. 171, 93 N. Y. S. 990; Ryder v. Cobb, 68 Iowa, 235, 26 N. W. 91; Ransom v. Sargent, 22 Kan. 516; Bradley v. Bryan, 43 N. J. Eq. 396, 13 A. 806; Boyd v. Mundorf, 30 N. J. Eq. 545. In the last-named case it is well said:

"Where, as in this case, the vendor of real estate records his mortgage [to secure the purchase price] at the same instant that the deed from him is recorded, he surely can have no occasion to examine the records for incumbrances created by his vendee on the property, prior to the recording of his conveyance."

[2, 3] The position of appellant here, as is obvious, is that the conveyance by plaintiff to the Zumwalts of the land in controversy established the title of the latter to the lands in controversy as of the date of the option agreement whereby the plaintiff gave to the Zumwalts the right to purchase the property. But, as is said in the case of Hawkins v. Harlan, 68 Cal. 236, 237, 9 P. 108, 109, and equally applicable to the facts of the instant case:

"This [referring to a position taken by counsel similar to the position of appellant here] is by operation of the doctrine of relation, which is a fiction of the law adopted solely for the purposes of justice, and will not be given effect when, as in the present case, it would work manifest injustice. Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wall. 101 [20 L. Ed. 534]; Shay v. McNamara, 54 Cal. 169."

[4] The plaintiff in the present case would manifestly have no reason to investigate the public records to ascertain whether I. G. Zumwalt or any other stranger to the title had created, or any person had acquired, a lien upon the property prior to the execution of the deed by plaintiff to the Zumwalts conveying the lands to them and the simultaneous execution of the mortgage by the latter to secure the purchase price thereof, or at least so much of such purchase price as plaintiff was entitled to. And even if she had for any reason examined the records for that purpose, she would not, under our index system of recording written instruments required by law to be recorded, have obtained any knowledge of the lien of appellant, unless she had gone further in her investigation of the records than the law contemplates. Pol Code, § 4132, subds. 1, 2, and 26. But the more important consideration in this connection, and one which more pointedly than any other exposes the utter futility of any attempt to apply the doctrine of relation here is the fact that by the option agreement the Zumwalts acquired no interest in the lands in dispute other than that which is comprehended within the mere right to purchase said lands within a specified time for a specified consideration. While the optionee of an option agreement, valid in all essentials and fair, may be entitled to have such agreement specifically enforced, it is to that extent only that he can claim, if strictly speaking he can do so at all, an equity in the property involved in the agreement. Manifestly, it cannot logically be held that, by virtue of his mere right to purchase the property which is the subject of the option, the optionee acquires any actual interest in the property itself which is the subject thereof, or that he can acquire any such interest until he has seasonably accepted or exercised his option to purchase according to the terms of the agreement. "An option," says the Supreme Court, in Hicks v. Christeson, 174 Cal. 712, 716, 164 P. 395, 397, "is by no means a sale of property, but the sale of the right to purchase." (Italics ours.) Dreyfus v. Richardson, 20 Cal. App. 800-805, 130 P. 161; Pehl v. Fanton, 17 Cal. App. 247, 119 P. 400. See, also, Menzel v. Primm, 6 Cal. App. 204, 209, 91 P. 764; Howard v. D. W. Hobson Co., 38 Cal. App. 445, 455, 176 P. 715; Ware v. Quigley, 176 Cal. 694, 698, 169 P. 377. An excellent definition of an option is given in 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 606, as follows:

"The distinction between a contract to purchase or sell real estate and an option to purchase is that the contract to purchase or sell creates a mutual obligation on the one party to sell and on the other to purchase, while an option merely gives the right to purchase within a limited time without imposing any obligation to purchase."

It, of course, follows from the foregoing considerations, that, in making the agreement of option, the minds of the plaintiff and her children, on the one hand, and that of I. G. Zumwalt, on the other, could have come together on but one proposition, to wit, the giving by the former and the acceptance by the latter of the right to purchase the property for the stipulated sum within the time specified in said agreement—a right which Zumwalt was at liberty to waive or refuse to exercise. Thus it is very clear, if, indeed, there could be any doubt as to the legal stability of the proposition after an examination of the cases above considered, that the Zumwalts, prior to the conveyance of the property to them, had absolutely no interest in said property upon which they could create a lien which would or could take precedence over the plaintiff's mortgage lien. Certainly, the fact, as found by the court, that the sum of $5,000 paid by I. G. Zumwalt as a consideration for the option, was, agreeably to plaintiff, paid to her children, co-owners of the property, even if said sum was to be applied towards the payment of the latter's respective shares of the purchase price, if Zumwalt exercised the right with which he was invested by the option to purchase the property, did not have the effect of changing the nature of the transaction, in so far as the agreement of option was concerned. In other words, said payment did not impart to said agreement of option any greater dignity in legal effect than that of the ordinary option conferring upon a party the right to purchase real property. But is unnecessary further to pursue the inquiry. We have carefully examined the cases cited by counsel for the appellant, and we find nothing in them which conflicts with the conclusion herein arrived at.

The judgment is obviously legal and just, and it is accordingly affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [5, 6] In their petition for a rehearing, counsel for the appellant declare that they did not and do not rely upon the doctrine of relation for the establishment of their position in this case; yet they assert in the petition that what they have always claimed and still contend is that the moment that the Zumwalts acquired title to the land through or by means of the deed to them from the plaintiff and her children, such "after-acquired" title in effect imparted validity to the appellant's lien, or, in other words, said conveyance inured to the benefit of the appellant as a lien claimant upon the land. The doctrine of "after-acquired" title is, in effect, the same as the doctrine of relation. The repudiation of the doctrine of relation by counsel for the appellant as the breastworks of their position warrants the assumption that it is by it granted that its lien was wholly without validity and legal force until the Zumwalts acquired title to the property. But, be that as it may, the proposition upon which appellant mainly relies in its petition is that its lien takes precedence over the mortgage lien of plaintiff because the former lien was recorded prior to the recordation of the latter lien.

The difference, however, between appellant's position and the conclusion arrived at by this court is that the appellant assumes, contrary to its declaration in the petition regarding the doctrine of relation, that the Zumwalts became identified or connected with the title to the property by virtue of the agreement of option; whereas, our position is, as indicated in the former opinion, that the option agreement did not have any such effect; that said option merely involved a unilateral agreement not binding upon the optioner from the date of its execution, but which does not become a contract inter partes in the sense of an absolute contract to convey on the one side and to purchase on the other, until exercised by the optionee; that, in other words, an option is not a sale, but a right to exercise a privilege, and only when that privilege has been exercised in the manner provided in the agreement does it become a binding contract (Barnes v. Rea, 219 Pa. 279, 68 Atl. 836; Perry v. Paschal, 103 Ga. 134, 29 S. E. 703); that, such being the case, the filing for record of appellant's lien did not impart constructive notice to the plaintiff or to any one else of the existence of such lien, since such agreement could not vest in the Zumwalts title to the land or connect them in any way therewith.

The appellant in its petition cites a number of cases other than those mentioned in its original briefs as in support of the position they assume in this case. Those cases are from other jurisdictions, and some of them construe the statute law of their respective states, which is in terms the same as section 1213 of our Civil Code, in harmony with the view of appellant. Other cases that are so cited or rather named in connection with the cases cited, and which are referred to in 25 A. L. R. at page 89, construed the section of our code just named as it is interpreted by the Supreme Court in Bothin v. California Title Ins. Co., 153 Cal. 718, 723, 724, 96 P. 500, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 634, which is cited in our original opinion. We still adhere to the view expressed in the original opinion that the California case just mentioned and other cases referred to in the original opinion clearly, hold that the recordation of a conveyance by a party having no interest in or connection with the title thereto does not have the effect of imparting notice to the real owner of the property or the public of such conveyance. If the Zumwalts, at the time of executing the contract with the appellant, were connected in any way with the record title to the property, then the position of appellant here would be impregnable; but, as stated, it is clear to our minds that at the time mentioned the Zumwalts had no more connection with the title to the property than any other person having no transaction with the owner of the land regarding said property.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

E. J. Lickley, City Prosecutor, and Vernon S. Gray, Deputy City Prosecutor, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus, wherein the petitioner is attacking the sufficiency of two complaints, one charging him with possession of a certain still which was alleged to have been "designed, used, and intended to be used for the manufacture of alcoholic intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, containing alcohol of more than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume," which is therein alleged to be contrary to the provision of the Volstead Act, made and provided by title 2 of the National Prohibition Act, enacted by Congress of the United States on the 28th day of October, 1919 (27 USCA § 4 et seq.; U. S. Comp. St. §§ 10138½–10138½z), and as adopted by the state of California (St. 1921, p. 79), and the other complaint charging said Terry Adams with having in possession certain alcoholic intoxicating liquors which are fit for use for beverage purposes, which did then and there contain more than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume "contrary to the provisions of the Volstead Act, made and provided by title 2 of the National Prohibition Act, enacted by Congress of the United States on the 28th day of October, 1919, and as adopted by the state of California." This complaint further alleges prior conviction of a similar offense.

The objection of the petitioner to the complaint as briefly stated by him in his closing brief is (1) possession is not a crime; (2) possession is not proof of a crime; (3) having possession does not charge a crime; (4) conclusions are not essential facts.

Our decision in this matter is based upon the following authorities: People v. Cencevich, 64 Cal. App. 39, 220 P. 448; People v. Buttulia, 70 Cal. The Supreme Court denied an application for writ of certiorari in the case of Page v. United States, supra, in 42 S. Ct. 461, and denied certiorari in Rose v. United States, supra, 257 U. S. 655.

[1] A great deal of the argument presented by petitioner would have a great deal of force if presented upon a demurrer upon the ground of uncertainty, but we are dealing here with an application for a writ of habeas corpus after conviction, and, while it is true that there are a great many circumstances under which possession of liquor in California is not a crime, the provisions under which liquor may be possessed are permissive provisions of the statute, and even in a case like that of People v. Bonfanti, 40 Cal. App. 614, 181 P. 80, it was held that the defect in omitting an express statutory exception in the information would not warrant a reversal of the judgment. The court said:

"An examination of the record immediately discloses that the omission in question affected the trial not at all; in fact, the trial proceeded as if the allegation were there. * * * It could not be contended, even by the defendant, that if the information had contained the statement that the victim of the assault was not his wife, the trial would have proceeded with one iota's difference from the course it took, or that the verdict of the jury or the judgment of the court would have been other than it was.

"Under these circumstances, it appears to us that there could hardly be a case to which to apply more appropriately the rule of decision laid down by the Constitution."

The court was referring to section 4½ of article 6 of our state Constitution.

It was held in the case of People v. Cencovich, 64 Cal. App. 39, 220 P. 448, part of the opinion by the court on petition for rehearing, page 44:

"It is urged that neither the aforesaid complaint in the justice's court nor the information herein stated a cause of action in that there is no allegation in either that the defendant's possession of intoxicating liquor was not within the exceptions contained in the Volstead Act making the possession of such liquors lawful under certain circumstances. It was not necessary to plead that the defendant's possession was not within such exceptions. Matter of Lieritz, 166 Cal. 298 (135 P. 1129); Ex parte Hornef, 154 Cal. 355 (97 P. 891); People v. Dial, 28 Cal. App. 704 (153 P. 970)."

The law of California prohibits the possession of alcoholic intoxicating liquors fit for use for beverage purposes containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol, excepting only when the liquor was obtained before the act went into effect and is kept in the owner's dwelling for use therein by him, his family, and bona fide guests, or in certain cases where certain permits are granted either for medicinal use, or, in accordance with certain of the provisions of the act, allowing special permission under special circumstances. In other words, it is unlawful to possess intoxicating liquor not permitted by any statutory authorization.

In the instant case it is not necessary for us to go further than to hold what the rule on an application for a writ of habeas corpus would be, and we do not intend hereby to lay down any rule of law stating the law of California having reference to its applicability to a ruling on a special demurrer. Some of the cases which we have cited may go that far, but it is only necessary for us in this matter to consider strictly the ruling on habeas corpus after conviction.

[2] As to the possession of the still charged in one of the complaints on which conviction was had, chapter 85, tit. 2, § 25, 41 Stats. 315, as found on page 856, Barnes' Federal Code, § 8352, Cum. Supp. 1919-24 (27 USCA § 39; U. S. Comp. St. 10138½m), provides:

"It shall be unlawful to have or possess any liquor or property designed for the manufacture of liquor intended for use in violating this chapter or which has been so used, and no property rights shall exist in any such liquor or property." (Italics ours.)

Therefore, it will be seen that the complaint charging possession of one still "which was designed, used, and intended to be used for the manufacture of alcoholic intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes containing alcohol of more than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume, which property and apparatus is described as follows: One still contrary to the provisions of the Volstead Act, made and provided by title 2 of the National Prohibition Act enacted by Congress of the United States on the 28th day of October, 1919, and as adopted by the state of California," would, on the authority of the cases hereinbefore cited and the provisions of the said laws hereinbefore referred to, state a cause of action.

The writ of habeas corpus as heretofore issued is dismissed and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the respondent, James C. Davis, as chief of police of the city of Los Angeles.

NOYES v. BANK OF ITALY. (Civ. 5491.) *

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 25, 1927.
Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 24, 1927.

1. Bankruptcy ⇨185—Trustee in bankruptcy stands in place of creditors, as respects right to assert invalidity of chattel mortgage, not acknowledged (Civ. Code, § 2957).

A trustee in bankruptcy stands in place of creditors as their personal representative, as respects his right to assert the invalidity of a chattel mortgage, because it is not acknowledged as required by Civ. Code, § 2957; the trustee acquiring no superior right by virtue of his office as trustee.

2. Bankruptcy ⇨184(3)—Bankruptcy trustee as general creditor, might not assert chattel mortgage was invalid because not acknowledged, as against mortgagee in possession (Civ. Code, § 2957).

Where neither the trustee in bankruptcy nor any creditor had a lien by legal proceedings on mortgaged chattels or were armed with process authorizing seizure of the property, so that the trustee stood in the position of a mere general creditor at large without lien or process, trustee might not urge that he was creditor, under Civ. Code, § 2957, making chattel mortgage void as to creditors, subsequent purchasers, and incumbrancers in good faith and for value unless acknowledged, as against a mortgagee in possession under the mortgage.

3. Chattel mortgages ⇨198—Creditor without lien or process cannot question recorded chattel mortgage not complying with statutory formalities as against mortgagee in possession (Civ. Code, § 2957).

A mere general creditor at large who has not acquired a lien upon mortgaged chattels by virtue of some legal proceeding, or who is not armed with process authorizing the seizure of the property, cannot assert that recorded chattel mortgage is invalid as failing to comply with formalities required by Civ. Code, § 2957, as against a mortgagee in possession of the property with the consent of the mortgagor or in possession of the property by legal process.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action for wrongful conversion of personal property brought by C. W. Noyes, trustee of the estate of Paul Petrich, doing business as the Coronado Fish Company, an involuntary bankrupt, against the Bank of Italy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ward, Ward & Ward, of San Diego, and Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Morris Binnard, of San Diego, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action instituted by C. W. Noyes, trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Paul Petrich, doing business under the name of Coronado Fish Company, against the Bank of Italy, a corporation, for the alleged wrongful conversion of personal property.

The case was tried before the court with a jury, which returned a verdict awarding the plaintiff the sum of $10,000, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant, Bank of Italy, has prosecuted this appeal.

The complaint in the action alleges that one Paul Petrich was doing business as the Coronado Fish Company at San Diego prior to and during part of the year 1923, and that during that time and while he was so engaged in business the defendant bank came upon the premises where he was doing business and took possession of the business and personal property in connection therewith, and converted it and sold it. That Paul Petrich subsequently was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the plaintiff was appointed the trustee in bankruptcy. That the trustee, being the representative of the creditors of the bankrupt, has the right to recover this property alleged to have been converted or damages for its conversion. By way of answer, the defendant set forth and alleged that it had taken possession of the property, but justified such taking under a chattel mortgage upon the particular property taken, and that whatever acts it did were done in pursuance of its rights as a mortgagee in a lawful attempt to foreclose and realize upon this mortgage.

The facts are not in dispute that Paul Petrich, doing business under the name of Coronado Fish Company, carried on a fish business at San Diego, and during a large portion of each year his business was devoted almost entirely to the canning of tuna and other fish, and that during the canning season he employed a large force of helpers to assist in this work. During the balance of the year Petrich conducted a wholesale and retail fresh fish business. The facts further disclose that during the canning season of 1921 and 1922, the appellant bank advanced Paul Petrich a total of approximately $22,000 with which to finance his canning business, and that on March 23, 1923, there remained due the Bank of Italy the sum of $8,705.65, and to obtain security for the payment of this sum the appellant obtained from Paul Petrich a chattel mortgage, covering this unpaid balance. It is further admitted that the chattel mortgage as taken was placed of record on March 26, 1923, but was devoid entirely of any proper acknowledgment as required by section 2957 of the Civil Code. The appellant offered to prove, and some testimony is embodied in the record, that possession of the chattels under the mortgage was taken by the appellant bank on July 28, 1923, and that after compliance with the Code provision relative to the sale of mortgaged chattels as a pledge, the chattels were offered for sale on August 28, 1923, and were bought in by the appellant bank as there were no other substantial bids. The record further discloses, and in fact the pleadings admit, that an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed by creditors of Paul Petrich on August 10, 1923, and an adjudication in bankruptcy was made during the month of October, 1923, and that plaintiff herein, C. W. Noyes, qualified as trustee of the estate of Paul Petrich, bankrupt. Plaintiff's Exhibit Q discloses the claims filed in the bankruptcy proceedings by creditors of Paul Petrich. The information disclosed in Exhibit Q establishes that certain of the creditors may be classed as both prior and subsequent creditors in relation to the date on which the chattel mortgage was given; but the creditors' statement, in so far as this exhibit shows—which is the only evidence on the question to be found in the record—does not disclose what portion of their claim existed at the date the chattel mortgage was given or what portion of the claim was incurred subsequent to that date.

As grounds of appeal, appellant urges the following errors: I. The court erred in excluding the mortgage offered in evidence. (a) Lack of formalities in the execution of a chattel mortgage can be questioned only by a creditor who has acquired a lien on the property by attachment or by levy of execution. (b) The trustee in bankruptcy has no right to maintain such a suit unless some creditor, prior to the taking possession, had actually secured a lien on the property by attachment or levy of execution. (c) If the mortgage was void as to any creditors, it was void only as to creditors whose claims arose after the mortgage was given and before possession was taken. (d) When possession was taken by mortgagee, the relation of pledgor and pledgee with respect to this property was established. (e) The mortgage should have been admitted in evidence to show good faith of mortgagee. (f) The mortgage was not shown to have created a voidable preference. II. The court erred in instructing the jury that there was no issue upon the question of conversion. III. The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the verdict should be limited to an amount equal to the amount of claims which arose from credit being extended after the mortgage was given.

It will be observed that appellant offered to prove that the chattel mortgage was executed by Paul Petrich to appellant bank on March 23, 1923; that it was filed for record on March 26, 1923; that the personal property described in the chattel mortgage was taken into the possession of the bank under a provision of the chattel mortgage on July 28, 1923; that the property was sold in compliance with the Code provisions on August 28, 1923; and that Paul Petrich was not adjudged a bankrupt until in October, 1923.

The jury was not instructed to make any finding of fact as to whether Paul Petrich or the Coronado Fish Company were insolvent, either at the time the chattel mortgage in question was given or at the time the appellant took possession under the terms of its security, nor was the chattel mortgage given within the time in which it would be presumed, under the Bankruptcy Act (11 USCA), to be fraudulent as against creditors, but, as conceded by respondent, the trial court held the chattel mortgage to be void as to all creditors, because it was devoid of a proper acknowledgment under the terms of section 2957 of the Civil Code, and that no issue arose upon the trial of the case as to whether or not there had been any voidable preference under the Bankruptcy Act.

If, therefore, it be determined that the chattel mortgage was valid as between the parties, and the trustee in bankruptcy representing the creditors was a mere creditor at large and not a creditor who had acquired a lien upon the mortgaged property and was not such a creditor as could question a compliance with the formalities lacking in the mortgage, and the judgment must therefore be reversed, all questions raised on this appeal will be disposed of, as the remaining questions grow out of the decision of the trial court on the validity of the chattel mortgage as against creditors. Appellant has cited us to Adlard v. Rodgers, 105 Cal. 327, 38 P. 889, and Lemon v. Wolff, 121 Cal. 272, 53 P. 801, as authority for his contention that the chattel mortgage is valid as against creditors not having acquired a lien, and which case holds that a chattel mortgage omitting the formalities required by the Code is void as against attaching creditors of the mortgagor, unless the mortgagee has reduced the property to possession prior to the attachment. In Lemon v. Wolff, 121 Cal. 272, at page 274, 53 P. 801, 802, the court uses this language:

"As between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, such a mortgage is valid and may be enforced, even though the formalities prescribed in section 2957 of the Civil Code have not been observed. Works v. Merritt, 105 Cal. 467 (38 P. 1109). This section makes a failure in such compliance available only to creditors of the mortgagor, and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith. Only a creditor who has acquired a lien upon the mortgaged property by virtue of some legal proceeding, or who is armed with some process authorizing a seizure of the property, can question the compliance with these formalities. A mere creditor at large, without some process for the collection or enforcement of his debt, cannot question the sufficiency of a mortgage which is valid between the parties thereto. Jones on Chattel Mortgages, § 245; Jones v. Graham, 77 N. Y. 628; Button v. Rathbone, etc. (Sard. &) Co., 126 N. Y. 187 (27 N. E. 266); Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612. If the defendants obtained possession of the property with the consent of the mortgagor, before the plaintiff acquired a lien thereon, they acquired a right thereto, irrespective of any irregularities in their mortgage."

Here the record does not disclose whether or not the mortgagee secured possession with the consent of the mortgagor obtained at the time of taking possession, but appellant did at least offer to prove that it took possession under the consent contained in the terms of the mortgage, and before other creditors of the mortgagor obtained any lien or made any levy upon the mortgaged property.

Respondent contends, in view of the decision in Loosemore v. Baker, 175 Cal. 420, 166 P. 26, that Adlard v. Rodgers and Lemon v. Wolff, cannot be considered as any authority for the question presented here. We do not agree with respondent's contention; on the contrary, we are of the opinion that Loosemore v. Baker reaffirms the rule laid down in Lemon v. Wolff from which we have quoted. It is true that the Loosemore Case holds that a mortgagee of personal property, in possession thereof with the consent of the mortgagor, under a chattel mortgage that was never recorded and that was not accompanied by the affidavit of the parties thereto as required by law, is not entitled to priority over an attaching creditor of the mortgagor. The facts in the Loosemore Case do not parallel the instant case, as here the creditor is not an attaching creditor, nor has he acquired any lien upon the property. Neither is Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 290, 53 P. 911, 59 P. 827, 46 L. R. A. 371, cited in the Loosemore Case, in conflict with the rule quoted from Lemon v. Wolff. That was also a case of an unrecorded mortgage, and there the court said:

"But it is insisted that, even if an unrecorded mortgage is void at the instance of creditors, only those creditors may take advantage of the law who by judgment and execution levy, or at least by attachment levy, have acquired a lien upon the property before recordation. * * * 'The record of a mortgage being only a substitute for the mortgagee's possession, it follows that, in the absence of any record, possession taken by the mortgagee before others have acquired any interest in the property makes his mortgage lien complete.' To this the answer is that such is not the law of this state. In terms, this rule is limited to those cases where immediate recordation is not required by law, and in our state, as has been discussed, as well as in other states under similar and well-nigh identical statutes, as will be shown, immediate recordation is exacted."

In the present case the mortgage was made on March 23 and recorded on March 26.

Loosemore v. Baker, supra, which respondent contends overrules or supersedes Lemon v. Wolff, quotes approvingly from Lemon v. Wolff, and reaffirms the principle applicable here:

"Lemon v. Wolff, 121 Cal. 272 (53 P. 801), also relied upon by appellant, contains nothing bearing upon this case. It declares the sound and familiar principle that even a chattel mortgage void for lack of recordation or void for defective verification and acknowledgment may still be good between the parties, and that a mere creditor at large is not in a position to attack it, it being said that 'Only a creditor who has acquired a lien upon the mortgaged property by virtue of some legal proceeding, or who is armed with some process authorizing seizure of the property, can question the compliance with these formalities.' In this case the creditor had acquired a lien and was armed with process."

Here neither the trustee nor any creditor in whose place he stands had acquired a lien or was armed with process.

In Union National Bank v. Oium, 3 N. D. 200, 54 N. W. 1036, 44 Am. St. Rep. 533, the Supreme Court of North Dakota, cited by respondent, in a very luminous discussion of the question of chattel mortgages, void as against creditors, uses this language:

"While an unfiled chattel mortgage may be void as to a general creditor, he cannot avail himself of the statute until he has armed himself with attachment or execution and levied on the property, or has in some other way secured a lien thereon. Before he has seized the property covered by the chattel mortgage, or secured some lien thereon, he is in no position to raise the question that the mortgage is void as to him. * * * The mortgage is void as to creditors, and nothing is said in the statute about the necessity of a creditor's having secured a lien on the mortgaged property. The fact that the creditor cannot assail the mortgage until he has seized the property is of no moment in determining whether he belongs to the class of persons as to whom the mortgage is void. Whether he belongs to that class is one question; whether he is in a position to derive benefit from belonging to that class is another, and entirely different, question. The two inquiries are distinct, and each is independent of the other. When he arms himself with process, and seizes the mortgaged property, the court will then inquire whether he is a 'creditor,' within the meaning of the statute which declares void the mortgage as against 'creditors.' * * * It is true that he must seize the property before he can raise the point, but he need not seize it before the instrument is filed. Whenever he does seize it, whether before or after the filing of the mortgage, he is then in a position to urge that he was before the mortgage was filed a 'creditor,' within the meaning of the statute."

[1, 2] The trustee in bankruptcy acquires no superior right by virtue of his office as trustee; he stands in the place and stead of the creditors as their personal representative, and neither he as trustee, nor any creditor, seized the property by attachment, execution or any process, and therefore, while he, representing the creditors, may come within the class of creditors as to whom the mortgage is void, he has not placed himself in a position to urge that he is a creditor within the meaning of the statute. Martin v. Commercial Nat. Bank of Macon, Ga., 245 U. S. 513, 38 S. Ct. 176, 62 L. Ed. 441.

[3] The rule may be safely stated as going at least to the extent of holding that a mere general creditor at large, who has not acquired a lien upon the mortgaged property by virtue of some legal proceeding, or who is not armed with some process authorizing seizure of the property, cannot question the formalities required by section 2957 of the Civil Code, as against a mortgagee of a recorded chattel mortgage, in possession of the property, with the consent of the mortgagor, or who has acquired possession thereof by legal process.

Appellant offered to prove that possession of the chattels, under the terms of the mortgage, was taken by the appellant bank, and after compliance with the Code relative to the sale of mortgaged chattels as a pledge, the chattels were sold, which taking, possession, and sale occurred sometime prior to the adjudication of Paul Petrich, a bankrupt, and the appointment of respondent as trustee; offered as evidence the chattel mortgage, containing the affidavit of the mortgagor and the mortgagee, that the mortgage was made in good faith and without design to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, being devoid only of the acknowledgment, and that the mortgage was good as between the parties. This evidence under the objection of respondent was excluded from the record. These issues were not tried, and this judgment cannot stand until they have been tried and determined adversely to appellant's position. The judgment must be reversed, and upon a new trial permission should be granted defendant to establish, if it can, the validity of its mortgage between itself and the owner, and it is accordingly so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by William A. Wittmann against Major Whittingham. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George Beebe and J. Marion Wright, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wheaton A. Gray and J. M. Fursee, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondent entered upon the verdict of the jury awarding $2,000 damages against appellant, in an action to recover $23,080.

Appellant urges as grounds for a reversal of the judgment: (1) The verdict is contrary to the evidence, and there is a variance between the pleadings and the proof: (a) The evidence of plaintiff does not establish any definite or valid contract on which he might sue; (b) the evidence and the special verdict of the jury show that the plaintiff was employed by the corporation and not by Whittingham individually, and that the corporation and not Whittingham discharged him; (c) there is no evidence of any legal damage sustained by plaintiff. (2) The court erred in the admission of evidence. (3) The court erred in its instructions: (a) Instructions were given at the request of plaintiff which were erroneous; (b) the court improperly modified instructions requested by defendant; (c) the instructions as a whole were confusing, and in some particulars failed to enlighten the jury on some issues.

As disclosed by the evidence, in 1919, appellant gave respondent employment as a bookkeeper, at the same time respondent had other persons for whom he did bookkeeping. This ran along until about August, 1920, when appellant discussed with respondent the matter of forming a corporation. The business was growing and appellant desired to expand. Respondent continued in the employment of appellant as bookkeeper until the corporation was formed in October, 1920, when respondent was made a director of the corporation and its secretary and 11 shares of stock were given to him by appellant, 1 share of which was given him so that he could qualify as a director and the remaining 10, as appellant claims, so that respondent would feel an interest in the business, but, according to respondent, in payment for services performed. From and after the incorporation of "The Whittingham Printing Company," respondent was paid $40 a week by the corporation. When appellant decided to incorporate his business it was agreed between appellant and respondent that respondent should give up all his other business and serve appellant as an accountant, bookkeeper, and as general manager and should receive as compensation $40 per week, and as a further compensation respondent should have the privilege of purchasing 60 shares of stock of the Whittingham Printing Company, a corporation, soon to be formed, and as a part of such agreement it was further agreed and understood that respondent should give the defendant his note for $4,800, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, and that respondent should not be required to pay anything on said note, but that he should remain in the employ of appellant until the dividends and profits of the stock were sufficient to pay off the note. When the note was paid off by the dividends and profits, it was to be given up and canceled and the stock, which was issued to respondent and held by appellant as collateral, was to be returned to respondent. There seems to be no special dispute over the fact of the contract, nor as to its terms; appellant contending that respondent was to work as a salesman and not as bookkeeper and manager, and that he was to work in the employ of the corporation and not in the employ of appellant; that respondent's services were to be satisfactory to appellant, and that the services performed were unsatisfactory to him and therefore he had the right to discharge him; and, further, that the contract was entered into with the corporation, which is not made a party to the suit.

The shares of stock of the corporation were of the par value of $100 each, and the authorized capital stock was 750 shares, 503 of which were issued under permit to issue that amount by the corporation commissioner. In December, 1921, the date of the alleged breach of the agreement, the books of the corporation show the stock to be issued as follows: Appellant Major Whittingham, 340 shares; W. F. Whittingham, 90 shares; respondent William A. Wittmann, 71 shares; George Beebe, 1 share; and J. M. Wright, 1 share. During the year 1921, up to the time when respondent retired as a director, the directors were appellant Whittingham, respondent Wittmann, and George Beebe; J. M. Wright being elected as a director to replace respondent when the latter retired from the board.

Respondent continued in his employment until December 31, 1921, when he was discharged. Appellant thereafter transferred the stock issued to respondent and which he held as security for respondent's note to himself. Appellant denies that he employed respondent, but asserts that the corporation did; that respondent was not in his employ, but in the employ of the corporation "the Whittingham Printing Company"; and, further, that the corporation and not appellant discharged respondent.

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff and fixed the damages in the amount of $2,000, and returned a special verdict answering certain interrogatories propounded to them as follows:

"(1) How much money would plaintiff have earned under his agreement of employment with defendant had he not been discharged prior to the expiration of his said agreement? Answer. $2,600.

"(2) Under plaintiff's employment with defendant, for what period was plaintiff to be employed? Answer. Until 60 shares of stock were paid for by his earned dividends.

"(3) Under said employment, when did said employment commence? Answer. October 1, 1920.

"(4) Under said employment, on what date would said employment terminate? Answer. When 60 shares of stock were paid for by dividends earned.

"(5) From and after September 1, 1920, was plaintiff employed by defendant or by Whittingham Printing Company, a corporation? Answer. Whittingham Printing Company, Inc.

"(6) Was plaintiff discharged by defendant or by Whittingham Printing Company, a corporation? Answer. Whittingham Printing Company, Inc.

"(7) Was Whittingham Printing Company, a corporation, owned and controlled by Major Whittingham, the defendant? Answer. Yes.

"(8) On what date would the dividends or profits of the Whittingham Printing Company have paid for the 60 shares in controversy? Answer. Do not know.

"(9) What was the actual value of the 60 shares of stock of the Whittingham Printing Company on the date of the alleged breach of the contract by defendant, if you find that it was breached by the defendant? Answer. $6,000. Also give the highest value since the alleged conversion of the stock? Answer. $6,000.

"(10) What amount of dividends or profits was the plaintiff prevented from receiving by being discharged by defendant? Answer. Estimated $2,000.

"(11) What were the profits of Whittingham Printing Company, a corporation? Answer. Total to December 31, $18,372.48."

Appellant does not claim that the contract was not entered into, but that the contract is not definite or valid; that the special verdict shows the contract or employment of respondent to have been with the corporation instead of appellant and no legal damage was sustained.

The first complaint under the assignment is that the contract lacks mutuality, and being entirely one-sided, should not stand, and, further, that it had no definite time for its existence.

[1, 2] There seems to be no lack of mutuality in the contract. It is alleged and testified to by respondent that, in consideration of his giving up all other business and serving appellant as an accountant, bookkeeper, and general manager, he should receive $40 per week and should have the privilege of purchasing 60 shares of stock in the corporation to be formed. As to the claim that the contract had no definite time for existence it may be said that according to the contract, as testified to by respondent, the 60 shares of stock were to be delivered to him when the dividends or profits on the stock had paid his note. This is sufficient as to the time of the duration of the contract. In Brown v. Birmingham Water Works Co., 169 Ala. 230, 52 So. 915, the court holds that, where the contract was to furnish a consumer with water at a specified price as long as she used the premises as a dwelling, it is not defective for indefiniteness as to the length of time that it was to run. In Hauser v. Harding, 126 N. C. 295, 35 S. E. 586, the court says:

"A contract not to engage in the practice of medicine within a certain territory, without specifying any time, is not invalid for uncertainty, since it is to be construed as enduring for the life of the promisor."

In City of Superior v. Douglas County Tel. Co., 141 Wis. 363, 122 N. W. 1023, the court holds that a contract, binding a telephone company operating in a city to maintain without charge telephones in the public offices as long as it maintains and operates a telephone exchange in the city, fixes a time for the termination of the contract and the contract is binding. As to the claim that the evidence and the special verdict of the jury show that the plaintiff was employed by the corporation and not by Whittingham individually, and that the corporation and not Whittingham discharged him, it may be said that the jury also made a finding that the Whittingham Printing Company was owned and controlled by Major Whittingham, the defendant, and there is sufficient evidence to support this finding. In appellant's opening brief, under the heading "Some undisputed facts in the case," he says:

"Defendant gave him (plaintiff) work as a bookkeeper, and at the same time plaintiff had other persons for whom he did bookkeeping. This ran along until about August, 1920, when defendant discussed the matter of forming a corporation. The business was growing and defendant naturally wanted to expand. Up to October 1, 1920, he had been paying plaintiff for doing the bookkeeping, and a few days after that date the arrangement between the two men was entered into verbally. For convenience, plaintiff was to be a director and secretary of the company."

And in the record of the testimony of appellant is the following:

In speaking of his idea for incorporating his business he said, "If I have a corporation, why, you will have to be the goat and be secretary, Bill," and later on in his testimony appears the following:

"Q. Why should you have an account and he not? You were president and he was treasurer, and you were both stockholders? A. Well, it was not supposed that he was to have an account, Judge.

"Q. Why? A. Because it did not come within the horizon of what I contemplated for Wittmann that he should have an account.

"Q. That was because you owned and controlled the whole thing (the corporation), and nobody should have an account without your consent, is that it? A. I would say so; yes."

Further, the note given for the 60 shares of stock was not given to the corporation, but was given personally to Whittingham, who personally held the Wittmann stock. As to appellant's brother's interest, the brother, according to Whittingham's testimony, lives in another state and is not consulted at all by Whittingham as to any act of the corporation, and it does not appear that any stock was ever actually issued or delivered to the brother. The evidence also shows that of the 503 shares of stock—the entire amount issued—500 shares originally belonged to appellant. Appellant, Beebe, his attorney, and respondent were the original incorporators and there was issued 1 share of stock to each for the purpose of making them directors. Neither Beebe nor respondent had any interest in the business, and appellant testified that he issued 10 shares to respondent that he might be made secretary.

[3] We are of the opinion that there is ample evidence from which to conclude that appellant was the alter ego of the corporation, and comes within the rule laid down in Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 P. 673:

"Before the acts and obligations of a corporation can be legally recognized as those of a particular person, and vice versa, the following combination of circumstances must be made to appear: First, that the corporation is not only influenced and governed by that person, but that there is such a unity of interest and ownership that the individuality, or separateness, of the said person and corporation has ceased; second, that the facts are such that an adherence to the fiction of the separate existence of the corporation would, under the particular circumstances, sanction a fraud or promote injustice."

See, also, Erkenbrecher v. Grant, 187 Cal. 7, 200 P. 641; Wenban Estate, Inc., v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 675, 227 P. 723; Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 450; Deming v. Maas, 18 Cal. App. 330, 123 P. 204; United States Farm Land Co. v. Bennett, 55 Cal. App. 304, 203 P. 794.

In Llewellyn Iron Works v. Abbott Kinney Co., 172 Cal. 214, 155 P. 986, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1050, the court says:

"We entertain no doubt of their sufficiency to raise an estoppel against Abbott Kinney personally. And upon a proper showing that the Abbott Kinney Company, a corporation, was but the instrumentality through which Abbott Kinney for convenience transacted his business, by all of the authorities not only equity, looking through form to substance, but the law itself, would hold such a corporation bound as the owner of the corporation might be bound, or, conversely, hold the owner bound by acts which bound his corporation."

[4, 5] As to appellant's claim of error that there is no evidence of any legal damage, it is sufficient to say that appellant in his brief concedes that "the court properly instructed the jury as to the measure of damages." As to the evidence, respondent testified that he had kept his contract faithfully; that appellant had not complained that he was not making good, but that he just discharged him from his employment and took this stock away from him, because he thought that he (respondent) was making too much money; that the business had turned out more prosperous than he thought it was going to; that appellant gave himself such bonuses and such salary that there would be no income or profits. The jury was therefore warranted in finding that the defendant had violated his contract.

[6] We find no error in the admission of evidence, as assigned by appellant under his second assignment, that "the court erred in the admission of evidence." Appellant's principal objection is to the admission of the report of the books of account of the Whittingham Printing Company, made by Ernest E. Godfrey, certified public accountant. The record shows, however, that the evidence complained of, that is, the evidence of a bonus of $7,500 and extra salary of appellant of $750 a month and an additional salary of $1,000 a month, was brought out by questions propounded to the expert accountant, to which no objections were made. Furthermore, this written report was never read to the jury, nor seen by them until it was given to them when they retired to deliberate, along with the other exhibits in the case, under a stipulation by the attorneys for both sides "that the jury may have all of the exhibits."

[7, 8] We do not agree with appellant in his final assignment of error; that the court erred in its instructions; that erroneous instructions were given at the request of plaintiff; that they were improperly modified; and that the instructions as a whole were confusing. The language of the court in Bognuda v. Pearson, 71 Cal. App. 105, 110, 111, 234 P. 857, 859, is applicable to the instant case and we adopt it here:

"But there is still another obstacle in the way of reviewing the objections to the instructions in this case in the fact that there is nothing to indicate or show at whose request the instructions were given—whether at the request of the plaintiff or the defendants. The presumption is, therefore, that they were given at the request of the defendants. Gray v. Eschen, 125 Cal. 1, 5, 57 P. 664; Sutter Butte Canal Co. v. American Rice & Alfalfa Co., 182 Cal. 549, 553, 554, 189 P. 277. A party cannot predicate prejudice on erroneous instructions submitted by the court to the jury by his request."

This disposes of the objections urged by appellant, and from what has been said it follows that we find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

PAVEY v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ORANGE COUNTY. (Civ. 5780.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 20, 1927.

Indictment and information ☞146—Court need not rule on demurrer to indictment not presented in open court by defendant or counsel, but merely filed with clerk (Pen. Code, §§ 977, 990, 1003).

Where defendant, indicted under Pen. Code, § 107, filed a demurrer to the indictment but the demurrer was not actually presented in open court either by defendant or counsel representing him, under sections 977, 990, 1003, writ of mandate would not be granted to compel court to rule on demurrer.

Application by Verne C. Pavey for writ of mandate, to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Orange, to compel respondent to rule on a demurrer to an indictment. Writ denied.

Verne C. Pavey, in pro. per.

CONREY, P. J. The petition has been received by the court by mail from Leavenworth, Kan., with request by letter that the court act thereon and grant the writ.

The petition shows that on December 20, 1926, an indictment was returned into the superior court of Orange county, charging the petitioner herein with the crime of felony, committed by willfully, etc., escaping from the county jail of said county while imprisoned therein after conviction of a crime. Presumably the indictment was intended to charge an offense under the provisions of section 107 of the Penal Code. In re Haines, 195 Cal. 605, 622, 234 P. 883.

Petitioner alleges that thereafter, on March 31, 1927, he filed in said superior court a demurrer to said indictment; "that thereafter, on the 8th day of April, 1927, an order was made by said superior court of the state of California, county of Orange, by which said demurrer was placed off the calendar of said court, and the court has declined to act upon the demurrer to the great harm and prejudice of this petitioner. A true copy of the court's order declining to act upon said demurrer is hereto attached and made a part of this petition." In fact, there is no attached copy of the order, but there is a copy of a document addressed by the district attorney to the defendant under date April 8, 1927, notifying the defendant that on that day the demurrer was "placed off the calendar of said court, the same to be restored to the calendar at time of arraignment, if you so desire."

It is provided by the Penal Code that upon indictment for a felony the defendant must be personally present upon his arraignment before the court; that he may "In answer to the arraignment, move to set aside, demur, or plead to the indictment or information"; that "both the demurrer and plea must be put in, in open court, either at the time of [the arraignment] or at such other time as may be allowed to the defendant for that purpose." Pen. Code, §§ 977, 990, 1003. According to these provisions of law, apparently it is not intended that in a felony case an absent defendant may demur to the indictment merely by causing such demurrer to be filed in the office of the clerk of the court. Or, assuming that the demurrer might be so filed, the court is not required to rule upon the demurrer until it is actually presented in open court either by the defendant personally or by counsel representing him. In this case it is apparent that the demurrer never was so presented, and that the court never has been called upon to hear or determine the same.

The petition for writ of mandate is denied.

Application of CRUICKSHANK. (Civ. 5303.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 22, 1927.

1. Attorney and client ☞61—Evidence held to show disbarred attorney's legal and educational knowledge sufficient to justify readmission to bar.

On application of disbarred attorney for readmission to the bar, evidence held to show that his legal and educational knowledge was sufficient to justify readmission.

2. Attorney and client ☞61—Finding of referees concerning mental qualifications of disbarred attorney petitioning for readmission must be tested by determining where preponderance of evidence lies.

Finding of referees concerning legal and educational qualifications of disbarred attorney petitioning for readmission to the bar must be tested by considering the question as to where the preponderance of the evidence lies.

Application by Vernon Cruickshank for readmission to the bar. Granted.

Kimball Fletcher, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Guy R. Crump and Eugene Overton, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Los Angeles Bar Ass'n.

WORKS, P. J. This is an application for readmission to the bar after disbarment. Petitioner was disbarred in 1918 because of the commission of an act involving moral turpitude. The grounds upon which he was excluded from the profession are shown in the opinion In re Cruickshank, 47 Cal. App. 496, 190 P. 1038, by which the judgment of disbarment was affirmed. The present proceeding was sent to referees with directions to take evidence and to find whether petitioner is possessed of the moral and mental qualifications necessary to entitle him to a readmission. The findings of the referees are now before us.

The referees find that petitioner "is possessed of such moral qualifications as entitle him" to readmission. This finding is so amply sustained by the record made before the referees that we forbear to state the evidence which supports it.

Upon the other issue it is found by the referees that "there is such doubt as to the mental qualifications of applicant that an examination is necessary to test them." Petitioner has interposed written exception to this finding, and we have therefore been inspired to a minute exploration of the record upon which the finding is made. Petitioner, after having had a common school education—during the course of which, however, he did not complete a high school course—and after having read law a little, matriculated with the Chattanooga College of Law, in Tennessee, which conducted a 3-year course. He was permitted by the dean of the school to enter the junior class, however, his course thus being limited to 2 years. At the end of his first year, after having done both junior and senior work, he took a bar examination before the state board of examiners of Tennessee, passed, and was admitted to the bar. Notwithstanding this fact, he completed his second year. In his course during the 2 years, comprising a term of 8 months in each, he took lectures in 20 subjects. One who was an instructor in the law school during petitioner's attendance testified that petitioner passed all his examinations, that "in many of his subjects he was at the head of his class, and in many others near the head of his class," and that when he left the school "he had a good legal foundation." Soon after completing his law school course petitioner came to California and was admitted to the bar of the state. This was in 1916. He was engaged in the active practice of the profession until a short time before his disbarment in 1918. We have carefully examined a file in which is presented copies of notices of motion, affidavits, pleadings, trial briefs, findings, judgments, decrees, and other papers prepared by petitioner during the period of his practice. These various documents were filed with the referees as a part of the record before them. At the hearing before the referees petitioner testified that during his practice he was engaged in actual trial work "two or three times a month," and a lawyer with whom he was associated immediately preceding his disbarment gave a minute description of the nature of his practice and of the manner in which he performed his work. From all this evidence we find that at the time of his disbarment petitioner was possessed of at least average ability as a lawyer, and his ability was perhaps above the average for one who had practiced for so brief a period—only about 2 years.

The question yet to be determined is whether petitioner, during the period since his disbarment, has kept this ability intact by his methods of thought and through the nature of the pursuits which he has followed. Immediately after his disbarment petitioner engaged in a business enterprise which operated in that part of Los Angeles known as San Pedro. The business was soon incorporated under the name of the Channel Construction Company. The nature of the operations conducted by the corporation was thus described by its president:

"This corporation was incorporated for the sum of $50,000, but it has acquired property, both real and personal property, of the approximate value of $600,000. It has in a large way done excavating and filling work in San Pedro, taken public contracts for the excavation, filling, and improvement of public streets and paving and matters of that sort, upon occasion there being as many as 90 to 100 men employed, and I think there has been about a million cubic feet of earth that has been excavated, and great areas filled in the West Basin of San Pedro and San Pedro proper, involving many hundreds of thousands of dollars."

Petitioner owns half of the stock of the corporation and has been in active control of its operations as manager. We shall now quote from the testimony of several witnesses who appeared before the referees. The president of the corporation above mentioned, who is a lawyer, said:

"Mr. Cruickshank * * * has had charge of the actual operations, the making of contracts, and the collection of moneys during practically all this period. The legal phases of the matter, and matters to some extent of policy, have been mutual affairs between the officers of the corporation and Mr. Cruickshank. * * * Of course, in conducting this business—it is really one of the largest businesses in San Pedro, where we have handled innumerable contracts, and many, many legal questions have arisen that were of interest to all of us personally, and while Mr. Lynden Bowring, who is secretary and treasurer of the corporation, and myself handled the legal matters in connection with it, we discussed these questions usually with Mr. Cruickshank, and in an academic way discussed other legal questions with him, * * * and I came to the conclusion that while probably Mr. Cruickshank was not keeping up, as his business was so onerous there, with all the decisions as they were coming down, yet he had, it seems, books like Corpus Juris and many others in his place that he was endeavoring to keep up with in a considerable way, and his foundation seemed to be very good. His method of reasoning was logical, and he seemed to have a very good foundation of the general principles of law."

Another lawyer said he had known petitioner for four years and testified, further:

"Mr. Cruickshank has visited the office I should say on an average of once a week * * * and has discussed legal questions and matters of a character that might pass between lawyers, and of course between business men, too. * * * I have been practicing law for 40 years and I would say that Mr. Cruickshank has as much technical ability as 50 per cent. of the lawyers I have known during that time, or perhaps 60."

This was said by another lawyer, who spoke of times following the disbarment:

"As to [petitioner's] ability, I have found in the matters with which I came in contact with him, that he seemed to possess an ability very much above the normal, and in the matter of the preparation of contracts and in matters of street law, which were the legal matters concerning which I had occasion to have experience with him, he has shown a very pronounced ability."

One lawyer testified concerning frequent talks he and two other lawyers had with petitioner about the legal affairs of the Channel Construction Company, and said:

"[I]n all of those matters Mr. Cruickshank seemed to have just as keen a knowledge of the law as any of the rest of us that were talking about it, and seemed to grasp the legal questions involved."

Petitioner himself testified:

"Q. Since your disbarment, you have retained part of your law library, have you? A. Yes; I am still keeping it up. Mr. Moore [a former associate] has some. The Corpus Juris I am keeping up and I buy different text-books that come out on matters of law, and I am keeping up with the Codes just in a general way."

The former associate of petitioner who has just been mentioned said:

"[M]y judgment is that [petitioner] is quite capable of handling a law business. * * * In my visits with him our conversations have been usually on general topics, and the thing that has impressed me most was his resolute ambition to increase his learning, not only in the law but in books generally, and whenever we got into a discussion of some philosophical or historical subject, why, it so awakened his interest that he immediately decided he wanted to find out about it, and I would notice thereafter, when I went to visit his home, that I would find some of these books pertaining to the subject that we had discussed before, which evidenced the fact that his mind still dwelt upon the thought and that he was trying to inform himself. * * * I think he is far superior to a large number and quite a large percentage of our lawyers."

The secretary and treasurer of the Channel Construction Company, a lawyer, testified:

"Q. From your acquaintance with Mr. Cruickshank * * * have you an opinion as to what his technical ability has been since the time of his disbarment? A. I have. Ever since the Channel Construction Company was organized, it has had constantly presented to it questions of law of all kinds, from mere cases involving collections to matters of considerable interest, involving street improvements and overlapping of street improvements, and the validity of contracts, and matters that have engaged considerable of my time as a lawyer and considerable of Mr. Potter's time, who is president of the company and who is also a lawyer. In all those matters, we have considered them and discussed them in connection with Mr. Cruickshank * * * and have had the benefit of his ideas and opinions regarding them, and I have been * * * in practically constant consultation with Mr. Cruickshank. There hasn't been a week passed in the last five years that I have not had one or several conferences with him in matters that are really the subject of a lawyer. I found that in all those matters that he has a good grasp of legal principles, and also the practical application of them, and I know that my own preconceived ideas on many subjects, that is, as to the application of various principles of law * * * were not correct, and that suggestions made by Mr. Cruickshank proved to be the correct view. * * * I lived about a year and a half or so next door to him in San Pedro * * * and I used to see him practically every night during that period * * * and I know that during that period and at other times when I have been at his house, that he has kept law books about him. I know he has continued to subscribe to the Corpus Juris and Cyc. system, the Codes, and so forth, and he has kept about him legal literature, and that whenever any question arose, he was looking it up on * * * his own account, and to my own knowledge, he has kept to a considerable extent abreast of the statutory laws so far as it affected our business, which was the street law and the law of contracts and all that sort of thing, and I always found him active in applying himself to the solution of problems that arose in connection with those matters.

"Q. Would your same favorable criticism extend also to matters in relation to the several large lawsuits which have been conducted and the matters of corporation law that have been met with in connection with the corporation in the way of bond issues? A. Yes. I would say that every question of law of any importance whatever, that has arisen, has been discussed with Mr. Cruickshank and his ideas exchanged with mine and Mr. Potter's, and the statement that I have made regarding the soundness of his views would apply to all those matters. I have found him to have, in my opinion, good judgment. * * *

"Q. Well, in your opinion, is Mr. Cruickshank now qualified from a technical standpoint to practice law? A. He is. In my opinion, he is qualified to an extent much greater than the average practitioner * * * that is admitted to the bar. * * * His judgment I have found to be good on questions that have been presented."

[1, 2] From this state of the record we conclude that the preponderance of the evidence is opposed to the finding of the referees which concerns the mental qualifications of petitioner, and we have recently decided that such a finding must be tested by the question as to where a preponderance of evidence lies. In re

Stevens (Cal. App.) 257 P. 218. We think that as to petitioner's "grasp of the law there is no question." In re Stevens, 197 Cal. 408, 241 P. 88.

The finding of the referees that petitioner is possessed of the moral qualifications entitling him to a readmission to the bar is adopted as the finding of the court. The finding expressing doubt as to his mental qualifications is set aside. The petition for readmission is granted, and the clerk of the court will issue to petitioner a certificate of admission to the bar in the usual form.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 24, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 20, 1927.

1. Certiorari ⇐28(3)—Writ of review may be used to determine whether board of dental examiners had any testimony warranting revocation of practitioner's license.

The writ of review may be used to determine whether there was any testimony to establish certain facts without the existence of which a board of dental examiners had no power to act in license revocation proceedings and revoke practitioner's license.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⇐11(3)—In license revocation proceedings, inference dentist knew of employee's unlawful practice cannot be drawn in face of uncontradicted evidence to contrary.

In license revocation proceedings, the board of dental examiners may not infer that dentist knew of unlawful practices of his employee, when there is uncontradicted evidence to the contrary.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⇐11(3)—Evidence held not to warrant revocation of dentist's license for unlawful practices.

Evidence held not to warrant revocation of dentist's license for permitting unlawful practices of an employee.

4. Physicians and surgeons ⇐11(2)—Under dental act relative to revoking licenses, words "aid and abet" make knowledge necessary before it can be found dentist aided or abetted unlicensed person to practice (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 2048).

Under dental practice act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 2048), relative to revoking dentists' licenses, the words "aid and abet" require knowledge of unlawful act before it can be said a dentist has aided or abetted an unlicensed person to practice.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Aid and Abet.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

S. R. Osborne's license to practice dentistry was revoked by the Board of Dental Examiners, consisting of Leo M. Baughman and others. The board's order was annulled by the superior court, and the board appeals. Affirmed.

Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, Harry W. McNutt, of Los Angeles, and Frank J. Burke, of Petaluma, for appellant.

Rosecrans & Emme, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court annulling, upon writ of review, and order of the state board of dental examiners whereby the license of respondent to practice dentistry in the state of California was revoked. The questions to be determined are whether there was any testimony adduced before the board showing that respondent was chargeable with knowledge that his unlicensed employee was practicing dentistry, and whether such knowledge is necessary before it can be said that a dentist is aiding or abetting an unlicensed person to practice dentistry.

[1] Inasmuch as appellant has argued that it is not the province of a court in certiorari proceedings to concern itself further than to determine whether the quasi judicial body, such as is the board of dental examiners, has exceeded its jurisdiction, it should be here observed that where such tribunal or board has acted, not upon a conflict in the evidence, but in spite of a lack of any competent evidence, it has exceeded its jurisdiction. It may be put in this language: That the writ of review may be used to determine whether there was any testimony to establish certain facts without the existence of which the board has no power to act. Goodall v. Superior Court of Santa Barbara County, 37 Cal. App. 724-727, 174 P. 924; Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 P. 35.

In this case the respondent was operating two dental offices, one in the city of Glendale and the other in the city of Los Angeles. He testified that Wilson, the employee, was a dental mechanic, and that he employed him as a laboratory man only; that he always had a dentist in the Los Angeles office, except for a few days after a Dr. Marr had quit and before he secured the services of a Dr. Walsh, and that during that time he left instructions that "Dr. Fridd was to take care of any patients that should come in, either come over there or have the patient sent over to the other office." Thomas Wilson testified that he was employed as a dental mechanic; that during the time they were expecting a new dentist to take the place vacated by Dr. Marr, a Mrs. Koch came in, and that he took an impression for some bridgework, made an appointment with her to return, and gave her the price of the work; that he never did any other operative work; that he knew that Dr. Osborne did not know that he was operating; that he simply took a chance on this occasion, and that during these few days they were making appointments in anticipation of Dr. Walsh, and when he did not arrive they called in another dentist. The testimony further established that Wilson was arrested and convicted of practicing dentistry without a license (the act thereof consisting of taking the impression referred to), and that 10 or 12 years before he had been convicted of practicing dentistry without a license in San Diego.

[2, 3] The appellants assert that from the fact that Dr. Osborne had heard that Wilson had been accused of practicing without a license in San Diego, and from the fact that Wilson was managing his office in Los Angeles—which Dr. Osborne had not visited in two or three months—they were justified in believing that respondent had knowledge of the fact that Wilson was doing operative dentistry. This argument would be more forceful, had there been a series of acts instead of an isolated instance; but as it stands we may only suspicion that there was more than one act, and, building upon suspicion rather than proof, if we adopt appellants' argument, infer that the doctor must have had knowledge by reason of its continuity. No inference is legally justifiable in this situation, and there is uncontradicted evidence in the record that Wilson's one act of practice was without Dr. Osborne's knowledge. But even if an inference were justified, the positive uncontradicted testimony to the contrary would dispel the inference. It has been held on several occasions by our courts that inferences which may be drawn from certain facts disappear when direct evidence to the contrary is offered. Maupin v. Solomon, 41 Cal. App. 323, 183 P. 198; Martinelli v. Bond, 42 Cal. App. 209, 183 P. 461; Everett v. Standard Accident Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 332-339, 187 P. 996; Fahey v. Madden, 56 Cal. App. 593-598, 206 P. 128; Musachia v. Jones, 65 Cal. App. 283-298, 223 P. 1006; Dowd v. Atlas Taxicab & Auto Service Co., 187 Cal. 523, 202 P. 870; Mar Shee v. Maryland Assur. Corporation, Baltimore, 190 Cal. 1-8, 210 P. 269.

[4] The question remaining for disposal is whether it is necessary for a dentist to know or to be chargeable with knowledge that he is in fact "aiding or abetting an unlicensed person to practice dentistry unlawfully" before the board may revoke his license for that offense. The act under which the respondent was proceeded against (Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923, p. 682) defines unprofessional conduct in the language we have just quoted, and these appellants argue that had the Legislature intended that knowledge or consent were necessary it would have so stated in the act. We cannot assent to the broad statement thus made, for the reason that aid and abet in this character of a proceeding necessarily implies knowledge. The expression is a familiar one in the domain of criminal law, and as there used it means that one has, with guilty knowledge and intent aided the actual perpetrator to commit the offense. 7 Cal. Jur. 889; People v. William Yee, 37 Cal. App. 579, 174 P. 343. We have no doubt but that the Legislature used the expression in this sense. It is difficult to believe that the valuable right that an upright and qualified citizen has to practice a profession could be made dependent upon an act done by another, of which the former has no knowledge. This construction is borne out by the analogy which may be drawn between disbarment proceedings and the one here under consideration. It has been uniformly held that disbarment proceedings are in the nature of criminal charges, and all intendments are in favor of the accused. Matter of Haymond, 121 Cal. 385, 53 P. 899.

By this analogy we think it must be apparent that knowledge is necessary before it can be said that a dentist has aided or abetted an unlicensed person to practice dentistry unlawfully.

Judgment affirmed.

GODFREY v. GODFREY. (Civ. 4542.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 22, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)—Judgment supported by substantial, though conflicting, evidence will not be disturbed.

Where a judgment is rendered upon conflicting evidence, it will not be disturbed on appeal, if supported by substantial evidence.

2. Replevin ⇐11(2)—In claim and delivery action where defendant claims ownership, demand need not be pleaded or proved, and failure to find demand is not error.

In an action of claim and delivery for certain household belongings where the defendant claims ownership, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to plead or prove a demand, and failure of the court to find a demand is not error.

3. Husband and wife ⇐138(10)—Where defendant's husband, buying furniture, had bill of sale executed to plaintiff without defendant's knowledge, plaintiff did not obtain title as against defendant.

Where defendant's husband, buying furniture and furnishings for their home, caused a bill of sale to be executed in plaintiff's name without defendant's consent or knowledge, held, that it did not constitute a valid transfer of title to plaintiff or impair defendant's title.

4. Principal and agent $\Rightarrow$ 25(1)—Statements made by defendant in presence of one whom plaintiff alleged was her agent held admissible, though not made in plaintiff's presence.

Where plaintiff alleged and attempted to prove that defendant's husband was plaintiff's agent in the purchase of furniture, conversations between her alleged agent and the defendant were admissible, notwithstanding they were not made in plaintiff's presence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Mary Ayer Godfrey against Bertie H. Godfrey. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

Leo V. Youngworth and Harry J. McClean, both of Los Angeles, for plaintiff.

Joseph Scott, Anderson & Anderson, Wm. M. Morse, Jr., and A. G. Ritter, all of Los Angeles, for defendant.

CRAIG, J. The pleadings and the evidence in this case show that the plaintiff had an adopted son named John Phillips Godfrey, and that he and the defendant in this action intermarried on or about February 3, 1922; that the plaintiff then resided at her home on Western avenue, in the city of Los Angeles; that shortly after their marriage John Phillips Godfrey and his wife removed from a hotel to a residence which they had established at Beverly Hills, in Los Angeles county; that the furniture and furnishings, which were the property of the plaintiff, were placed in the Beverly Hills home of the plaintiff's adopted son and his wife; that Godfrey and wife thereafter purchased additional furniture from various merchants in the city of Los Angeles, with whom accounts were opened by Godfrey, and for a large portion of which purchases the plaintiff was compelled to pay. On June 17, 1922, the plaintiff brought this action in claim and delivery, alleging ownership of all the furniture and furnishings, that the defendant claimed to be the owner thereof, that prior to said last-mentioned date John Phillips Godfrey, acting as the agent for the plaintiff, demanded possession of said personal property, and praying judgment that it be "redelivered" to the plaintiff or that she have damages in the sum of $10,000. The defendant answered, denying each of the material allegations of the complaint, and the case was tried before the superior court without a jury, whereupon the plaintiff was awarded judgment for possession of the property which had been removed from the Western avenue residence, and denied judgment for the furniture and furnishings which were purchased by the defendant and her husband as above mentioned, from which judgment each of the parties appealed.

[1] Plaintiff contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment rendered against her, but we think this claim is untenable, since there were several witnesses who testified for each of the parties, and the evidence is sharply conflicting. There is no dispute of the fact that the Western avenue furniture was the property of the plaintiff, but the defendant insisted at the trial, and argued upon appeal, that it was given to her. The defendant and her minor daughter, of the age of about 11 years, testified that the plaintiff stated to them and at various times in their presence that she had made them a present of her furniture in view of the fact that she expected to make her home with her adopted son and the defendant. The plaintiff emphatically denied that such conversation had ever occurred; that she had had much of the furniture for many years, some of which consisted of heirlooms, and that she did not intend to, and in fact had said that she would not, part with title to the property, but merely loaned it to the younger people for their temporary use. It was admitted that the plaintiff did not execute or deliver to the defendant a bill of sale to the furniture. Upon the record thus presented, the trial court may well have believed that title did not pass to the defendant to the property of her mother-in-law, and where a judgment is rendered upon conflicting evidence it will not be disturbed upon appeal if supported by substantial evidence.

[2] It is next argued by the defendant that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that there was no evidence that demand had been made by the plaintiff, previous to the commencement of this action, for the property removed from the Western avenue house, and that the trial court failed to find that a demand was made, though alleged in the complaint. Burke v. Maguire, 154 Cal. 456, 98 P. 21, is cited in this connection, but it is obvious from the defendant's own quotation therefrom that the case is not here in point, since it holds that "one lawfully in possession of property which he does not claim and which he has not converted to his own use, but is holding for the rightful owner with the intent to deliver it to him on demand," is entitled to a demand, as a prerequisite to the maintenance of a claim and delivery action for such property. The defendant in this suit denied the plaintiff's title and insisted throughout her testimony that she was the owner of the property in question. The only other authority upon which the defendant attempts to rely is Davenport v. Alexander, 53 Cal. App. 688, 200 P. 771, which, although holding that demand was necessary in that case, plainly inlicated that the property in controversy had been sold under a conditional sale contract, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to possession. It is settled law in this state that where, as here, property is in the lawful possession of one claiming to be the owner, a demand would be unavailing, and hence need not be pleaded or proved, and that under such circumstances the defendant will not be heard to object that no demand was made. San Diego Construction Co. v. Mannix, 175 Cal. 548, 166 P. 325. We think the trial court was justified in finding that this furniture belonged to the plaintiff, and its failure to find upon the question of demand was not error.

[3] The plaintiff does not claim to have purchased the other furniture which was placed in the Beverly Hills residence of the defendant, but she contends that it was purchased with her authority. This, however, was contradicted by the defendant's evidence, which tended to show that the latter and her husband, at times individually and at other times together, made the purchases upon the account of Godfrey; that his mother was not present, but later guaranteed to the merchants that Godfrey would pay the bills; that when asked if the charges should be entered upon the plaintiff's account, Godfrey replied, "No, this is for my own home, and I want it on my separate account." The defendant also testified that she paid some of the bills with her own money, and in some instances turned in other furniture for credit upon the accounts. True, the plaintiff was thereafter compelled to make good her guaranty, and to pay balances due the merchants, and on at least one occasion Godfrey caused a bill of sale to be executed in the name of the plaintiff. This action was instituted, however, for the purpose of attempting to acquire possession of the furniture, and the trial court found upon an abundance of conflicting evidence, much of which tended to support the judgment, that the plaintiff was not entitled to possession, and had never been the owner, of this portion of the property. We cannot therefore say, as a matter of law, that the court was in error in so finding, and such being true, the execution of a bill of sale by a third party, without the consent or knowledge of the defendant, would not constitute a valid transfer of title to the plaintiff or impair the title of the defendant, since she was not a party to the transaction.

[4] A Mrs. Weller was permitted to testify to statements alleged to have been made by the defendant in the presence of her husband, but not in the presence of the plaintiff, which statements plaintiff's counsel moved to strike out. The court denied the motion upon the ground that the plaintiff by her pleadings and in her testimony averred that Godfrey was her agent in all of the transactions in question, and it is argued that such ruling constituted prejudicial error, requiring a reversal of the judgment. In this the plaintiff assumes the novel, and we think untenable, position of claiming Godfrey as her agent in all respects wherein it would serve her purpose to do so, and yet objecting to conversations between her alleged agent and the defendant in this action which do not tend to support her theory of the case.

There are no other points requiring discussion, and since we find no prejudicial error the judgment is affirmed.

JONES, Petitioner, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5771.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 22, 1927.

1. Master and servant $\S$ 388—Claim of decedent's father-in-law, upon daughter's death, for balance of death compensation awarded her, came too late when not within year of son-in-law's death (Workmen's Compensation Law 1917, $\S$ 11 [b] [2], 14 [c], [e], 17 [c], as amended by St. 1919, p. 917).

Where father-in-law's claim for death benefits under Workmen's Compensation Law was not made within one year of son-in-law's death, and he was not mentioned by daughter, in her original claim, as deceased's dependent, he was not, in view of Workmen's Compensation Law (St. 1917, p. 831) $\S$ 11 (b) (2), and $\S$ 14 (c) (e), 17 (c), as amended by St. 1919, p. 917, entitled to the unexpired balance of the award upon his daughter's death.

2. Master and servant $\S$ 388—Industrial Commission is restricted to original record in ascertaining subsequent beneficiaries after death of first (Workmen's Compensation Act).

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831), the Industrial Accident Commission may not, upon death of first beneficiary, go beyond the record in the original proceedings to discover other beneficiaries to whom the unexpired balance of the award may be paid.

William J. Jones petitioned the Industrial Accident Commission for the unexpired balance of an award payable by the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York for the death of Michael Deranleau. To review an order denying the petition, petitioner applies for certiorari. Writ denied.

W. Matthews and H. W. Shaw, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. By an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, dated November 12, 1923, compensation in the sum of $5,000, payable in weekly payments, was allowed against the employer's insurance carrier, Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, and in favor of Cora M. Deranleau, surviving wife of Michael Deranleau, who was killed by accident on June 30, 1923. Cora M. Deranleau died on the 13th day of December, 1926, at which time there remained unpaid of said award the sum of $1,366.46. Apparently it is not claimed that there was any delinquency on account of payments due, but this was the unexpired balance of the award.

On the 4th day of February, 1927, the petitioner, William J. Jones (father of Mrs. Deranleau), filed with the Industrial Accident Commission a petition requesting that the commission set apart or reassign to him the unpaid balance of said death benefit. It did not appear in any of the proceedings down to the time of the death of Mrs. Deranleau that Jones was a dependent of the deceased employee. At the time of the hearing before the referee on the 7th day of April, 1927, the claim of dependency of Jones upon the deceased employee was mentioned for the first time. Jones was then permitted to amend his petition by alleging "that, at the time of the death of the said Michael Deranleau, the said petitioner William J. Jones was in ill health and was dependent upon said Michael Deranleau for support." Upon the ground that the petition did not state a cause of action and was not within the provisions of subdivisions (c) and (e) of section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), as amended (St. 1919, pp. 917, 918), the referee refused to take any testimony on behalf of the petitioner. Thereafter the commission made its order denying his said petition. In due course he filed this petition for a writ of review.

[1] According to section 11 (b) (2) of the act, any proceeding by or on behalf of Jones for the collection of a death benefit must have been commenced within one year from the date of the employee's death. As no claim was made by petitioner within that time, he can obtain no benefit from the commission's award unless it be held that the claim made by his daughter, and the award made to her, may be construed as a claim and award made in behalf of her father as well as on her own account. "There shall be but one cause of action for each transaction coming within the provisions of this act." Section 17 (c), St. 1919, p. 919. It may be conceded that, if the original proceedings had shown that Jones was a dependent of the deceased employee, the award might have been made in favor of both Mrs. Deranleau and Jones as such dependents, or might have been made in her favor, not only for her own support, but in trust for the support of her father. For aught that appears herein, if such claim had been made by him, she would have contested it and would have insisted that she should be recognized as the sole dependent beneficiary. Section 14 (e) of the act reads as follows:

"The commission may, anything in this act contained to the contrary notwithstanding, set apart or reassign the death benefit to any one or more of the dependents in accordance with their respective needs and as may be just and equitable, and may order payment to a dependent subsequent in right, or not otherwise entitled, upon good cause being shown therefor. Such death benefit shall be paid to such one or more of the dependents of the deceased or to a trustee appointed by the commission or a commissioner for the benefit of the person or persons entitled, as may be determined by the commission. The person to whom the death benefit is paid for the use of the several beneficiaries shall apply the same in compliance with the findings and directions of the commission. In the event of the death of a dependent beneficiary of any deceased employee, if there be no surviving dependent, the death of such dependent shall terminate the death benefit, which shall not survive to the estate of such deceased dependent, except that payments of such death benefit accrued and payable at the time of the death of such sole remaining dependent shall be paid upon the order of the commission to the heirs of such dependent or, if none, to the heirs of the deceased employee, without administration."

[2] Counsel for petitioner state that they have not been able to find any decision upon the point now presented for decision. It is our opinion that the commission was not authorized, and that we are not authorized, to go beyond the record as it existed at the time of the death of Mrs. Deranleau, for the purpose of discovering a dependent beneficiary not known to the original proceedings. It must be conceded that petitioner has no claim here as an heir at law of his deceased daughter. His right to make claim as a dependent of the deceased employee has expired by lapse of time, and, in the plain language of the statute, that portion of the death benefit not yet "accrued and payable" to Mrs. Deranleau at the time of her death was terminated by that event.

The petition is denied.

PEOPLE v. MAYFIELD.
(Cr. 1470.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 13, 1927.

Criminal law §1186(4)—Error, If any, in refusal to let person, defended by public defender, examine witnesses held not cause for reversing conviction of burglary (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for burglary, where public defender appeared with defendant at trial at suggestion of court and defendant did not entirely disclaim his assistance and took no exception to his statement to court that defendant handed him list of witnesses to be subpoenaed and did not object to his examining state's witnesses, refusal to let defendant examine witnesses on ground that he had lawyer with whom he could advise, if error, as compelling defendant to accept counsel not chosen by him and denying right to present his own defense without counsel, was not cause for reversal, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, requiring error to result in miscarriage of justice to warrant reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

R. C. Mayfield was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Aggeler, Public Defender, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

S. V. O. Prichard, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The only ground of appeal presented by defendant consists of a claim that he was compelled to accept counsel not chosen by him, and was denied the right to present his own defense without counsel.

At the time of entering defendant's plea he was represented by attorneys, who thereafter at the defendant's request were permitted to withdraw from the case. The court then asked the public defender, "in view of the defendant's attitude, to sit in on the case and render such assistance as the defendant is willing to accept from him." The public defender appeared with the defendant at the trial. The defendant stated to the court that he had made arrangements with another attorney who at the time was out of the state of California, and therefore could not be present. That defendant did not entirely disclaim the assistance of the public defender at that time is indicated by the fact that the public defender stated to the court that the defendant had handed to him a list of witnesses whom he wished subpoenaed in the case. To this statement defendant took no exception. The public defender cross-examined the state's witnesses without any further objection from the defendant.

After the close of the case on the part of the people, the defendant was sworn, and testified in answer to a series of questions propounded to him by the public defender as his counsel. At that time the defendant made no objection to this procedure. Thereafter, one George K. Home was called as a witness for defendant, apparently for the purpose of proving the good reputation of the defendant. The witness having been sworn, the defendant asked for the privilege of questioning the witness; the court replied:

"No, you have a lawyer here. Let the lawyer ask your questions. You can advise with your lawyer."

The witness, being asked whether he knew the defendant's reputation in the community in which he resides for truth, honesty, and integrity, replied, "I do not." Defendant then asked to be allowed to question the witness, and this request was denied by the court. Thereafter other witnesses were examined on behalf of the defendant by the public defender.

That the defendant was guilty of the crime charged, the record leaves no reasonable doubt; he simply stands upon the proposition that he was denied the constitutional right of representing himself at the trial without counsel. The record to which we have referred indicates that the defendant did not firmly and consistently insist upon his rights in the matter, but to some extent at least made affirmative use of the services of the public defender. Nevertheless, we take into consideration the fact that probably the defendant was not well acquainted with legal procedure, and we assume, for the purposes of the argument, that the services of the attorney were forced upon him, and that his right to defend himself without counsel was denied, and that this was error. The question is thus presented whether or not for that reason alone the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. We think that this question should be answered in the negative. The case furnishes a proper occasion for the application of the rule stated by the Supreme Court in People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 66, 130 P. 1042, 1046, where the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Sloss, declared that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution has at least the effect of abrogating the old rule that prejudice is presumed from any error of law, and further said:

"But it does not follow that every invasion of even a constitutional right necessarily requires a reversal. It may well be that the court, after examining the 'entire cause including the evidence,' is of the opinion that the error complained of, whatever its character, has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The mere fact that the assignment of error is based upon a provision of the Constitution is not conclusive. The final test is the opinion of the appellate court upon the result of the error. No doubt this view requires the court, to some extent, to weigh the evidence, and form conclusions upon its weight—a function which, heretofore, has been reserved for the jury. But it cannot be doubted that the legislators, in proposing the amendment, and the electors, in adopting it, intended to put upon the courts the performance of just that function. We are not substituted for the jury. We are not to determine, as an original inquiry, the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence. But, where the jury has found him guilty, we must, upon a review of the entire record, decide whether, in our judgment, any error committed has led to the verdict which was reached. If it appears to our satisfaction that the result was just, and that it would have been reached if the error had not been committed, a new trial is not to be ordered."

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WHITE. (Cr. 1381.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 25, 1927.

1. False pretenses ⚡38—Conviction on false pretense charge may be based on any alleged material misrepresentation, although proof fails as to other misrepresentations.

In prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, conviction may be based on any material misrepresentation alleged in the indictment if the evidence in the record is sufficient, although as to other misrepresentations the proof fails.

2. False pretenses ⚡29—Indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses, designating certain contract a sale of "gas units and interests," held sufficient.

Language of indictment calling certain contracts sale of "gas units and interests" was sufficient to inform defendant, charged with obtaining money under false pretenses, of the charge he was called upon to meet, hence he was not prejudiced by the inaccuracy of description.

3. False pretenses ⚡38—Under charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, variance between pleadings and proof as to matters not relied upon held immaterial.

In charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, variance between indictment and proof as to a preliminary statement of defendant in describing contract to purchaser was immaterial, where purchaser had read written contract and had not relied upon oral description.

4. False pretenses ⚡7(5)—Salesman's representations as to prospective dividends, being mere predictions, would not support charge of obtaining money under false pretenses.

Salesman's representations as to the amount of dividends prospective buyer would receive on purchase of gas corporation units were mere predictions of future events, hence would not alone support verdict of guilty on charge of obtaining money under false pretenses.

5. False pretenses ⚡7(5)—Misrepresentation that for money paid defendant would deliver certain property interests held mere statement of intention, insufficient to support charge of obtaining money under false pretenses.

Defendant's representation that if purchaser would pay him a certain sum of money he would sell and deliver certain gas units and interests held mere statement of intention, the falsity of which would not support a charge of obtaining money under false pretenses.

6. False pretenses ⚡49(4)—Evidence held insufficient to support finding that representation as to value of gas units sold was false.

In prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses through sale of gas units, evidence held not to justify a finding that representation of value of units was false.

7. False pretenses ⚡49(4)—In prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, evidence held not to establish falsity of defendant's statements as to dividend payments.

In prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses by sale of gas units, evidence held not sufficient to establish beyond a reasonable doubt the falsity of defendant's statements as to the dividends his company was then earning and paying upon gas interests sold.

8. Criminal law ⚡935(1)—If, under false pretense charge, court was not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that complainant relied upon pretenses, he properly granted new trial.

If, in trial on charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, court was not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that complainant relied upon pretenses, court properly granted a new trial after jury's verdict of guilty.

9. False pretenses ⚡52—In false pretense prosecution, instruction law forbids corporation to pay "dividend" out of capital held unduly to limit term "dividend."

In prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses through sale of certain gas interests, instruction that the law forbids a corporation to use any part of its capital stock to pay dividends, thus limiting "dividends" to the earnings of corporate stock, held erroneous, since "dividends" is a term of quite general meaning, signifying the division of a fund into aliquot parts and distribution thereof to the common owners.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Floyd G. White was convicted of obtaining money under false pretenses. From an order granting a new trial, the people appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and A. H. Van Cott, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

Edward N. Barnard, of Detroit, Mich., and Guy Eddie, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the people from an order granting a new trial. The respondent and two others were tried on an indictment containing nine counts, of which the first charged a conspiracy by the defendants to obtain money by false pretenses from Mrs. Catherine Bayne Stephens, Mrs. Lunette W. Smith, and other persons to the grand jury unknown, and set up eight different overt acts alleged to have been committed in pursuance of the conspiracy, and the subsequent counts dealt specially with the same transactions which were alleged as overt acts in the first count, charging as to each of them that the defendants had committed the offense of obtaining money by false pretenses. During the trial the indictment was dismissed as to one of the defendants, who thereupon testified for the prosecution. No evidence being given in behalf of the defense, the case was submitted to the jury on the evidence of the prosecution, and the court advised the jury to acquit both defendants remaining in the case upon all of the counts. The jury followed this advice as to one defendant, but not entirely as to the respondent, who was acquitted upon the first eight counts and convicted upon the ninth count. Thereupon respondent made a motion for a new trial, specifying as one of the grounds thereof the insufficiency of the evidence, and the court granted the motion on this ground alone.

The rules governing the consideration of appeals such as this are well established. The case of People v. Knutte, 111 Cal. 453, 44 P. 166, is parallel with that now before the court in many respects. There the offense charged was obtaining money by false pretenses, the case was submitted to the jury on the evidence of the prosecution alone, the court advised the jury to acquit, but instead they found the defendant guilty, and the trial court made an order granting a new trial from which the people appealed. In affirming this order, the Supreme Court said:

"The case was argued here by both parties upon the assumption that the new trial was granted upon the ground that the evidence was deemed insufficient to sustain the verdict; and while no specific ground is stated in the order of the court, it may be safely taken, from the court's action in advising the jury to acquit, that this assumption of counsel is correct. It has been so repeatedly held here as to become axiomatic that where a new trial is granted upon this ground, or where it is one of various grounds upon which the trial court may have based the order, its action will not be disturbed, except in a case showing a manifest and unmistakable abuse of discretion. * * * While it is the exclusive province of the jury to find the facts, it is nevertheless one of the most important requirements of the trial judge to see to it that this function of the jury is intelligently and justly exercised. In this respect, while he cannot competently interfere with or control the jury in passing upon the evidence, he nevertheless exercises a very salutary supervisory power over their verdict; in the exercise of that power he should always satisfy himself that the evidence as a whole is sufficient to sustain the verdict found, and, if in his sound judgment it is not, he should unhesitatingly say so, and set the verdict aside. People v. Lum Yit, 83 Cal. 130 [23 P. 228].

"It can, of course, make no difference in the exercise of this power by the court that the evidence in the case was wholly that of the prosecution, and stands, in the sense at least that it is not controverted by evidence on behalf of defendant, without conflict. The same duty rests upon the judge in such a case as where the evidence is conflicting, to satisfy himself that guilt has been established; and notwithstanding the evidence may be all one way, he is not required to believe it. * * *

"Nor does it affect the question that the evidence in the case may have a legal tendency to prove all the material facts. Guilt is to be established beyond a reasonable doubt; and while there may be some evidence to support each fact, this does not signify that it is necessarily such as to satisfy the conscience of the judge that a case is made which warrants conviction."

No decision in conflict with these rules can be found, and in People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046, which likewise involved an appeal by the people from an order granting a new trial, the Supreme Court said, after referring to article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution:

"But this section of the Constitution was not designed to take from the trial court and transfer to the appellate courts the high discretion vested in that tribunal. The judge who presided at the trial of the cause, who heard the testimony, who observed the jurors and had an opportunity also of testing the truth of the defendant's statements by noticing his demeanor, was in a peculiarly favorable position for determining justly the question whether or not the defendant had been accorded a fair trial. * * * We can hardly manufacture in fancy a hypothetical situation in which a reviewing court would be justified in questioning the discretion of a trial court who should grant a new trial in a case involving a criminal charge."

The false pretenses alleged in counts 2, 3, 4, and 5 related to the affairs of the Interstate Oil Corporation, and those alleged in counts 6, 7, 8, and 9 related to the Brown Process Company. The several counts relating to the Brown Process Company are identical as to the party defrauded and the false representations charged, differing only as to the dates and the amounts obtained by the alleged false pretenses. The eighth and ninth counts are alike, even as to the dates on which it is alleged the false pretenses were made and the money obtained. The ninth count, upon which respondent was convicted, charged that the offense was committed on January 17, 1924, and that on that date the defendants, with intent to defraud Mrs. Catherine Bayne Stephens of her money and property, falsely represented to her—

"(1) that they, the said defendants, had on hand for sale certain 46 gas units and interests of a corporation, by name the Brown Process Company; (2) which said gas units and interests were then and there of the value of $1,000 each; (3) that the same were then and there earning and paying a dividend of 33 per cent. per annum, upon the basis of a value of $1,000 for each of said gas units and interests of said Brown Process Company; (4) that, if she would purchase these certain gas units and interests of said Brown Process Company, she would immediately commence to receive and would continue to receive dividends of 33 per cent. per annum, payable on the 22d of each month; (5) and that within 3 years from the time of said purchase of said gas units and interests, the money she would pay them for said gas units and interests would be returned to her by the said defendants; (6) that the said gas units and interests of the Brown Process Company were secured by the total assets of the said corporation of the actual cash value of $1,000,000; (7) that, if she, the said Mrs. Catherine Bayne Stephens, would then and there pay over and deliver to them the sum of $46,000, lawful money of the United States, and then and there the personal property of her, the said Mrs. Catherine Bayne Stephens, the said defendants would then and there sell and deliver to her, the said Mrs. Catherine Bayne Stephens, 46 gas units and interests of the said Brown Process Company, a corporation as aforesaid." (For convenience of reference we have inserted the numbers in parentheses before the several representations alleged.)

Following this are the necessary allegations to complete the cause of action, showing the falsity of the representations and defendants' knowledge thereof, belief in the truth of the representations by Mrs. Stephens, and her payment of $46,000 to the defendants in reliance thereon. No point is made as to the latter allegations, and hence we do not state them in detail.

[1] The appellant contends that the evidence not only justified, but required, a verdict of guilty on the ninth count, and that for this reason the trial court erred in granting a new trial. Appellant's argument mainly revolves about the representation which we have numbered 3, its claim being in effect, though not in words, that all the necessary allegations in regard to that representation were proved beyond a reasonable doubt. In this sort of cases, however, a verdict of guilty may be based on any material misrepresentation alleged in the indictment, if the evidence in regard to it is sufficient, although as to others the proof fails. For this reason it is necessary to give some consideration to all the false pretenses charged in the ninth count.

It clearly appears from the evidence that, as a part of the transaction referred to in this count, Mrs. Stephens entered into a certain written contract with Brown Process Company. All the representations made by respondent related to this contract, and in order to consider them intelligently it is necessary to have in mind its principal terms. The contract is dated January 17, 1924, but Mrs. Stephens testified that she did not sign it until after February 11, 1924. It recites that Brown Process Company, designated as the party of the first part, has an oil treating plant and refinery at Maricopa, in which it has invested upwards of $400,000, that it is operating under dehydrating patents owned by it which greatly increase its profits, that it has purchased as a location for an additional oil refining plant 18 acres of land in the county of Los Angeles (describing it), which is held partly by deed and partly by agreement to purchase, that it has constructed and is completing and is now operating in part an oil treating plant on said land, and that it needs additional funds to complete the purchase of the land and to complete and add to its treating plant and refinery thereon; and thereupon it is agreed that Mrs. Stephens, referred to as the party of the second part, will forthwith pay to the company $46,000 to be used by it in paying balances due on the said land and buildings and adding to the present improvements and conducting its business, that she shall have no right, title, or interest in any other property of the company, but her only interest shall be limited to the compensation referred to in the agreement and an interest in the 18 acres of land above mentioned and the oil treating plant thereon.

The contract also contains this provision:

"For each $1,000 invested by second party first party hereby agrees to pay to second party one-thirtieth of 1 cent per barrel for all oil treated or topped by said refinery, but not exceeding 90,000 barrels in any one month; provided oil can be treated at a margin of 18½ cents per barrel between cost and selling price. Cost price to be the price paid for crude oil delivered at the plant, and selling price to be the net amount received from the sale of all the products derived from each barrel of oil treated.

"Should said margin be less than 18½ cents, first party shall pay to the second party, for each $1,000 invested, one-fiftieth of the net amount received per barrel, in excess of 15 cents per barrel, said 15 cents per barrel being agreed to be, as between the parties hereto, the cost of treating said oil."

Following this is a provision for the keeping of accounts by the company and the inspection thereof by Mrs. Stephens, and for payment on or before the 30th day of each month of the amount due her on account of oil treated in the preceding month. There is also a provision that on the sale of said land and refinery in whole or in part, Mrs. Stephens shall be paid by the company " * * * such proportion of the amount received from such sale as the sum of all his investment in said property bears to the amount invested, in said entire plant, including lands and pipe line, less the amount charged off for depreciation as shown by the books of the first party at the time of such sale." The contract also declares that the parties are not partners or joint adventurers, and should either sustain a loss the other shall not be liable to contribution therefor, and that the company reserves the right to purchase all rights of Mrs. Stephens under the contract on giving her a certain notice and paying her "the amount originally advanced" by her, plus 10 per cent., and provides that additional contracts of like character may be made by the corporation with Mrs. Stephens or with other parties.

The exact nature of this contract is a matter of some doubt, for it does not readily lend itself to precise classification, but it was clearly not a subscription for or a sale of any of the capital stock of the corporation, and it gave Mrs. Stephens no interest in such stock. It is also clear that by the terms of the contract she has no right in the net profits or surplus of the corporation as such. Its obligation to pay her a specified amount per barrel of oil treated or topped, while not mature and enforceable until the thirtieth day of the following month, becomes absolute in all other respects as soon as each barrel of oil is run through the refinery, or at least upon a sale of the products derived therefrom, and cannot be defeated or affected by proof that its entire business shows a loss instead of a profit. Payment on this obligation can be compelled from any assets of the corporation regardless of whether they are such as may lawfully be used to pay dividends on its stock.

[2, 3] The respondent contends that there was a variance between the indictment and the proof as to representation No. 1, basing his argument upon a claim that what he offered to Mrs. Stephens was not properly described as "gas units and interests," and could not be the subject of sale. Several similar contracts were made by Mrs. Stephens with the Brown Process Company through the solicitation of respondent, and in discussing them with her he referred to them sometimes as "units" and sometimes as "contracts." He also negotiated a similar contract with the witness G. A. Stephens, and while so doing referred to such contracts as "units." The contracts referred to created in the parties dealing with the corporation some sort of an interest, the nature of which we do not find it necessary to define exactly, in a certain oil refinery and oil-treating plant of the corporation in which gasoline would of course be produced. The word "gas" is a common abbreviation for gasoline, and was doubtless so used in the indictment. The contract cannot be described with complete accuracy in any short form of words. In view of these facts, we do not see how the respondent could have been prejudiced by the designation of these contracts as "gas units and interest," or by the reference to the making of them as a "sale," even though it be conceded that these terms are not accurate and precise descriptions of the matters to which they were so applied. The language used was sufficient to inform respondent of the charge which he was called upon to meet. Furthermore, this representation is not the substantial matter upon which Mrs. Stephens relied in paying her money to respondent, but is a mere preliminary statement intended to identify the contract to which the subsequent representations related. It appears from her testimony that she read the contract before she signed it and understood the nature of the payments which were to be made to her by the corporation. Under these circumstances, an incorrect description of the contract by the respondent in discussing it with her would not afford a basis for a charge of obtaining money by false pretenses, and a variance between the pleadings and the proof in regard to his description of it is immaterial.

There is no evidence that representation No. 2 was ever made by respondent. No representation as to the value of the units and interests was testified to by any witness. The only showing in regard thereto is in the contract itself, which states that for each $1,000 paid to the corporation by the other party such other party will receive certain returns, but does not purport to fix $1,000 as the value of the interest for which that amount is paid.

[4, 5] We pass for the time representation No. 3, which requires somewhat extended consideration. Representations 4 and 5 were manifestly either mere predictions of events to occur in the future or expressions of opinion, and the verdict of the jury could not be upheld upon them alone. People v. Green, 22 Cal. App. 45, 133 P. 334; People v. Walker, 69 Cal. App. 475, 231 P. 572; People v. Gibbs, 98 Cal. 661, 33 P. 630; People v. Kahler, 26 Cal. App. 449, 147 P. 228; In re James, 47 Cal. App. 205, 190 P. 466. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the evidence in regard to these representations. Representation No. 7 is a mere statement of intention, the falsity of which would not support the charge. Moreover, it is unquestionably shown to be true. Mrs. Stephens on payment of her money did receive the "gas units and interests" referred to.

[6] There is no evidence of the making of the whole of representation No. 6. The only statement made as to security is contained in the contract itself, which clearly shows that it is secured only by an interest of some sort in the oil-treating and refining plant situated on the 18 acres of land already mentioned, and that the corporation has another similar plant and other property which the contract does not affect. There is testimony by Mrs. Stephens that the respondent told her the corporation had assets worth over $1,000,000. The only testimony as to the total value of the assets is that they had a book value in round numbers of $1,786,000 of which $995,000 was the book value of a patented process owned and used by the corporation. There is in the record testimony that this process was of great utility and better than any other process for dehydrating oil, but no definite statement as to its value. This evidence would not justify a finding that the representation of value was false.

[7] The only representation remaining for consideration is No. 3. Respondent contends that the evidence is not sufficient to establish its falsity beyond a reasonable doubt, and we think this contention must be sustained. The purport of this representation was that contracts like that between Mrs. Stephens and Brown Process Company were then earning and paying 33 per cent. per annum. To prove the falsity of this representation, the people called as a witness W. Arthur Brown, who testified that when Mrs. Stephens was discussing her investment with respondent he was president of the corporation and in charge of its field operations and the plant in question, and was also familiar with its financial condition; that the corporation was then in need of money to carry on its business; that its current assets were always rather small as compared to its current liabilities; that the current assets at the end of 1923 were about $234,000, and the current liabilities at the same time were $733,000; and that from its entire business the corporation sustained a loss of $155,000 in 1923, and a further loss of $112,000 in 1924. Basil Jones, an expert accountant, also called by the people, testified that he had examined the books of the corporation, and he gave certain figures as to its financial condition derived from the books, which were substantially the same as those stated by Brown, but which went further back and showed that the corporation also sustained a loss in 1922. This testimony, which was not disputed, would no doubt amply establish the proposition that the corporation was not earning and was not in a position to pay any dividends on its capital stock, but as we have already pointed out, that proposition has no bearing on the matter now under consideration. The representation concerned the earnings then being made and paid by contracts like that into which Mrs. Stephens was about to and did enter. To discover the truth as to this matter it would be necessary to inquire into the capacity of the refinery, the amount of oil then being treated therein, the margin of profit at which it was treated, and perhaps other matters going to show whether persons who had invested in similar contracts were earning and receiving 33 per cent. per annum on their investment. The witness Brown testified on cross-examination that at the time when the representation in question was made the capacity of the plant was sufficient to handle 90,000 barrels of oil per month, and the corporation was able to treat oil therein at a margin of 18½ cents per barrel. If the plant was worked to its full capacity under these conditions, each $1,000 invested under the contract in question would earn $360 per year, or 36 per cent. per annum. Brown was not asked, and no witness testified, how much oil was actually being treated by the plant at the time in question, and without this information the jury could not find that the earnings of each $1,000 were less than 33 per cent. per annum.

In addition to the foregoing testimony, there is one other circumstance bearing upon the matter. Mrs. Stephens, as appears from her testimony, invested $75,000 in a contract of the same kind on September 25, 1923, and $25,000 in another such contract on November 13, 1923, upon the same representations by respondent as were made regarding the contract referred to in the ninth count. She also testified that the first money which she received by way of income or payments from the corporation on these contracts was $2,000, received on December 20, 1923, and that she received nothing more until February 4, 1924, when she was paid $1,383.85. This was much less than 33 per cent. per annum on her investment already made. Even assuming that each of these contracts did not begin to earn any income until the 1st of the month following that in which it was made, still the earnings of the $75,000 contract at 33 per cent. per annum would have been $2,062.50 for October and a like amount for November, and the amount due for each month should have been paid to her not later than the 30th of the following month, according to the contract, or the 22d according to the representation, charged. In December the earnings of the two contracts should have been $2,750, payable in like manner. It thus appears that her first payment was one month late and less than half of what it should have been at the time it was made, and the next one was about half the proper amount without making up the deficiency. She also testified to later receipts which were at no greater rate. These facts show that in January, 1924, payments were not being made as represented, and from them an inference is possible that these contracts were not earning as much as was represented. We do not think, however, that this inference as to earnings was so conclusive as to preclude the court from granting a new trial on this point, for a deficiency in payments might be accounted for on other grounds than a deficiency in earnings, and no further showing on the latter point was before the court. The burden was upon the people to show the falsity of the representation as to earnings, and we cannot say that there was proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

[8] Moreover, the inference from this testimony of Mrs. Stephens cuts two ways. The first two payments under her previous contracts, which amounted to less than 50 per cent. of what they should have been, according to the representations testified to by her, were made before she entered into the contract and paid the money which form the subject-matter of the ninth count. The trial court may have concluded from this fact that she had information before entering into the last-mentioned contract of the falsity of the representations, which were made to her in regard to earnings and payments, and hence that her reliance upon these representations was not established beyond a reasonable doubt. Such a conclusion would have required the granting of a new trial, and we cannot say that it was not warranted by the evidence.

[9] At the request of the people, the court instructed the jury as follows:

"You are instructed that directors of a corporation cannot lawfully make dividends except from the surplus profits arising from the business of the corporation. In other words, the law forbids a corporation to use any part of its capital stock to pay dividends. By capital stock is here meant 'the actual property of the corporation contributed by the shareholders of the corporation'; that is, the money or other property which they pay or give for the shares of stock of the corporation."

No doubt the reason for giving this instruction was that several counts of the indictment set up certain transactions by which, as charged, the respondent sold preferred stock of Interstate Oil Corporation and obtained money therefor by false representations as to the dividends which that stock was then earning. For the present purpose we assume that as to such a transaction the instruction was correct. But the indictment also refers to the earnings of the contract covered by the ninth count as "dividends," and charges the respondent with a false representation as to the "dividends" which such "units and interests" were then earning and paying. The term "dividends" is not limited in its significance to the earnings or corporation stock, but is one of quite general meaning. "Both in common and legal parlance, the term implies a portion of a fund divided among several others. * * * The term carries with it the idea of a division of a fund owned by several parties, and the dividend is the aliquot portion of the estate of the common owners." 18 Corpus Juris, 1406; In re Fielding (D. C.) 96 F. 801. As thus defined, the term could be applied to the payments made as a result of dividing the income of the oil refinery among the persons investing in such contracts as were made with Mrs. Stephens, of which the evidence showed that several were outstanding. In view of the meaning of the term "dividend" and its use in the indictment to designate the payments to be made under the contract here involved, we think the jury must have understood from the foregoing instruction that the Brown Process Company could not pay to Mrs. Stephens the sums called for by that contract, except from its surplus profits; and it may have been by applying such a rule to the above-mentioned evidence as to its financial condition that they concluded that the representations as to the earnings of the contract were false. As we have already stated, this is an erroneous view of the nature and effect of the contract, and the instruction referred to should not have been given without some qualification limiting its application to the payment of dividends on corporate stock. On a new trial it should be omitted altogether, the other counts being disposed of by the acquittal. The order appealed from is affirmed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court of Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action for conversion by Kier Singh Doot against the Skirving Warehouse Company, in which J. F. Bedwell intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant and intervener appeal. Affirmed.

William E. Kleinsorge, of Sacramento, for appellant Warehouse Co.

Ralph W. Smith, of Sacramento, for intervener appellant.

Arthur M. Bundy, of Marysville, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The hearing by this court was granted herein after decision by the District Court of Appeal in and for the Third Appellate District, wherein the judgment of the trial court was affirmed, in order that further consideration might be given by this court to the question presented upon this appeal. Upon such further consideration this court is satisfied with the correctness of the decision of the appellate tribunal, written by Mr. Justice Pullen, pro tempore, and therefore hereby adopt the same as the decision of this court. Such decision reads as follows:

"On the 14th of February, 1920, J. F. Bedwell, the intervener herein, was the owner of certain lands situated in Placer and Sutter counties, which on that date intervener leased to Habib Ulla and Rahmat Ulla, who agreed to pay intervener certain cash rentals and in addition thereto one-third of all crops of rice raised on said lands delivered by them to the warehouse free and clear of all claims and demands. The lease also contained a crop mortgage on one-half of the lessees' interest in the crops which might be grown upon the lands, as security for the faithful performance of all the terms of the lease.

"The first cash payment provided to be paid under the lease was paid, and the lessees went into possession. In the spring of 1920 they planted the lands to rice and about the latter part of November, 1920, began cutting the rice. After having cut approximately 30 acres they were prevented from further cutting of the crop on account of the unseasonable rains.

"Apparently the lessees became financially involved and were unable to proceed further with their farming operations, whereupon the lessees Habib Ulla and Rahmat Ulla and the receiver of the First National Bank of Gridley, who held an unpaid chattel mortgage on the crop of the lessees, and Kier Singh Doot, the plaintiff herein, entered into an agreement in writing wherein Kier Singh Doot, the plaintiff, agreed to thresh, sack, and deliver to the warehouse all the rice crop at a price in said agreement agreed upon, the receipts therefrom to be divided one-third to the landlord, J. F. Bedwell, and two-thirds to be retained by the warehouseman, and, upon five days' notice to the receiver of the bank, he, at his option, could pay certain designated expenses incurred by plaintiff, whereupon the receipts were to be delivered to said receiver, but, if the receiver should elect not to pay the expenses so designated, the receipts should be issued to plaintiff herein. Thereafter, and in accordance with said agreement, plaintiff threshed, sacked, and delivered the crop of rice to the warehouse of defendant and thereafter the receiver elected not to exercise his option under the agreement and within the time stipulated so notified defendant; thereupon plaintiff demanded that the receipts for two-thirds of the crop be delivered to him, he having already delivered one-third of the rice to the intervener as provided in the lease. About the same time intervener made a similar demand on defendant, claiming that he, the intervener, was the only person entitled to the receipts under the terms of his lease and crop mortgage, and later defendant, ignoring the demands of plaintiff, delivered to intervener the warehouse receipts for all of the rice in controversy, aggregating about 1,725 sacks.

"Subsequently intervener sold all of the rice and after deducting certain expenses for storage charges to defendant applied the balance, $1,725.79, as a credit upon the cash rental which fell due January 15, 1921, as specified in the lease.

"Plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the disposition of the proceeds of his labor, brought this action against the defendant warehouse company for conversion, and at the proper time the landlord, J. F. Bedwell, intervened and became a party to the action. Defendant denied the allegations of the complaint and set up as a defense that Bedwell was entitled to the possession of all said rice. Bedwell, in his suit in intervention, set up his claim to the rice, and upon the issues joined the cause was tried by the court, and judgment was rendered finding that plaintiff was entitled to the rice in question, less certain charges, and from this judgment both the defendant warehouse company and Bedwell, intervener, have appealed.

"The cause was tried upon the theory that plaintiff had a lien on the crop and the findings are so drafted; but appellants urge that plaintiff waived his lien and in the negotiation between himself and the receiver of the First National Bank agreed to accept two-thirds of the crop in full compensation for his services. Having waived his lien, he took the two-thirds interest in the crop, subject to the liens and crop mortgage entered into between Ulla and Bedwell, of which plaintiff had constructive notice, and, inasmuch as the cash installment of rent was at that time due and unpaid, the proceeds from the rice should be applied thereon.

[1] "This is an action in conversion, and there is no doubt in cases of this class as to the burden of proof, for proof of the deposit and failure of the bailee to redeliver in accordance with the terms of the contract makes a prima facie case, and the burden, therefore, is upon the warehouseman to excuse the failure to make such redelivery. Taussig v. Bode & Haslett, 134 Cal. 260, 66 P. 259, 54 L. R. A. 774, 86 Am. St. Rep. 250. The evidence in this case fails to disclose any justification by the warehouseman for his failure to deliver and there is no question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment upon this issue.

[2] "Plaintiff bases his claim to the rice or the proceeds from the sale thereof by virtue of a laborer's lien as provided for by section 3051 of the Civil Code. In the case of Wilson v. Donaldson, 121 Cal. 8, 53 P. 404, 43 L. R. A. 524, 66 Am. St. Rep. 17, the court held that a laborer, employed by the occupant of land to harvest a crop of grain, has a lien upon the harvested grain dependent upon his possession thereof under the above section, but his lien is subject to the prior lien of a chattel mortgage upon the growing crop. This case, however, was directly overruled by the case of Mortgage Securities Co. v. Pfaffmann, 177 Cal. 109, 169 P. 1033, L. R. A. 1918D, 118, and the rule now clearly is that the possessory lien of the improver of personal property is superior to the pre-existing lien of a chattel mortgage. That plaintiff is entitled to the benefits of such statutory lien as is contemplated by section 3051 of the Civil Code was, in Wilson v. Donaldson, supra, recognized for the purpose of that case. And upon principle, to some extent at least, this is recognized by the case of Douglass v. McFarland, 92 Cal. 656, 28 P. 687.

[3] "Conceding that respondent is such a person as has rendered such service to the owner of the unthreshed rice as to entitle him to the statutory lien granted by section 3051 of the Civil Code, and that such lien is superior to the recorded chattel mortgage held by the intervener as owner of the lands upon which such rice was grown, has plaintiff done anything to waive the right so conferred by law? Appellants claim that, by the terms of the contract between plaintiff and the receiver of the First National Bank of Gridley and lessees that plaintiff waived his lien, and that he agreed to accept two-thirds of the crop in full of his labor as such, and, having so waived his lien, he took his two-thirds interest in the crop, subject to the terms of the chattel mortgage held by intervener, which mortgage was duly of record, and of which thereby plaintiff received constructive notice.

"The portion of the contract between respondent and the receiver upon which appellant relies is as follows:

"It is understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that Kier Singh Doot agrees to thresh, sack, and deliver at the nearest available warehouse all of said rice at the price of 55 cents per 100 for threshing, $2 per ton for hauling to Ketrick Warehouse on N. E. R. R. (or going hauling wage, if to any other warehouse) sacks and twine at market prices, and it is understood and agreed that the warehouse receipts are to be issued one-third to the landlord and the warehouseman is hereby directed to hold the receipts for the two-thirds share until all rice is threshed and delivered, when upon five days' notice in writing to the said A. L. James, receiver, Gridley, Cal., the said A. L. James, at his option, may pay all necessary expenses incurred by said Kier Singh Doot, whereupon the receipts for said two-thirds share shall be issued to said receiver; if said A. L. James shall elect not to pay said expenses incurred by said Kier Singh Doot in said threshing, sacking, and hauling, then said warehouse receipts shall be issued to Kier Singh Doot, and the said receipts shall be Kier Singh Doot's property, free and clear of all claims by said mortgagee, the said First National Bank, A. L. James, receiver; and in such latter event the said Kier Singh Doot agrees to accept the said warehouse receipts for said two-thirds share in full payment for all his charges and expenses in connection with the threshing, sacking, and hauling of said crop. Said A. L. James is to have five days' notice in which to accept or reject said warehouse receipts as herein provided, and it is agreed that he shall, in writing, notify said warehouseman of his election to accept said receipts and pay the said charges and expenses, or he shall, in writing, notify said warehouseman of his election to reject to pay said charges, in which latter event, said warehouseman is authorized at once to issue receipts to the said Kier Singh Doot as herein provided."

"We find nothing in the agreement that supports the claim of appellants. The rule of law we concede to be that, where one enters into a contract, the complete performance of which, according to its true intent and terms, is inconsistent with the existence of a lien given by law, he thereby foregoes and waives the lien which the law would otherwise give him; but there is nothing contained in the language of the agreement referred to that could be construed as a waiver of any claim or possessory right, at least until the receiver had elected to receive the rice and pay for the threshing charges."

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

FICKLING v. JACKMAN et al. (Civ. 4541.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 19, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 17, 1927.

1. Stipulations ⇨18(1)—Stipulation that mechanic's lien was valid held to preclude defendants from questioning validity.

In mechanic's lien action, stipulation between plaintiff and defendants that plaintiff's claim together with mechanic's lien securing it on the real property described in the complaint was admitted as established and further proof waived, and that claim of another defendant should be deemed established, and that the two mechanic's lien claims should be upon an absolute equality held to preclude defendants from subsequently questioning the validity of plaintiff's lien as insufficiently describing property absent any claim of fraud or mistake.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1047(3)—Striking out testimony respecting trust deed held not ground for complaint, where facts were conceded.

Defendants might not complain because the court struck out a witness' testimony that a trust deed, executed to secure the payment of part of the cost of construction work, could be transferred with the owner's consent and that it was recorded before the work was commenced, where these facts were conceded.

3. Evidence ⇨471(29)—Striking out testimony that trust deed was prior to mechanics' liens held proper as conclusion.

In mechanic's lien action, witness' testimony that a trust deed, given to secure the payment of a part of contract price of construction work, was senior to mechanics' liens subsequently accruing held purely conclusion of law and properly stricken out.

4. Mortgages ⇨151(3)—Where mortgage filed requires advances, lien thereof is prior to mechanics' liens subsequently accruing, but if advances are optional, lien attaches as of date of advances as against incumbrances or liens of which mortgagee has notice.

Where a mortgage filed prior to the commencement of work on a building contains an enforceable obligation binding the mortgagee to advance money or material, the lien of the mortgage for the advances is prior to mechanics' liens subsequently accruing for labor done or materials furnished, but where the mortgage makes it optional with the mortgagee whether to make advances, the lien attaches as of the date of the advancements, at least as against incumbrances or liens of which he has notice.

5. Mortgages ⇨151(3)—Trust deed securing payment of contract price and providing that contractor should furnish labor and materials obligates him to pay therefor as regards priority over mechanics' liens.

Provision of deed of trust given to building contractor to secure the payment of part of the contract price for erecting buildings, that the contractor would furnish all labor and materials necessary for the erection and completion of the buildings, held to obligate the contractor to pay for all labor done and materials used in erection of buildings as regards question of priority of trust deed over mechanics' liens.

6. Mortgages ⇨151(3)—Lien of deed of trust securing contractor and obligating him to pay for labor and materials held inferior to mechanics' liens (Code Civ. Proc. § 1193).

Under deed of trust given to building contractor to secure to him the payment of the contract price for erecting buildings and obligating him to furnish all labor and materials necessary and thereby requiring him to pay for all labor and materials which was duly recorded, lien of deed of trust held inferior to lien of subsequently accruing mechanics' liens, since, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1193, claim of a contractor is subsequent to claims for work done and materials furnished.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien brought by J. M. Fickling against W. T. Jackman, the Hammond Lumber Company, the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, and others. From the judgment of foreclosure, the two defendants last named appeal. Affirmed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Peyton H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. On July 11, 1921, A. Schneider (since deceased), as owner, entered into a building contract with the defendant W. T. Jackman Company, as contractor, for the erection of a bungalow court. The contract provides that of the total contract price "Ten thousand (10,000) dollars * * * shall be due and payable on or before four years after date of completion of said buildings and shall be payable in installments of two hundred fifty (250) dollars per month beginning thirty days after the completion of the said buildings." After provision for interest at 7 per cent. per annum, it was further stated that the note evidencing this sum "is to be secured by a trust deed on said property and shall be drawn in favor of Kathryn Thompson, a single woman, and shall be filed for record at once. Said note to be put in trust at Hellman Bank till bldg. completed." The deed of trust was signed on July 12, 1921, in accordance with the understanding, and placed of record on the next day, July 13, 1921. On July 14, 1921, Schneider placed the note in the hands of the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, with instructions, signed by himself alone, that the note and trust deed, when returned from the recorder's office, should be held by the bank until he should notify them to deliver it to W. T. Jackman Company. It is conceded that the note and trust deed were executed, and the trust deed recorded, prior to the commencement of any work on the buildings. During the progress of the work the appellant Hammond Lumber Company informed the contractor and owner that it would not proceed further with the delivery of materials unless it were given security superior to its mechanic's lien rights. After some negotiation the trust deed note was assigned and delivered to it, contemporaneously with the following instrument:

"Los Angeles, Cal., September 7, 1921.

"Hammond Lumber Company, 2010 So. Alameda Street, Los Angeles, Cal.—Gentlemen: The undersigned, W. T. Jackman Company, have contracted construction work for Abraham Schneider, part payment for which is a trust deed of $10,000 made by said Abraham Schneider in favor of Kathryn Thompson. Said trust deed shall be valid only upon completion of the building according to plans and specifications and contract, or upon the owner signing notice of completion. A. Schneider.

"Abraham Schneider: If building is completed and trust deed is valid, then you shall hold same security to this or any other account of W. T. Jackman Company under terms in accordance with your collateral note pledge, copy of which is hereto attached. Yours truly, W. T. Jackman Company, 4372 So. Hoover St., by W. H. Prince. Kathryn Thompson. 1240 No. Cahuenga."

It is apparent and conceded that Kathryn Thompson had no interest in the note, but held the same for W. T. Jackman Company. Notice of completion was filed December 16, 1921.

The plaintiff and respondent did plumbing work upon the buildings and brought action to foreclose his mechanic's lien. The contest revolves around the question whether the trust deed is superior or inferior to the mechanic's lien of plaintiff. Judgment was entered for the amount of plaintiff's lien, in the sum of $4,380.23, together with interest and costs, and for the amount of the appellant Hammond Lumber Company's lien, in the sum of $20,413.23, together with interest and costs. It was further adjudged that upon sale of the property these amounts should be paid prior to the payment of the trust deed note. The appeal is from the judgment.

[1] Appellants assign three reasons for a reversal of the judgment, one of which is that the mechanic's lien of plaintiff is insufficient for the reason that while the buildings were constructed upon lots 31 and 32 of tract No. 3499, the lien of plaintiff only refers to lot 32, and that the description of the property by street number is not satisfactorily complete, because it describes the property "as being 1240 and 1244 Cahuenga avenue," when in fact the property was numbered "1240, 1242, and 1244." Whatever question might have been raised as a result of this description is not available to the appellants, for a very obvious reason. Prior to the trial counsel for plaintiff and counsel for the defendant Hammond Lumber Company and Title Guarantee & Trust Company entered into a stipulation concerning the facts, the material portions of which read as follows:

"The claim of J. M. Fickling for $4,055, and interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from January 12, 1922, as set forth in his complaint, together with a mechanic's lien, securing said amount, upon the real property described in the complaint of the said J. M. Fickling, is hereby admitted as established, and further proof thereon is hereby waived. * * * The claim of the Hammond Lumber Company, as set forth in its complaint in a certain action instituted in this court, and numbered 105044 of the records of this court, wherein Hammond Lumber Company was plaintiff and W. T. Jackman et al. were defendants, together with its right to a mechanic's lien for the amount of said claim upon the real property described in the complaint in said action, shall be deemed established, and further proof of the amount of said claim and of the right to a lien upon the real property, referred to in said complaint, is hereby waived. * * * It is stipulated that the mechanic's lien claims of the said J. M. Fickling and of the said Hammond Lumber Company, respectively, as above stipulated for, shall be deemed as standing on the same basis, and upon an absolute equality under the law, neither having a preference over the other; it being understood, however, that no stipulation is made as to whether that certain trust deed, executed by Abraham Schneider in favor of the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, upon the real property set up in plaintiff's complaint, and securing a note for $10,000 in favor of Kathryn Thompson, which said note was assigned to the Hammond Lumber Company, is a prior lien upon said real property superior to the mechanic's lien of J. M. Fickling, the plaintiff above named, the priority between the lien of said trust deed and the lien of the mechanic's lien claim of J. M. Fickling being left for the determination of the court in this action."

It is inconceivable that as between two contestants the lien could be both valid and invalid. It is equally impossible that an invalid claim of lien could stand "upon an absolute equality," with a valid lien. In the absence of any claim of fraud or mistake, the appellants by their stipulation are foreclosed of the right to question the validity of the lien.

[2, 3] Appellants also assert that the trial court committed error in striking out portions of the testimony of the witness Paul Hallingby. The witness was relating a conversation had in the presence of W. H. Prince, representing the Jackman Company, and A. Schneider, and among other things testified that "Mr. Prince said that he could give us the trust deed as security with Mr. Schneider's consent;" that "he said that it [the trust deed] was recorded before any work was done;" and that in response to a query concerning its priority to mechanics' liens Mr. Prince said "that was a point they were very particular about, because they had a sale arranged for this trust deed." Manifestly, appellants cannot complain because of the exclusion of the statements that the trust deed could be transferred with Schneider's consent, and that it was recorded before work was commenced, for the reason that these facts are conceded. The other statement stricken is in effect that the trust deed was senior to the mechanics' liens. It is purely a conclusion of law on the part of the speaker, and could not possibly have aided the court in its determination. The ruling was proper.

[4] We now turn to the most serious question in the case, whether, under the circumstances of this situation, the trust deed is prior to the mechanics' liens. We collect the rule from the cases of Savings & Loan Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 P. 922, Tapia v. Demartini, 77 Cal. 383, 19 P. 641, 11 Am. St. Rep. 288, Hall v. Glass, 123 Cal. 500, 56 P. 336, 69 Am. St. Rep. 77, Valley Lumber Co. v. Wright, 2 Cal. App. 291, 84 P. 59, Fuller & Co. v. McClure, 48 Cal. App. 185, 191 P. 1027, Harper Reynolds Co. v. Hammond Lumber Co., 51 Cal. App. 74, 196 P. 97, and San Francisco Lumber Co. v. Yates, 54 Cal. App. 109, 204 P. 423, that where the mortgagee in a mortgage recorded prior to the commencement of work on the building is by an enforceable obligation under the duty of advancing money or materials, the lien of the mortgage for the advances is prior to and superior to mechanics' liens subsequently accruing by reason of labor done or materials furnished; but that where, as in the case of Fuller & Co. v. McClure, supra, it is optional with the mortgagee named whether he makes the advances, the lien only attaches as of the date of the advancement—at least as against those incumbrances or liens of which he has notice. This result is reached by the law of contract, the promise to advance a definite amount furnishing the consideration for the lien of the mortgage in the one instance, and the advancement itself being the consideration in the other.

[5] The present case, however, instances a situation different from any to which our attention has been directed, in this, that while the beneficiary named was a third party—a stenographer in the employ of the contractor—yet for the purposes hereof it may be deemed (it is conceded) that the beneficiary was the contractor. While by contract there was an enforceable obligation on its part to erect the buildings, there is also included in the provision that it, the contractor, "will furnish all labor and materials necessary for the erection and completion of the buildings"—an obligation on its part to pay for all materials used and labor done in their erection. In the case of Callan v. Empire State Surety Co., 20 Cal. App. 483, 129 P. 978, 981, which was an action brought by the owner against the surety of the contractor to recover moneys paid out to discharge claims for labor and material after abandonment by the contractor, it was definitely determined that a similar clause in a building contract obligated the contractor, not merely to furnish, but to pay for the labor done and material furnished.

[6] Let us suppose, to give the situation greater clarity, that the contractor in this instance obligated itself to advance to the owner the sum of $10,000, and that it had failed, neglected, and refused to advance that or any other sum. Could the contractor or its assignee, who stands squarely in its shoes, urge that the trust deed was superior to the liens for labor and material? Yet that is the argument now advanced. To give the lien of the trust deed preference over the mechanics' liens would amount to preferring the contractor to the laborers and materialmen, contrary to the plain intent of section 1193 of the Code of Civil Procedure. By this section the Legislature has declared that the claims for work done and materials furnished shall have a preference over any claim of the contractor, who is primarily obligated therefor, and has said, in effect, that the contract price shall constitute a fund for their protection. It would be grossly inequitable to permit a contractor, through the device of a recorded incumbrance, to gain for himself an advantage over his creditors. And, of course, what he cannot gain for himself, he cannot gain for his assignee. Or to put it another way—and again upon the law of contract—the contractor, having failed to discharge the claims for labor and material in an amount in excess of the trust deed note, has failed in the consideration agreed to be furnished for the trust deed, and the mechanics' liens therefore must be held to be superior.

Judgment affirmed.

LA FRANCE v. KASHISHIAN et ux.* (Civ. 5064.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 25, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 24, 1927.

1. Landlord and tenant §130(2)—Lease which is silent as to guaranty of ownership carries implied warranty of title in lessor (Civ. Code, § 1927).

A lease which is silent as to guaranty of ownership of the leased premises by the lessor carries an implied warranty of the title in him and consequent quiet possession in lessee, in view of Civ. Code, § 1927.

2. Evidence §393(1)—Implied warranty in lease contract cannot be contradicted or varied by parol evidence (Civ. Code, § 1625; Code Civ. Proc. § 1856).

Under Civ. Code, § 1625, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, providing that where contract is written no evidence, except as contained within the contract, may be received, an implied warranty in a contract of lease may not be contradicted or varied by parol evidence, notwithstanding its terms are not set forth in the contract.

3. Evidence ⇨419(9)—Recital of consideration in lease held conclusive and parol evidence to prove other consideration held inadmissible, notwithstanding statute (Civ. Code, § 1625; Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, and § 1962, subd. 2).

Recital of consideration in a lease held conclusive and parol evidence to prove that lessee made agreement to take risk of paramount title in third party as part of the consideration was inadmissible, under Civ. Code, § 1625, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2, providing that presumption of truth of facts recited in written instrument, does not apply to recital of consideration.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨180(3)—Where bad faith was not in issue in lessee's action against lessor on implied warranty of title, parol evidence that lessee had taken risk of title held inadmissible (Civ. Code, §§ 3304, 3306).

In a lessee's action against his lessor for damages for eviction from the lease where bad faith of the lessor was not in issue, under Civ. Code, § 3306, providing for a different measure of damages in case of bad faith than ordinarily provided by section 3304 in case of breach of covenant of warranty, parol evidence that lessee had taken risk of title held inadmissible and improperly admitted, notwithstanding contention that it was admissible on damage issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by George La France against G. S. Kashishian and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

McWhinney & Clock, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Denio & Hart, of Long Beach, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. The salient facts herein appear to be that for a term of 10 years plaintiff leased and hired from defendant a certain piece of real property at a stated consideration of $25 per month for the first 7 years of the term, and $35 per month for the remaining 3 years thereof; that approximately 2 years and 10 months after the execution of the lease, plaintiff was evicted from the leased premises by one who had established paramount title to the property; and that thereupon, on account of damages ensuing from such eviction, plaintiff commenced an action against defendant which resulted in a judgment for defendant. It is from such judgment that the appeal herein is prosecuted.

On the trial of the action it was shown that defendant's claim of title to the leased property was by virtue of a tax title only, which fact was known to each of the parties to the lease prior to its execution, and that the defense interposed by defendant to the action in effect was that before the lease was signed by the parties thereto, a contemporaneous oral agreement was entered into between them, in substance, that in consideration of the low rental to be paid for the use of the property as specified in the lease, plaintiff would take the risk of paramount title being established in another person. The introduction of all evidence tending to show such oral negotiations between the parties, not included within the terms of the lease, was received over plaintiff's objection, and it is upon such claimed error of the court that appellant bases his argument for reversal of the judgment.

As is substantially declared in section 1625 of the Civil Code and section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the general rule is that where a contract between parties thereto has been reduced to writing, no evidence of terms of the agreement other than as contained within the contract as thus expressed may be received.

[1,2] The lease in question contained no express warranty of title in the lessor. The law, however, seems to be well established that a lease which is silent as to guaranty of ownership of the leased premises by the lessor nevertheless carries an implied warranty of the title in him, and consequent quiet possession in the lessee during the term specified in the lease. Section 1927, Civ. Code; McDowell v. Hyman, 117 Cal. 67, 76, 71, 48 P. 984; Agoure v. Lewis, 15 Cal. App. 71, 75, 76, 113 P. 882; Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, vol. 1, pp. 518, 540; 24 Cyc. 1057. Coupled with such principle of law, it is contended by respondent, as set forth in several authorities, that an implied covenant of warranty may be rebutted by parol evidence. See Miller v. Van Tassel, 24 Cal. 459, 465; Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179, 3 P. 625; 22 Corp. Jur. 1097, 1261. But the weight of authority, especially as bearing upon a matter such as is here presented, is to the effect that an implied stipulation in a contract is of as great force as though it were fully set forth therein, and such implied stipulation may no more be contradicted or varied by parol evidence than may be that which is clearly expressed.

In the case of Standard Box Co. v. Mutual Biscuit Co., 10 Cal. App. 746, 750, 103 P. 938, 939, among other things, the following appears as the language of the court:

"* * * It is a well-settled principle that that which is implied by law becomes as much a part of the contract as that which is therein written, and if the contract is clear and complete when aided by that which is imported into it by legal implication, it cannot be contradicted by parol in respect of that which is implied any more than in respect of that which is written. * * *

Also, in Peterson v. Chaix, 5 Cal. App. 525, 527, 90 P. 948, 954, it is said:

"* * * There is another principle to be observed, namely, that whatever the law implies from a contract in writing is as much a part of the contract as that which is therein expressed; and to the extent that the contract, with that which the law implies, is clear, definite and complete, it cannot be added to, varied or contradicted by extrinsic evidence. * * *

To the same effect, see California Drilling & Machinery Co. v. Crowder, 58 Cal. App. 529, 531, 533, 209 P. 68.

Supported by a long list of authorities, the rule is stated in 17 Cyc. 570, as follows:

"The legal effect of a written instrument, even though not apparent from the terms of the instrument itself but left to be implied by law, can no more be contradicted, explained, or controlled by parol or extrinsic evidence than if such effect had been expressed. * * *

We are therefore of the opinion that, so far as the questioned evidence had the effect of varying or contradicting the implied warranty of title of defendant in the leased premises, the contention of appellant should be sustained.

[3] But respondent suggests that the evidence to which appellant objects was admissible for the reason that it involved an element of consideration for the execution of the lease, and as such, came within the general exception to the rule which forbids any evidence which will have the effect of varying the terms of a written contract. Section 1625, Civ. Code; section 1856 and subd. 2 of § 1962, Code Civ. Proc. Subdivision 2 of section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows:

"The following presumptions, and no others, are deemed conclusive: * * *

"2. The truth of the facts recited from the recital in a written instrument between the parties thereto, or their successors in interest by a subsequent title; but this rule does not apply to the recital of a consideration."

The rule which respondent urges as being here applicable is aptly stated in Deaver v. Deaver, 137 N. C. 240, 243, 49 S. E. 113, 114, as follows:

"* * * Where the payment of the consideration is necessary to sustain the validity of the deed or the contract in question, the acknowledgment of payment is contractual in its nature and cannot be contradicted by parol proof, but where it is to be treated merely as a receipt for money it is only prima facie evidence of the payment, and the fact that there was no payment, or that the consideration was other than that expressed in the deed, may be shown by oral evidence. * * *

The difficulty with the situation, so far as the admissibility of the evidence in question is concerned, is that the consideration expressed in the lease constituted something more than a mere "receipt for money." According to the written stipulation of the parties, the payment of the rent became and was the complete measure of the burden to be assumed by the lessee during the term of the lease, and for which, by the implied covenant of the lessor, the lessee was guaranteed the quiet enjoyment and possession of the leased premises. Anything other than the payment of the rent, to be added to the responsibilities or the duties to be placed upon the shoulders of the lessee, was in effect a modification of the understanding of the parties to the lease as expressed in their written memorandum covering their agreement. The rule for which respondent contends goes to the vitals of the contract. The price to be paid by the lessee for the privilege of using the land of the lessor was of the greatest importance to the lessee. Whether the price (or consideration) was great or small, whether it consisted of the performance by the lessee of some specified labor, or of the assumption by the lessee of some particular duty or burden, was to him a matter of utmost concern. So far as the lessee, at least, was concerned, the specification of the consideration for the lease went to its very essence. If the written stipulation of the parties in that regard could be varied by the effect of their prior oral negotiations, no limit could be placed on the extent or number of changes which might be permitted. The matter of what consideration was to be paid or yielded by the lessee was thus an essential element of the contract itself, and as such was no more subject to modification by reason of precedent oral representations or promises of either party to the contract than was any other equally important stipulation thereof. The rule, as clearly expressed in 17 Cyc. 661, is approved in the case of Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 542, 166 P. 808, 811, where many authorities are cited. It is there said:

"* * * Where the statement in a written instrument as to the consideration is more than a mere statement of fact or acknowledgment of payment of a money consideration, and is of a contractual nature, as where the consideration consists of a specific and direct promise by one of the parties to do certain things, this part of the contract can no more be changed or modified by parol or extrinsic evidence than any other part, for the party has the right to make the consideration of his agreement of the essence of the contract, and when this is done the provision as to the consideration for the contract must stand upon the same plane as the other provisions of the contract with reference to conclusiveness and immunity from attack by parol or extrinsic evidence" (citing many cases).

It follows that on the ground of varying the consideration specified in the lease, the questioned evidence was inadmissible.

[4] But it is urged by respondent that in any event the evidence to which plaintiff objected on the trial of the action was properly admitted on the question of the amount of damages, if any, to which the plaintiff might be entitled.

In the main, it was plaintiff's contention that the measure of damages was the difference between the rental agreed to be paid and the rental value of the leased premises for the remainder of the term. On the other hand, the defendant contended that the rule which governed the measure of damages was that expressed in sections 3304 and 3306 of the Civil Code as follows:

"The detriment caused by the breach of a covenant of 'seisin,' of 'right to convey,' of 'warranty,' or of 'quiet enjoyment,' in a grant of an estate in real property, is deemed to be:

"1. The price paid to the grantor; or, if the breach is partial only, such proportion of the price as the value of the property affected by the breach bore at the time of the grant to the value of the whole property;

"2. Interest thereon for the time during which the grantee derived no benefit from the property, not exceeding five years;

"3. Any expenses properly incurred by the covenantee in defending his possession.

"The detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property, is deemed to be the price paid, and the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon; but adding thereto, in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach, and the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land."

The gist of respondent's contention is that by the provisions of sections 3304 and 3306 of the Civil Code the plaintiff would be entitled to nominal damages only, excepting that if he could show "bad faith" on the part of the lessor, the plaintiff would then become entitled to "the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach"; which in effect (in case of bad faith) would be practically the same damages which plaintiff claimed in any event.

In the absence of governing statute, each of the respective rules has its judicial adherents, with perhaps the weight of authority favoring that announced in 24 Cyc. 1136, as follows:

"The general rule is that the measure of the tenant's damages in case of eviction is the difference between the actual rental value of the demised premises, that is, the value of the use of the premises, and the rent reserved, estimated for the term of the lease, together with other damages naturally resulting from the breach."

Such a rule, however, can have no application in the face of a statute expressing a different measure of damages, such as is contained in the two sections to which reference has been had. Sections 3304 and 3306, Civ. Code.

In the case of Kline v. Guaranty Oil Co., 167 Cal. 476, 140 P. 1, it appeared that, without having title to the property, the defendant leased to the plaintiff certain land. In an action for damages arising from the breach of the covenant for quiet possession, it was held that under either the provisions of section 3304 or section 3306 of the Civil Code, because of the "bad faith" of the defendant, the damages recoverable by the plaintiff "would be those which would ordinarily and proximately follow from the breach of such a contract under the peculiar circumstances which were known to both parties."

It is said in McCormick v. Marcy, 165 Cal. 386, 389, 132 P. 449, 451, that:

"The Civil Code provides that the measure of damages for a breach of the covenant of warranty or of quiet enjoyment, in a grant of an estate in real property, is [stating the rule hereinbefore announced in section 3304 of the Civil Code]. This was also the rule of damages in this state before the enactment of the Code. McGary v. Hastings, 39 Cal. 369, 2 Am. Rep. 456."

It may therefore be said that, at most, the rule suggested by appellant to the effect that the measure of damages in an action of the character of that before the court is the difference between the rental agreed to be paid and the rental value of the leased premises for the remainder of the term, is correct only where "bad faith" on the part of the lessor is shown to have existed. The transcript of the record of the lower court discloses the fact that on the part of plaintiff no attempt was made to show "bad faith"; in fact, at the close of the case counsel for plaintiff made the statement that "there is no question about that." Nor did the complaint in the action present such an issue. Such being the situation, so far as plaintiff's case was concerned, no occasion existed on the part of defendant to rebut anything in the way of evidence to that effect. It results that on the score of "bad faith," the evidence introduced by defendant, and to which exception was taken by plaintiff, was inadmissible. That such evidence was directly responsible for the judgment which was rendered by the trial court is unquestioned.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed. It is so ordered.

KAHRIMAN v. FITZGERALD. (Civ. 5226.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 19, 1927.

Chattel mortgages ⚡89—Mortgage held void against third party where automobile remained without county where mortgaged over 30 days, though being repaired and thereafter returned (Civ. Code, § 2965).

Chattel mortgage on automobile held void as to attaching creditor where the automobile was taken from the county where the mortgage was executed to another county where the mortgage was never recorded and remained there for more than 30 consecutive days, though the automobile remained in latter county because of an accident necessitating repairs, and though the automobile was returned to the county where the mortgage was executed long before the attachment, under Civ. Code, § 2965, exempting personal property from operation of mortgage, except between parties, in certain cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action in replevin brought by A. K. Kahriman against E. F. Fitzgerald. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edward Schary, of Fresno, for appellant.

Roy Fitzpatrick, of Fresno, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This was an action in replevin to recover an automobile. Defendant, as constable, levied an attachment upon the automobile in a suit by a creditor. Plaintiff herein claims against the defendant and superior to the attaching creditor because of a chattel mortgage. Judgment was for defendant upon the ground that plaintiff's chattel mortgage was void. The evidence showed the mortgage was executed in Fresno county, and that thereafter the automobile was taken out of Fresno county and remained in Los Angeles county for more than 30 consecutive days. The mortgage was never recorded in Los Angeles county. The automobile afterwards was returned to Fresno county and remained there for about two years before taken in the attachment suit.

Appellant states that the judgment holding the mortgage void was based solely on Civil Code, § 2965, although respondent points out other reasons for the invalidity of the mortgage. Appellant contends that notwithstanding the provisions of that section the mortgage should not be held to be void because, first, the automobile remained in Los Angeles county by reason of repairs made necessary by an accident there and not by the deliberate intention of the possessor, and, second, because at the time of the attachment it had long since been returned to the county of the execution and recordation of the mortgage.

Both of these contentions are fully disposed of adversely to appellant by Hopper v. Keys, 152 Cal. 488, 92 P. 1017.

The judgment is affirmed.

Petition of MORGANSTERN. (Civ. 5485.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 15, 1927.

1. Attorney and client ⚡61—In proceeding for readmission by disbarred attorney, morals and mental attainments are to be regarded separately in deciding as to mental attainments.

Although in broad and general sense individual's morals, if bad, affect question of mental attainments, in proceeding by disbarred attorney to be reinstated morals and mental attainments should be regarded as separate and distinct as far as deciding on mental attainment is concerned.

2. Attorney and client ⚡61—In proceeding by disbarred attorney for reinstatement, evidence held to show sufficient mental attainment of petitioner.

In proceeding by disbarred attorney for reinstatement, evidence held to show that petitioner had sufficient mental attainment to be attorney.

3. Attorney and client ⚡61—Attorney, disbarred for acts involving high degree of moral turpitude, should be reinstated only on clear and convincing proof of reform.

Attorney, disbarred for acts involving high degree of moral turpitude, should be reinstated only on clear and convincing evidence amounting to overwhelming proof of reform, based on conduct sufficient time after disbarment to show such reform.

4. Attorney and client ⚡61—Eleven months' residence in state after disbarment held not sufficient time to prove reformation of gambling habits which caused improper acts resulting in disbarment.

In application by disbarred attorney to be reinstated, eleven months' residence in state after disbarment held not sufficient time to prove reformation of gambling habits which led to acts resulting in his disbarment.

Original application by Alfred J. Morganstern for reinstatement as an attorney at law. Application denied.

Curtis Hillyer, of San Francisco, and Alfred J. Morganstern, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Wirt Francis and Eugene Daney, Jr., both of San Diego, for respondent San Diego Bar Ass'n.

WORKS, P. J. Petitioner was admitted to the bar of California in 1889. He took up his residence in San Diego in 1908 and engaged in a lucrative law practice in that city from that time to the period of his disbarment. The judgment which thrust him from the profession was entered January 9, 1922, pursuant to an accusation which was filed September 6, 1921. The grounds of the accusation are stated in the opinion In re Morganstern, 61 Cal. App. 702, 215 P. 721, in which the judgment of disbarment was affirmed upon appeal.

Petitioner's application in the present proceeding was filed October 2, 1926. Thereafter, and following the filing of an answer to the petition by respondent San Diego Bar Association, the matter was sent to referees for the taking of evidence and for findings upon the questions whether petitioner is possessed of both the mental and moral qualifications entitling him to readmission to the bar. The referees took evidence, as directed, and have filed their findings. One of the findings is to the effect that there is such doubt as to petitioner's mental qualifications as to render necessary an examination to test them. To this finding one of the three referees entered his dissent. The written exception of petitioner to the finding has been interposed.

Upon the score of petitioner's mental qualifications we shall refer to the testimony, given before the referees, of several of those who were the associates of petitioner as fellow practitioners at the bar of San Diego before his disbarment. One of these said:

"I have not seen him in court this last year, but speaking to him and seeing him personally I see no difference in his mental attitude now and what it was when he was practicing law. * * * He is very acute; he is a good lawyer; he is a good trial lawyer. * * * [I believe] he has the ability to perform the duties of an attorney at law in an efficient and able manner. * * *

Another lawyer testified:

"Q. Have you had an opportunity to judge of his mental and legal attainments? A. Well, I have always regarded Mr. Morganstern as a very brilliant man, a man with a wonderful mind, and a man of some attainments, and as I said, I regard him as rather brilliant. * * * [U]nless he has deteriorated since he has been disbarred I regarded him as competent then, and I have no reason to change my opinion. * * * I have seen him and I have not seen any evidence of deterioration. * * * I say if he has abandoned [certain bad habits which will be referred to later in this opinion] he certainly has the ability; he is brilliant; he is learned; he is shrewd and competent in every way."

Another testified:

"Q. In your opinion, has he the ability and requisite degree of facility with which to enable him to practice law with credit? A. I should say, so far as his mental attainments and legal attainments are concerned, that he had; yes.

"Q. He has at the present time? A. Yes, sir."

Another lawyer said:

"Mr. Morganstern possesses a mentality that is considered by many unequaled at least in this city, and not surpassed by many men at the bar anywhere. * * * [H]e is so considered by the bar. * * *

"Q. And that is your opinion, too? A. From my own experience with him, from hearing him discuss cases, hearing him argue cases, my knowledge of his briefs, that is my opinion.

"Q. Have you talked with him or seen him * * * the past year? A. Oh, yes; naturally.

"Q. Have you seen any signs of mental deterioration? A. No. * * *

Yet another member of the bar said:

"I regard Mr. Morganstern as one of the very best attorneys I have ever known in my life, either here or where I practiced before, both as a consultationist, as a jury lawyer, or as a court lawyer. He has the finest legal memory of any lawyer I ever met and equalled only by one other lawyer I think that I have met. * * *

Finally, yet another lawyer testified:

"His legal qualifications I would say are the best.

"Q. How about his mental? A. Of the best."

[1] No evidence was offered in contradiction of these flattering testimonials. Further, at the oral argument before us in the present proceeding, the counsel for respondent Bar Association conceded petitioner's mental attributes and remarked that in his view the proceeding must turn upon the question of petitioner's moral qualifications. We can understand the finding of the majority of the referees only upon the theory that they viewed the question of petitioner's moral attributes as affecting his mental qualifications. In a broad and general sense, of course, the morals of an individual, if bad, will affect the question of his mental attainments, but in a proceeding like the present the two attributes are to be regarded as separate and distinct each from the other.

[2] We regard petitioner as one of those—following the language of the Supreme Court—"concerning whose grasp of the law there is no question." In re Stevens, 197 Cal. 408, 241 P. 88. The finding which expresses a doubt as to his mental qualifications cannot stand.

We turn now to the controlling branch of the proceeding. The referees all joined in a finding that petitioner "does not possess the moral qualifications required to be possessed by a person exercising the office of an attorney and counsellor at law." Petitioner takes written exception to the finding.

While petitioner was disbarred because of the commission of the certain specific acts charged in the accusation against him, it is practically conceded that his delinquencies were accountable to and arose from his inordinate passion for gambling. In this proceeding petitioner himself has frankly testified:

"Q. Reference has been made in cross-examination of some of these witnesses to your reputation here with regard to visiting the race track and gambling and issuing checks. A. All quite true. I know of nothing in the way of amusement that I am as fond of as a horse race. I know of nothing, that is I know of no man who has had a greater obsession for gambling than I did; no matter what my earnings were, at the end of the year I was in debt. I cannot remember a single year that I did not owe some bank money at the end of the year. * * * I want to say * * * that there never was an irregularity in my life, never an unhappiness in my life, that was not traceable directly to [gambling]. * * * I was on one occasion, and it was told of me around here with a good deal of gusto, I went to Tia Juana many years ago and lost a great deal of money playing faro bank. I had a dollar or two left and sat down and played a game called pangini where the stakes were five cents, and they tell me that I spent the remainder of the night playing that game after losing thousands of dollars. In other words, it was the passion of playing. * * *

In one place in his testimony petitioner said, with a context showing that he intended to apply the observation to himself:

"I don't know whether you understand from observation what is meant by a card drunkard."

We are to inquire here, then, not whether, since his disbarment, petitioner has refrained from the commission of acts similar to those which led to the judgment removing the ermine of the profession from him, but whether his passion for gambling has been put under foot. Upon this broad issue must the present proceeding be determined.

[3] Certain principles affecting the question before us, under the testimony developed before the referees, have been laid down in the decided cases. One who has been disbarred for acts involving a high degree of moral turpitude—and those committed by petitioner were of that character—"should not be reinstated in the ranks of the legal profession except upon the most clear and convincing, nay, we will say upon overwhelming, proof of reform," proof which we could with confidence lay before the world in justification of a judgment again installing him in the profession. In re Cate, 60 Cal. App. 279, 212 P. 694. When an attorney has been disbarred, his readmission to the profession "should only come when he has lived long enough after his disbarment in honorable intercourse with his fellow citizens to demonstrate that he is both tried and true." In re Shepard, 35 Cal. App. 492, 170 P. 442.

[4] The element of time necessarily is to be considered in determining whether evidence of reform is sufficient to entitle an applicant to readmission under the language of the first of these quotations, and it is specifically contemplated by the language of the second. It is to this element of time that we now propose to address ourselves.

Petitioner's application for readmission was filed a little less than four years and nine months after the judgment of disbarment which was pronounced against him. Soon after the judgment was rendered he went to Europe, after consultation with certain officers of the United States government at Washington, upon a mission to European governments, which was highly creditable to him and which brought him in touch with prominent officials of foreign countries. After spending some considerable time abroad, he returned to the eastern part of the United States, and, after conferences there, again went to Europe. He did not return to California until eleven months before the filing of his petition for readmission to the bar. These circumstances, to our minds, exert a controlling influence over the disposition of petitioner's application. He testified before the referees, it is true, that he has overcome his passion for gambling, and he pledged himself in the most solemn manner never to engage in the practice again. We are not under the slightest impulsion to discredit his asseverations in these respects. On the other hand, we yield to them full credit. As far as we may judge from the typewritten page, his attitude is marked by the highest degree of sincerity, his mind is colored by the healthful influence of a high resolve. He undoubtedly believes that his reform is permanent. If his rights alone were involved, we should not hesitate to order his readmission. We confess a feeling of deep sympathy for this mind which has emerged from turmoil into a sense of triumph. The promptings of charity forbid us wantonly to utter a word which may change this feeling to one of discouragement or despair. The public interest in the issue of this proceeding, however, is paramount to every consideration looking alone to the fate of petitioner. Under all the circumstances shown by the record, we cannot yet confide in a conclusion that petitioner's reform is complete and final, and it would be unfair to the public interest to order a readmission except upon a feeling, bordering upon conviction, that he has forever put under foot the temptations of the past.

The shortness of petitioner's actual residence in California since his disbarment materially affects the conclusion which we shall reach. He has not been long enough in the state—the scene of his old temptations—to satisfy us that he has finally risen above the old practices and to make us join in the feeling of confidence which so thoroughly imbues him. He has not been here long enough to prove himself among those to whom, as the record shows, extreme publicity of his former habits was given—those who with diligence and sometimes with venom will be scrutinizing his every act. For these reasons, and for these alone, we think the finding of the referees as to lack of moral qualifications must be upheld.

The finding of the referee which expresses a doubt as to petitioner's mental qualifications is set aside. The finding that he lacks moral qualifications is adopted as the finding of the court. The petition for readmission to the bar is denied.

DICKY v. KUHN et ux. (Civ. 5824; S. F. 11599.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 9, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 7, 1927.

1. Judgment $\Rightarrow$ 720—Judgment, in suit to cancel note for fraud and want of consideration, conclusively determined those issues.

Judgment in suit to cancel note, given as part of purchase price for restaurant, because of fraud and want of consideration because seller failed to procure landlord's consent to assignment of lease, conclusively determined issues of fraud and want of consideration, and in later suit on note evidence regarding assignment of lease should not have been admitted.

2. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 345—Where lease was to be assigned only upon payment of note, tender of lease was unnecessary before suit on note.

Court having found in previous suit to cancel note that lease covering premises of restaurant, for which note was given, was to be assigned only upon payment of note, it was unnecessary for seller of restaurant to tender assignment of lease before commencing action on note.

3. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 345—Assignment of lease of premises, on which restaurant sold was located, before suing on note for restaurant was excused by buyer's abandoning premises (Civ. Code, § 1511).

If tender by seller of restaurant of premises, on which restaurant was located, was necessary before commencing suit on note for purchase price of restaurant, such tender was excused by action of buyer of restaurant in abandoning premises, under Civ. Code, § 1511.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by John Dickey against A. Kuhn and wife upon a promissory note. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Clarence De Lancey, of San Francisco, and Ramsey Probasco, of Oakland, for appellants.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued upon a promissory note in the sum of $3,500. The cause was tried before a jury and resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendants. From the judgment following the verdict the plaintiff has appealed upon a typewritten record.

The litigation arises out of a written contract, executed July 31, 1922, wherein the plaintiff sold to the defendants a restaurant located in the city of Berkeley for the agreed purchase price of $5,000. Pursuant to the contract the defendants paid the plaintiff $500 in cash and executed and delivered to the plaintiff three promissory notes, one for $500 payable August 10, 1922, one for $500 payable August 30, 1922, and one for $3,500 payable January 31, 1923. Respondents took possession of the restaurant on July 31, 1922, and paid the first promissory note within a few days after it became due. Prior to the due date of the second promissory note the defendants in this action commenced a suit in the superior court to rescind the contract of sale upon the grounds of fraud and misrepresentation. In the complaint filed in that action the contract of sale was pleaded in full and several charges of fraud were alleged, among which was the failure of the seller to procure the landlord's consent to an assignment of the lease of the premises in which the restaurant was operated. In this connection the complaint alleged that:

"Defendant has not produced any lease for the said premises, and plaintiffs are informed and believe, and upon such information and belief, state the facts to be, that the defendant cannot give them such lease as aforesaid."

It was also alleged in the complaint in the former action that, in addition to the moneys paid on account of the contract, the purchasers had given one promissory note in the sum of $500 then due, and one for the sum of $3,500 due January 31, 1923. Damages were claimed in the sum of $5,400, "which said sum will be reduced by the amount of $4,000 whenever the defendant gives up to be canceled the said notes." The prayer of the complaint in that action was that the defendant be required to give up these notes for cancellation or that the plaintiffs have a proper judgment to relieve them against all liability of the notes, and that the defendant be required to pay to the plaintiffs the moneys theretofore paid out by them.

In answer to the complaint in that action the defendant denied all the allegations of fraud, and specifically alleged that the lease to the premises was agreed to be transferred to the plaintiffs only upon the payment in full of the purchase price of the business and that the failure of the plaintiffs to pay the purchase price of the business was the reason for the failure of the defendant to transfer the lease. By way of cross-complaint the defendant in that action then pleaded the promissory note for $500 which was then due and demanded affirmative relief to that extent. In answer to this cross-complaint, the plaintiffs in that action alleged that the note sued upon was void for want of consideration, and that it "is one of the notes, the cancellation of which is in issue in this action."

Upon the trial in the action for rescission, judgment went in favor of the defendant, who is the plaintiff and appellant herein, on findings adverse to the plaintiffs on all their charges of fraud and misrepresentations. Judgment was also given the defendant therein on his cross-complaint for the promissory note of $500. In reference to the defendant's failure to transfer the lease, the trial court found:

"That it is true that said lease to said property was to be transferred to plaintiffs only upon the payment in full of the purchase price of said business; that said purchase price has not been paid in full; that said lease has not been transferred to the plaintiff."

On the issue of damages the trial court found that it was not true that the plaintiffs had been damaged in the sum of $5,400, or any other sum whatsoever, but "that said equipment, utensils, and property comprising the said restaurant was of the reasonable value of $5,000."

The plaintiffs in the former action perfected their appeal from the judgment as entered, and pending said appeal the note for $3,500 fell due and this action was instituted by the plaintiff herein for its collection. To the complaint filed herein the defendants pleaded the same charges of fraud which had been litigated in the former action and also alleged that:

"The validity of the said note is involved in this court in cause No. 70390, which said cause of action is now on appeal to the appellate court of the state of California."

On November 26, 1922, and prior to the decision in the superior court in the original suit for rescission, the purchasers under the contract (the plaintiffs in that action) abandoned the premises without a notification to the defendant therein. On February 8, 1923, the judgment denying relief to the purchasers was entered, and this judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal on March 18, 1924 (66 Cal. App. 227, 225 P. 867). Upon the return of the remittitur the appellants in that action, having delayed prosecuting this action upon the promissory note on the ground that the same note was involved in the action on appeal, filed an amended answer setting up the failure of the seller to procure the written consent of the landlord to the transfer and assignment to the purchasers of the lease to the premises wherein the restaurant was conducted, and also alleged that because of a controversy between the landlord and the seller it had become impossible for the latter to procure the landlord's consent to such a transfer. For this reason it was claimed that the consideration for the note in suit had failed.

Upon the issue so framed the cause went to trial before the court sitting with a jury. The plaintiff made proof of the note in suit and rested. The defendants thereupon sought to establish their allegations of fraud and want of consideration, and particularly the failure of the plaintiff to procure the written consent of the landlord to the assignment of the lease. Objection was made to this testimony upon the ground that it was a matter adjudicated in the prior action. The trial judge held that nothing had been decided in the former case regarding the note in suit, and overruled the objection. Thereupon evidence was received over the objection of the plaintiff, which went to show that at some time after the defendants had taken possession of the premises the plaintiff had had a controversy with the landlord over the matter of the assignment of the lease, and that the landlord had declined to consent to the assignment until the plaintiff satisfied a claim which the landlord made against him, amounting to approximately $100.

Throughout the trial, and on this appeal, the plaintiff and appellant herein insisted that the trial of this issue was merely a retrial of the issue presented in the former action, based upon some new evidence showing this controversy between the landlord and the appellant. It is pointed out that the action for rescission was based upon fraud and want of consideration, and that the $3,500 note, as well as the whole purchase price, was definitely put in issue in that action: that the question of consideration was found adversely to the purchaser; that this appellant was given judgment in the former action under his cross-complaint upon the $500 note which was identical with the one here in suit, except as to amount, and which was put in issue by the purchasers in the same way; that in the former action it was found that the seller was under no obligation to transfer the lease until the full purchase price had been paid.

In Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 175, 177, 68 P. 597, the Supreme Court, in discussing the application of the rule of res adjudicata, said:

"It is not the policy of the law to allow a new and different suit between the same parties, concerning the same subject-matter, that has already been litigated; neither will the law allow the parties to trifle with the courts by piecemeal litigation."

In Quirk v. Rooney, 130 Cal. 505, 510, 62 P. 825, 827, it is said:

"But the plaintiff had her day in court, her case was tried upon the evidence she then had, and a final judgment reached. If a new action could be commenced, and a case retried, because of the discovery of new facts, after the case had been finally disposed of, there would be no end of litigation, and a case could be kept in court forever."

We find the rule aptly stated in 23 Cyc. 1215, as follows:

"A fact or question which was actually and directly in issue in a former suit, and was there judicially passed upon and determined by a domestic court of competent jurisdiction, is conclusively settled by the judgment therein, so far as concerns the parties to that action and persons in privity with them, and cannot again be litigated in any future action between such parties or privies, in the same court, or in any other court of concurrent jurisdiction, upon the same or a different cause of action."

This whole subject has been recently considered by our Supreme Court in Price et al. v. Sixth District Agricultural Ass'n, 258 P. 387, and nothing is to be gained by reiterating the rules of law stated in that opinion.

[1] Here the validity of the $3,500 note was definitely put in issue in the former action where it was specifically pleaded that, after having been issued through fraud and as a part of the purchase price of the restaurant, the consideration for it had failed. This allegation was followed with a prayer that this particular note be followed up and canceled, and that the plaintiffs therein have judgment protecting them from any liability upon this note. The judgment adverse to the plaintiffs on that issue having become final, it conclusively determined both the issue of fraud and of want of consideration. The finding in the former action that the lease was not to be assigned until the full purchase price had been paid precluded any testimony in the second trial tending to show that this assignment should have been made at a different time or that because of a controversy with the landlord the appellant might have had some difficulty in procuring the assignment if the respondents had elected to stand by the contract and satisfy the note on its due date.

[2, 3] It is argued that, notwithstanding the manifest error in retrying before this jury the issues adjudicated in the former action, the judgment should be sustained because the respondents offered a good defense in the showing that the appellant had failed to tender an assignment of the lease before commencing this action on the note. The obvious answer is that, the court having found in the former action that the property sold, exclusive of the lease, was of the value of $5,000 and that the lease was to be assigned only upon the payment of this note, the tender should have come from the respondents rather than from the appellant. Furthermore, if any tender by appellant were necessary, it was excused by the action of the respondents in abandoning the premises—an action which at least made a tender fruitless, if it did not wholly put it out of the power of the appellant to secure the landlord's consent to an assignment of the lease. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 569, 217 P. 750; Hoppin v. Munsey, 185 Cal. 678, 685, 198 P. 398; Civ. Code, § 1511.

Other errors are assigned by the appellant, but because of the foregoing views the judgment must be reversed, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to discuss them.

Judgment reversed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing herein in this court is denied. We, however, withhold our approval from that portion of the decision of the appellate tribunal wherein it seems to have been held that the judgment in the former action was res adjudicata as to whether the defendant in the action would have had the right to show that upon the due date of the note sued upon herein he had offered or was prepared to pay the same, but that the plaintiff was then unable to procure the assent of the original landlord to a transfer of the lease, and that for that reason the consideration of said note had failed. Having, however, abandoned the premises prior to the due date of said note, and having never offered to pay the same upon the above conditions, he was no longer entitled to defend against its payment upon that ground.

ASSOCIATED CREDIT EXCHANGE OF SAN FRANCISCO v. BARNETT, Justice of the Peace. (Civ. 5881.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. Aug. 26, 1927.

1. Certiorari ☞9—Granting certiorari rests within court's discretion.

Certiorari is not a writ of right, the granting or refusing of it being discretionary with the court.

2. Certiorari ☞6—Certiorari will not issue where right of appeal existed, though lost by delay.

Where the right of appeal existed, certiorari will not issue whether the writ be applied for prior to or after the expiration of the time limited by law for such appeal.

3. Justices of the peace ☞194(2)—Where there was right of appeal from justice's court to superior court, certiorari would be denied (Code Cr. Proc. §§ 859, 974, 975, 980, 1068).

Where petitioner for certiorari, claiming that justice's court violated limitation statute (Code Cr. Proc. § 859) in setting aside default judgment, had right of appeal to superior court, under sections 974, 975, and superior court had power to vacate judgment, under section 980, writ would be denied, in view of section 1068, providing that a writ of review may be granted when "there is no appeal."

Application for certiorari by the Associated Credit Exchange of San Francisco to annul an order of A. T. Barnett, Justice of the Peace of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, setting aside a default judgment. Writ denied.

F. H. Ainsworth, Jr., of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Jacob S. Meyer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. A proceeding in certiorari has been instituted herein for the purpose of reviewing and having annulled an order made by respondent, as justice of the peace, setting aside a default judgment, the ground of the application being that the motion pursuant to which said order was made was not presented within the limitation of time fixed by statute.

The facts are as follows: Petitioner brought an action in the justice's court in claim and delivery to recover possession of a sewing machine or its alleged value, $122. Although personally served with summons, the defendants failed to appear and on April 12, 1927, judgment by default was entered against them in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. On the following day the clerk of said court mailed to the defendants a notice of the entry of judgment, addressed to them at their San Francisco address. On the ninth day thereafter, and on April 22d, said defendants served and filed a notice of motion, supported by affidavit, that on April 25th, twelve days after the mailing of the notice of the entry of judgment, they would move said court to set aside the default judgment, one of the grounds urged in support of the motion being that defendants held a receipt in full for the debt sued upon. In accordance with said notice of motion said justice fixed April 25th as the time for hearing said motion, and on May 2d granted the same. Subsequently, and on May 9th, the action was tried on the merits, petitioner participating in the trial by producing witnesses in support of its case, the substance of whose testimony was, as the petition herein alleges, that the receipt held by defendants "was given in error, and that said defendants were erroneously credited with the payment on their account which should have been credited on the account of a third party, and that said defendants were still indebted to said company in the sum of $25." The trial resulted in the entry of a judgment for the defendants, and on May 12th the present proceeding was commenced.

Petitioner contends that section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure, from which justice's courts derive power to act in default matters, requires not only that a notice of motion to set aside a default judgment be given within ten days after notice of the entry of judgment, but that the motion itself must be presented within the same limitation of time, and that since the motion in the present case was not presented within the period of time mentioned, the justice's court was without legal authority to grant the same.

Section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"A writ of review may be granted by any court, except a police or justices' court, when an inferior tribunal, * * * exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, * * * and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy."

As stated in California Jurisprudence (vol. 4, p. 1054), the provision of the section quoted "is not limited to the case where no appeal lies to the court petitioned for certiorari, but applies where no appeal lies to a court of common law jurisdiction, which can itself in a proper case issue the writ. Consequently, the latter will not be granted by the Supreme Court or the District Court of Appeal to review the judgment of a court of limited jurisdiction where the right of appeal to the superior court exists."

[1,2] In other words, certiorari is not a writ of right, the granting or refusing to issue it resting in the discretion of the court; and it will not be issued where the matter sought to be reviewed can be heard and determined on appeal (Olcese v. Justice's Court of the First Judicial Tp. of Contra Costa County, 156 Cal. 82, 103 P. 317); furthermore, it is immaterial whether the writ be applied for prior to or after the expiration of the time limited by law for such appeal, the controlling question being whether the right of appeal exists, and not whether advantage has been taken thereof (Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Superior Court of Yolo County, 22 Cal. App. 770, 136 P. 538; Maidenberg v. Justice's Court, of Los Angeles Tp., 32 Cal. App. 686, 163 P. 872; McCue v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 545, 12 P. 615).

[3] As shown by the facts hereinabove set forth, petitioner proceeded to trial on the merits in the justice's court after the order now claimed to be void was granted, by adducing evidence in support of its complaint, with the result that an adverse judgment was obtained. Therefore sections 974 and 975 of the Code of Civil Procedure afforded petitioner a remedy by appeal from that judgment to the superior court on questions of law, which, if invoked, would have subjected to review "all orders affecting the judgment appealed from," the order setting aside the judgment by default being necessarily included therein; and the superior court would have been given power, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, to annul the latter order and to vacate the judgment appealed from, without granting a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 980. Assuming, therefore, as petitioner contends, that the justice's court was without legal authority to grant the order complained of because of the failure to present the motion therefor within the limitation of time fixed by said section 859 (Simon v. Justice's Court, 127 Cal. 45, 59 P. 296; Storey v. Mueller, 21 Cal. App. 301, 131 P. 763; Roberts v. Justice's Court of Los Angeles Tp., 29 Cal. App. 768, 157 P. 511), no valid reason appears why the matter now sought to be reviewed on certiorari should not have been presented, heard, and determined on appeal to the superior court; consequently, under the decision in Olcese v. Justice's Court, supra, the writ should be denied. It is so ordered.

OHSAKI et al. v. AHERN. (Civ. 5814.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 22, 1927.

Landlord and tenant §213(5)—Lessees having no time to plant rice crop because of foreclosure sale held entitled to recover rent paid.

Where leased land was sold under foreclosure proceedings, lessees losing possession before they had time to plant crop for first cropping season under lease held entitled to recover entire amount of advance rent paid, as against contention of lessor that their recovery was limited to value of lease as whole which was claimed to be less than rent reserved, regardless of whether lessees' action be regarded as one to recover fruits of rescission or to recover rent paid in advance.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Kansaburo Ohsaki and another against W. J. Ahern to recover money paid under a lease. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Crofton & Wetmore, of Marysville, and Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., of San Francisco, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of $6,000 upon the ground that the court applied the wrong measure of damages.

Defendant leased to plaintiffs a tract of rice land in Sutter county for the term of three cropping seasons. Plaintiffs paid $6,000 rent in advance, which was, as the lease stated, the rent for all the first year and part of the second. Owing to defendant's failure to pay, when due, a deed of trust which he had previously executed, the land was sold under foreclosure proceedings. The purchaser, as the new owner, asserted his rights superior to the rights of plaintiffs under their lease, and plaintiffs thereupon surrendered to him. The lease was executed

November 16, 1920. The deed of trust fell due January 1, 1921, and title passed out of defendant by foreclosure May 7, 1921. The plaintiffs therefore obtained no benefit whatever from the lease, as they did not have time to plant a crop for the first cropping season. The plaintiffs served on defendant proper notice of rescission of the lease and demanded back the $6,000 upon the ground of failure of consideration. Judgment was for plaintiffs upon this theory.

It is the claim of defendant that the court should have applied what he claims to be the correct and only measure of damage for eviction; i. e., the difference between the rent reserved and the value of the use and occupation. He claims he had the best of the bargain, that the rent reserved was much greater than the value of the use and occupation, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs cannot recover the full amount paid, but only the value of their lease as a whole, having regard to the claim that the agreed rent was more than the use of the land was worth. If defendant wanted to keep the benefit of his bargain, he should have performed his part of it. His argument takes no account of the fact that the rent was paid in advance for a part of the term not enjoyed. Plaintiffs were awarded no damages for the violation of their contract right to occupy the land in exchange for the agreed rent. Defendant gave to plaintiffs no enjoyment of the leasehold and is not entitled to keep the rent paid in advance for it any more than he could recover unpaid rent for a period after eviction. Mallette v. Hillyard, 117 Ga. 423, 43 S. E. 779; Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, §§ 334, 697, and 698.

Whether this be an action to recover the fruits of a rescission for an entire failure of consideration or an action to recover rent paid in advance for a period of leasehold subsequent to an eviction, the judgment for the amount paid in advance by the plaintiffs is correct.

Judgment affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 19, 1927.

I. Sales §359(1)—Evidence held to support finding that consideration for note had not failed.

In action on note given for interest in lease and garage equipment, defended on ground of failure of consideration through failure of payee, who leased from makers of note, to pay rent for premises during term of lease and to keep garage open day and night, as agreed, evidence that lease was of greater value than when it and tools and equipment were purchased by defendants held to support trial court's finding that consideration for note had not failed.

- 5. Bills and notes ⚡525—Evidence held to sustain finding that agreement to keep garage open was not part of transaction in which note was given, so as to put indorsee of note on notice thereof.

In indorsee's action on note, defended on ground of failure of consideration, evidence held to support finding that agreement by payee to keep garage open day and night was not contemporaneous with note and part of same transaction, so as to put indorsee on notice thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul Burks, Judge.

Action by the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles against Clara B. Ziegler and husband. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Francis D. Adams and Earl Curtis Peck, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Lawler & Degnan and M. Felix, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought by plaintiff to recover from defendants $11,500, together with interest and attorney's fees, alleged to be due and owing on a certain promissory note, and assigned to Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank by F. C. Trickey, the payee named in the note, which assignment is alleged to have been made before maturity and in the usual course of business. The complaint is in the usual form of an action on a promissory note. The answer denies that the note was assigned before maturity in the usual course of business, and alleges that the note has been fully satisfied and discharged; and as a further and separate answer and defense, the defendants allege that by reason of the failure of F. C. Trickey, the payee in the note, to pay the rent for certain garage premises according to the terms of his lease, and his failure to keep the garage open day and night as a first-class garage, such lease and leasehold have been abandoned, and the consideration for the note for $11,500 has wholly failed.

The defendants, as owners, on or about December 1, 1921, leased to one Homer A. Brunell certain real property for a period of approximately 9 years at a rental running from $160 per month to $210 per month for the last 5 years of the lease, upon which property Brunell conducted a garage; the lease by its terms was assignable, without the necessity of the owner's consent. Thereafter, on or about December 6, 1921, the lease, together with the machinery and equipment contained in the garage, were acquired by F. C. Trickey; on December 23, 1921, F. C. Trickey sold to defendant George J. Ziegler his interest in the Brunell lease, together with the equipment, for a consideration of $11,500, the transaction being consummated by defendants George J. Ziegler and Clara B. Ziegler, his wife, and F. C. Trickey in the following manner: George J. Ziegler, Clara B. Ziegler, and F. C. Trickey, on December 23, 1921, went to the plaintiff bank; there Mr. Lemmon, an officer of the bank, at their request made out a promissory note in the sum of $11,500, payable to F. C. Trickey on or before one year after date, without interest, which was signed by the defendants George J. Ziegler and Clara B. Ziegler, and delivered to F. C. Trickey, who thereupon indorsed the note and placed it with the plaintiff bank for collection, and as collateral security for such note there was left with the bank an assignment of the Brunell lease and a bill of sale of the equipment of the garage, to be delivered to the Zieglers upon payment of the note. Immediately thereafter defendants, for a rental of $300 per month, leased the garage premises and the equipment therein contained to Trickey for the period of one year.

The day following the execution and delivery of the note and consummation of the transaction at the bank, according to the testimony of Trickey, he (Trickey) went to Ziegler's place of business, and there signed a brief agreement to keep the garage open day and night for the period of one year, for which period he had leased the premises from the Zieglers. According to the findings of the trial court, and which find support in the evidence, it was never the intention of the parties that this agreement should in any way be connected with the payment of the $11,500 promissory note. Prior to December 23, 1921, F. C. Trickey had borrowed from the plaintiff bank $5,000 for the purpose of acquiring the Brunell lease on the garage premises and the garage equipment. On January 26, 1922, Trickey assigned and transferred the Ziegler note, then being held for collection, to the plaintiff bank as security for his indebtedness to the bank, which at that time had been reduced to the sum of $4,000, and afterwards, on February 3, 1922, reduced to $3,000, and at the time of the trial of this action this amount was wholly unpaid. This note for $11,500 executed by defendants is the note sued on here.

Appellant urges as grounds for reversal of the judgment the following assignments: (1) That the finding that the note was indorsed to plaintiff before maturity and without notice of defendants' defense against the payee is not supported by the evidence; (2) that the uncontradicted evidence shows defendants have a defense as against the payee of said note; (3) that the breach of the terms of Defendants' Exhibit A (agreement to keep the business open day and night) on the part of the payee is a defense to the note as against plaintiff; (4) that the evidence shows that it was the intent of the maker and payee of said note that said note was evidence of payment to be made by defendants only in the event payee performed the terms of the contemporaneous agreement and was not intended to be negotiable; (5) that plaintiff should not recover more than the amount unpaid on the Trickey note.

[1] Appellants' defense as against Trickey, the payee, as gleaned from their answer, is that, as a result of Trickey's alleged breach of the agreement to keep the garage open day and night and his failure to pay rent under his one-year lease, the consideration for the promissory note sued upon has wholly failed, and the property described in the bill of sale and the lease have become valueless. The court on this issue specially found:

"It is not true that the consideration for said note for $11,500 has wholly, or at all failed; nor is it true that the property or lease described in said bill of sale have become valueless. On the contrary, the court finds that the fair rental value of said premises on December 22, 1921, was at least $200 a month, and at the date of the trial was at least $400 a month; that the rental paid under the Brunell lease was substantially less than the amounts aforesaid; that one of the purposes of the sale of said lease, garage business, and equipment was the acquisition by the Zieglers of the Brunell lease and the attendant right of leasing the premises for a rental in excess of the rental therein provided for; that, after such acquisition by the sale aforesaid, said Zieglers did rent the premises to one Lamb for a period of five years at a rental in excess of the amount required to be paid for the like period under the Brunell lease. There was no testimony offered by defendants that the tools or equipment constituting a part of the subject-matter of the sale by Trickey to Ziegler, was of no value; hence the court finds that the allegation to that effect is not true."

Appellant has not directed our attention to any testimony, nor have we found any in the record, as to the value, or lack of value, of the tools or equipment. As to the finding that the consideration for the note has not wholly or at all failed—that the lease is of greater value than it was when the lease and tools and equipment were purchased by appellants from Trickey, there is ample evidence in the record to support such finding. The witness W. W. Scott, a real estate broker who had been engaged in the business of rentals, leases, and general real estate in Los Angeles since 1911, testified that the garage ought to be worth around $400 or $450 a month, and that the rental value would be four times what it was in 1921, and the property was leased on October 24, 1922, during the one-year term of the Trickey lease, by Mrs. Ziegler to Mr. Lamb for a term of five years at the rental of $150 a month for the first 18 months, then $200 a month for the next 18 months, and $225 a month for the remaining 24 months of the term.

[2] As to the payment of the rent under the lease, the evidence shows that Trickey, when he took possession under the lease made to him, at the time he sold the Brunell lease to the Zieglers, paid two months' rent of the one-year term in advance, which payments were credited on the first and last months, and that on January 10, 1922, within a month from the execution of the lease, Trickey, as alleged in defendants' answer, entered into an agreement in writing with one C. T. Mosley, whereby Mosley was substituted in place of Trickey as lessee in the lease and agreed to carry out its terms, and to give a bond in the sum of $2,000 for the faithful performance of the agreement and the return of all property in good condition, and it is further alleged in defendants' answer that the defendants "do hereby agree to the within agreement and do hereby accept the said C. T. Mosley as tenant of the said premises for the term of the said lease expiring January, 1923." It is true that Mr. Lemmon testified that he was sure he read Exhibit A, the agreement to keep the garage open day and night, dated January 1, 1922, when it was left at the bank; that he recalled several sheets were left unfastened and he fastened them together, but that he knew nothing about the transaction between Mr. Ziegler and Mr. Trickey; and Victor H. Rosetti, an officer of the bank, testified that he saw Exhibit A on January 26, 1922, but that was subsequent to the date defendants accepted Mosley in place of Trickey. Whatever obligation Trickey was under regarding the terms of his one-year lease naturally ceased on January 10, 1922, when the Zieglers accepted Mosley as tenant in place of Trickey.

It is difficult to understand, under such state of facts, what credit or offset, if any, defendants have against the note, even as against Trickey, the payee, and we cannot agree with appellant that the uncontradicted evidence shows that defendants have a defense to the note as against the payee.

[3, 4] We do not disagree with appellants' statement of the law that "one who holds a note, invalid in the hands of the payee, as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, can recover from the maker only the amount of the indebtedness due by the payee"; but where a negotiable note is transferred in good faith, for value, before maturity, the holder is not subject to any counterclaim or offset existing against any prior party. This is the rule of the Code, as well as of the law merchant, and no provision of the Code in regard to set-offs and counterclaims affects the negotiability of commercial paper or the right of such bona fide transferees. 19 Cal. Juris. 1013, § 162, and cases cited.

[5] This principle is not disputed by appellants, their claim being that the evidence shows that Exhibit A, containing the agreement on the part of the payee to keep the garage open day and night, was contemporaneous to the note, a part of the same transaction, was deposited contemporaneously with the note, and is sufficient knowledge to put respondent on notice of the terms of the lease, Exhibit B. The court found:

"It is not true that at the time of said sale, or as part of the agreement thereof, it was agreed and understood between the defendant George J. Ziegler and F. C. Trickey that for one year subsequent to December 23, 1921, or for any other period, said F. C. Trickey would cause said garage business to be conducted in a first-class manner, or that he would keep said garage open during said or any period, day and night," and that "it is not true that said lease was executed or delivered to induce the execution or delivery of said promissory note of $11,500, or the possession of the property aforesaid, by said George J. Ziegler, and it is not true that such lease constituted any part of the sale heretofore found."

If there is substantial evidence to support these findings, the judgment must be affirmed, and reference to the remaining points urged by appellants is rendered unnecessary. According to the testimony of the witness F. C. Trickey, the defendants and himself went to the bank and were referred to Mr. Lemmon; that he told Mr. Lemmon that he had sold a certain garage and a nine-year lease to Mr. and Mrs. Ziegler for $11,500, and that they were going to give him their note for the amount due in one year; that he told Mr. Lemmon that he owed the bank some money, and wanted to leave the note with the bank in escrow until the note is paid as collateral to his note. Mr. Lemmon said, "You don't mean escrow; you mean for collection," and Trickey said, "Yes, that is what I mean; I want to leave it for collection." "They [referring to the Zieglers] are going to leave the bill of sale to the garage and this nine-year lease as collateral to this note until it is paid." Trickey had the nine-year lease and bill of sale with him at the time. Mr. Lemmon wrote the note, and, when he came to the place where they write in the collateral, Trickey showed him these papers. Mr. and Mrs. Ziegler signed the note, and Mr. Lemmon put a stamp indorsement on the back of the note, and Trickey signed his name under it. Mr. Lemmon then gave Trickey a receipt for the note. Nothing was said to any one at the bank regarding the details of the sale. Mr. and Mrs. Ziegler were present at the bank window all the time. The bill of sale did not have appended to it a list of the garage equipment, and Trickey gave Mrs. Ziegler the bill of sale he received from Brunell, and she took it home to copy the list of the equipment, and the next day, December 24th, Trickey went to the Zieglers' place of business and there signed an agreement to keep the garage open day and night, and Mrs. Ziegler had made the copies of the garage equipment, and Mrs. Ziegler, Trickey, and Mr. Stone, driving the car, went to the bank and delivered a copy of the equipment of the garage to Mr. Lemmon, which was attached to the bill of sale.

After they left Mr. Lemmon's window, the day the note was signed, they went to a little round table in the bank and executed the one-year lease to Trickey. Mr. Ziegler said:

"I am glad to get that lease back [Brunell lease]. We were tied up in a bad lease there; and I expect to pay that off [Trickey note] in about 30 days; I have got a deal pending where I expect to get the money."

The facts testified to by Trickey as occurring at the bank window are in the main corroborated by Lemmon, and who testified that he knew nothing about the transaction between Ziegler and Trickey, other than that related as occurring at his window at the bank; that he did not learn of them at any time thereafter prior to the institution of the suit by Mr. Ziegler.

Appellant has cited cases and directed our attention to certain sections of Ruling Case Law to sustain his contentions, but the questions presented here, as we view them, are questions of fact, and not of law, and therefore, if there is substantial evidence in the record to sustain the findings of the trial court, under the well-established rule, the judgment will not be disturbed on appeal.

We are of the opinion that the evidence amply sustains the findings, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. JUNOD. (Cr. 1532.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 20, 1927.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 274—That defendant believed he would receive lighter punishment by pleading guilty held not ground requiring court to allow plea to be withdrawn.

Refusal to allow defendant charged with embezzlement and issuing checks without funds to withdraw plea of guilty held proper, notwithstanding contention that his attorney persuaded him that, in the event probation was denied, he could still withdraw his plea, especially since the attorney denied having made such a representation.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 274, 1149—Allowing withdrawal of plea of guilty is discretionary with trial court, and its decision will not be disturbed.

Action upon a motion to withdraw plea of guilty is one which is within the discretion of the trial court, whose decision will not be disturbed unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears.

Emil Junod was convicted of embezzlement and issuing checks without sufficient funds, and he appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. This appeal presents but one question for our determination: Shall the action of the superior court in refusing to permit the defendant to withdraw his plea of guilty and enter a plea of not guilty be reversed or affirmed? The contention of the defendant is briefly stated by his counsel to be that through the representations and assurances of his attorney he was induced and persuaded to enter a plea of guilty to the information filed against him, and was assured that, in the event probation was denied by the court, he could still withdraw his plea of guilty and enter a plea of not guilty. The defendant entered a plea of guilty to each of two charges contained in separate informations, one of which charged embezzlement, and the other issuing checks without sufficient funds. In each case he made application for probation, which applications were denied, and he then asked leave to withdraw his pleas, advancing as a reason for the granting of his motion the contention above quoted.

[1] There is no merit in the appeal. If it was a fact that the defendant, who does not appear to have been in ignorance of the consequences of his act, believed, and was led by his counsel to believe, that he would receive milder punishment as a result of pleading guilty than otherwise, it is not a ground requiring the trial court to allow a plea of guilty to be withdrawn. People v. Manriquez, 188 Cal. 602, 206 P. 63, 20 A. L. R. 1441. However, the attorney denied having made such a representation to appellant.

[2] As was said in the case last cited, action upon a motion to withdraw a plea of guilty and to enter one of not guilty is one which is within the judicial discretion of the trial court, whose exercise will not be disturbed unless an abuse thereof clearly appears. Many other decisions might be cited to the same effect. No peculiar circumstances, such as existed in People v. Schwartz and Wallingford (Cal. Sup.) 257 P. 71, cited by appellant, are presented in the instant case.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte SCOTT. (Cr. 1423.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 19, 1927.

1. False pretenses $\S$ 8—Elements of crime of "fraudulently issuing check" are knowledge of insufficiency of funds and credit and intent to defraud (Pen. Code, § 476a).

Elements of crime of "fraudulently issuing bank check," within Pen. Code, § 476a, are the knowledge of the drawer, at the time of drawing and delivery, that he has not sufficient funds in or credit with the bank to meet the check in full on its presentation and an intent to defraud.

2. False pretenses $\S$ 7(5)—Where drawer had sufficient funds when he drew check, and was arrested before date on check, he could not be held for fraudulently issuing check (Pen. Code, § 476a).

Drawer, who had sufficient funds when he drew the postdated check to meet it, and was arrested before the date on the check, held not guilty of violating Pen. Code, § 476a, relating to fraudulently issuing a bank check, notwithstanding there were not funds to meet the check when it was presented.

Application for habeas corpus by H. W. Scott, to be directed to the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco, to secure release of petitioner from custody on a charge of violating Pen. Code, § 476a, relating to crime of fraudulently issuing bank check. Writ granted.

Frank P. Webster, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Peter J. Mullins, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Habeas corpus. Petitioner alleges that he has been held to answer, after an examination in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco, without reasonable or probable cause, of violating section 476a of the Penal Code, relating to the crime of issuing a bank check with intent to defraud. It appears from the transcript of the proceeding had before that court that petitioner at some time, the exact date not being shown, gave a check to the White House, a mercantile establishment located in San Francisco, a postdated check upon a particular bank for the sum of $26.50. The check was dated July 18, 1927. After receiving the same, the cashier of the establishment altered its date to June 18, 1927; but the record is silent as to whether such alteration was made in the presence of petitioner, or with or without his consent. It further appears that on the 18th day of June, 1927, the day the check was apparently made and delivered, the defendant had on deposit with the bank upon which it was drawn a balance of $57.10. The check, after passing through the clearance house, reached the bank about June 21, 1927, at which time petitioner had reduced this balance by withdrawals to the sum of $4. Without discussing the effect of the act of the cashier of the establishment in altering the check in the manner indicated, it seems clear to us that there was no reasonable or probable cause in holding petitioner to answer.

[1, 2] Section 476a of the Penal Code provides in substance that every person who willfully, with intent to defraud, makes or draws or utters or delivers to another person any check or draft upon a bank, knowing at the time of such making or uttering that he has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank to meet such check or draft in full upon its presentation, is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year, or in the state prison for not more than 14 years. The gist of the offense denounced by the state is the fraudulent intent, with which a check or draft is drawn and delivered, and knowledge by the drawer, at the time of such drawing and delivery, that he has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank to meet such check or draft in full upon its presentation. People v. Wilbur, 33 Cal. App. 511, 165 P. 729. It is essential, therefore, that there should be, on the part of one giving a check, both present knowledge of the insufficiency of funds and absence of credit with the bank to meet the check or draft in full upon its presentation and an intent to defraud. People v. Bercovitz, 163 Cal. 636, 126 P. 479, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 667. That petitioner had sufficient funds on June 18, 1927, the date when the check was presumably made and delivered, there is no question; for an officer of the bank testified that on that day there were sufficient funds to meet its payment. The check, however, was postdated July 18, 1927, and the record does not show that it was not accepted in the manner drawn in payment for the merchandise purchase. Whether or not on that day there would or would not have been sufficient funds to meet it we have no means of knowing, for petitioner was arrested and held to answer prior to such date. He had an account with the bank, and could have made provision for the payment of the check. Under the circumstances, he does not come within the purview of the statute.

The writ is granted, and the prisoner is discharged.

3. Partnership ⚡254—Surviving partner may purchase interest of estate of deceased partner in partnership property (Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411; Code Civ. Proc. § 1524).

Although a surviving partner is a trustee for the representatives and heirs of his deceased partner, under Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411, he may purchase the interest of the estate of the deceased partner in partnership property, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1524.

4. Partnership ⚡254—Surviving partner's purchase of deceased partner's interest must be fair and free from fraud, and surviving partner must disclose voluntarily all knowledge respecting value of interest (Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411; Code Civ. Proc. § 1524).

When a surviving partner purchases the interest of his deceased partner's estate in the partnership property, the transaction must be fair and free from fraud or it will not be sustained, and the surviving partner must acquaint decedent's representative and the court with full information, voluntarily disclosing all facts within his knowledge from which a sound judgment as to the value of the interest may be formed, and it is not sufficient to not withhold or conceal facts, under Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1524.

5. Trusts ⚡371(2)—One seeking to establish trust, based on constructive fraud, must allege all facts giving rise to trust.

In an action to establish a trust, based on a constructive fraud, all of the facts relied upon as giving rise to the trust must be alleged.

6. Trusts ⚡371(2)—In action to establish trust, based on constructive fraud, where it appears defendant was fiduciary and gained advantage, allegations of actual fraud are unnecessary.

While in an action to establish a trust, based on constructive fraud, the general rule is that all facts relied upon as giving rise to the trust must be averred, where it is admitted that a fiduciary relation existed and it appears that an advantage was gained by the fiduciary, allegations of actual fraud are unnecessary as the transaction is presumed to be constructively fraudulent.

7. Trusts ⚡107—Where fiduciary gains advantage over one to whom he sustains relation, transaction is constructively fraudulent and fiduciary must show utmost good faith, fairness, and full knowledge of facts.

Where one standing in a fiduciary relation gains an advantage over one to whom he sustains the relation, transaction is presumed to be constructively fraudulent, and the fiduciary has the burden of showing not only that he exhibited the utmost good faith, but that the transaction was in all respects fair and that it was entered into with a full knowledge of the facts.

8. Partnership ⚡258(8)—Finding that surviving partner purchasing interest of deceased partner showed requisite fairness and good faith held not sustained by evidence in action by heirs to establish trust (Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411; Code Civ. Proc. § 1524).

In action by heirs to establish a trust brought against a surviving partner who purchased the interest of his deceased partner's estate in partnership real property at a sum much less than its value, evidence held not to sustain finding that surviving partner sustained burden of showing the degree of fairness and good faith required, under Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1524.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action to establish a trust brought by Charles Johnston and others against George W. Kitchin. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Marshall Stimson and Noel C. Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for appellant Charles Johnston.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for appellants Bessie Johnston, Ida Johnston-Humphrey, and Ruth Elma Johnston.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An action to have a trust declared as to an interest in certain real property purchased by the defendant from the estate of David S. Johnston, deceased.

The property, which consists of lots 15 and 16 in block 1 of Wiltshire Boulevard tract, in Los Angeles county, was acquired by the deceased and the defendant in the year 1910, and in 1911 was improved by the erection thereon of a four-story brick apartment hotel known as the Hotel Shoreham.

David S. Johnston died intestate in Los Angeles county on November 18, 1919, and at the time of his death the property was incumbered by a mortgage originally executed for $35,000, but of which $5,000 had been paid, and the time for the payment of the balance extended to December 28, 1921.

None of the heirs of the deceased resided in California, and on December 17, 1919, letters of administration on the estate were granted to the public administrator of Los Angeles county.

An inventory and appraisal of the estate was filed on January 23, 1920, from which it appears that the deceased, in addition to his interest in the hotel, the appraised value of which was $40,000, owned other real and personal property, the total appraised value of the estate being $59,801.80.

[1] Thereafter, on January 28, 1920, the administrator caused to be posted and published in accordance with the provisions of the statute a notice that the interest of the estate in the hotel property would be sold at private sale to the highest and best bidder for cash, subject to confirmation by the court.

The defendant, who so far as shown was the only bidder, agreed to assume and pay the proportionate part of the mortgage chargeable to the estate, viz., $15,000, and in addition to pay the estate the sum of $21,000, a total of $36,000, this sum being 90 per cent. of the appraised value of the interest of the estate in the hotel.

It was alleged in the petition for confirmation that the sale would be for the best interest of the estate and was necessary in order to pay claims, and, further, that the amount bid by the defendant was fair and reasonable and not disproportionate to the value of the interest sold.

The notices of sale were regular and the petition sufficient to give the court jurisdiction, and no errors in its exercise would render the decree void. Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 41 P. 458; Estate of Bette, 171 Cal. 583, 153 P. 949; Estate of Spriggs, 20 Cal. 121.

After a hearing, which was duly noticed, the sale was confirmed to the defendant on March 3, 1920, following which a deed was executed by the public administrator.

Upon the petition of plaintiff Charles Johnston, who was a brother of the deceased, the letters granted to the public administrator were revoked on March 9, 1920, and letters of administration were duly issued to the petitioner.

The complaint alleged, with respect to the hotel:

"That at the time said property was acquired said David S. Johnston and G. W. Kitchen were and had been for some time past partners, and during the years of 1910 and 1911 as partners they erected the building on the above-described property known as the 'Hotel Shoreham,' and that from the date that they acquired the property until the death of said David S. Johnston they were partners in the ownership and conduct of the business connected with the above-described property and the Hotel Shoreham, and that the defendant George W. Kitchen managed the affairs of the partnership, collected the rents, and paid all of the charges and attended to all of the business of the partnership, giving to the said David S. Johnston monthly statements of account,"

—these allegations not being denied by the answer.

It was also averred that by a fraudulent arrangement between the public administrator and the defendant the fact that the sale proceedings were pending was concealed from the heirs and their attorneys; that the defendant, to induce the public administrator to institute the proceedings and procure the decree mentioned, represented to the latter that in the event the sale was not made it was his intention to bring suit for a partition of the property, falsely represented the terms of the mortgage thereon, that there would be difficulty in renewing the same, that the hotel was in need of repairs, that the lessee in possession was in default in the payment of rent, and that the lease was about to expire; that the public administrator, influenced by the defendant, made no effort to procure higher bids, and that the price paid to the knowledge of both was less than the reasonable market value of the interest sold; that the public administrator, induced by the representations of the defendant as to the value and condition of the property, falsely represented to the court that the sale was necessary in order to pay claims, was for the best interests of the estate, and that the amount bid by the defendant was fair and reasonable.

The allegations of fraud were denied, and all the allegations of the complaint, with the exception of those admitted by the answer, were found by the trial court to be untrue, and upon its findings judgment was entered for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed, and urge as grounds for reversal that the facts shown by the evidence and those admitted sustain their contention that the conduct of the defendant was actually and constructively fraudulent, and that the findings and judgment are unsupported.

Without reviewing in detail the evidence in support of the allegations of a fraudulent arrangement between the defendant and the public administrator, a concealment by the latter of the fact that the proceedings were pending, and a failure to use due diligence in the matter of obtaining higher bids, it will be sufficient to say that the findings of the trial court on these issues were fully sustained, as was also the finding against the allegation that the administrator fraudulently misrepresented the value of the hotel property and the condition of the estate to the probate court.

It was testified by the defendant that it was his intention in the event he was unable to purchase the interest of the estate in the hotel to bring suit for a partition, and that he so stated to the administrator; that he further stated that both the mortgage and the lease had something over a year to run; that the hotel could not be again leased without repairs; and that the rent had previously been in arrears, but that subsequently the payments were made.

The evidence shows that certain repairs were necessary and that with the exception of the statements as to the date of the maturity of the mortgage and that there would be difficulty in renewing the same, the other representations were substantially true.

[2, 3] Although a surviving partner is a trustee for the representative and the heirs of his deceased partner (Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411; Little v. Caldwell, 101 Cal. 553, 36 P. 107, 40 Am. St. Rep. 89), he may purchase the interest of the estate in the property of the firm (Kimball v. Lincoln, 99 Ill. 578; Valentine v. Wysor, 123 Ind. 47, 23 N. E. 1076, 7 L. R. A. 788; Ludlum v. Buckingham, 35 N. J. Eq. 71-80; Didlake v. Roden Grocery Co., 160 Ala. 484, 49 So. 384, 22 L. R. A. [N. S.] 907, 18 Ann. Cas. 430; Bradbury v. Barnes, 19 Cal. 120), it being the duty of the court before confirming a sale of any partnership interest to a surviving partner or any other person to inquire into the condition of the partnership affairs and to examine the surviving partner, if in the county and able to be present in court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1524).

[4] The transaction, however, must be fair and free from fraud, or it will not be sustained. In making the purchase he cannot place the representative at arm's length and seek a profitable bargain for himself, but is bound to acquaint the representative and the court with full information as to the facts, and it is not sufficient that he does not withhold or conceal such information, but it is incumbent upon him to disclose voluntarily all the facts within his knowledge from which a sound judgment as to the value of the interest of the estate may be formed. Welbourn v. Kleinle, 92 Md. 114, 48 A. 81; Tennant v. Dunlop, 97 Va. 234, 33 S. E. 620; Newcomb v. Brooks, 16 W. Va. 32.

As stated, the heirs were nonresidents, and with the exception of plaintiff Charles Johnston, who arrived in Los Angeles county on February 15, 1920, were not within the state or represented by local counsel previous to the confirmation of the sale, nor so far as appears did any of them receive notice or have knowledge that the sale was pending.

It is clear from the evidence that the existence of the partnership relation was not disclosed to the public administrator or to the court, and it further appears that the defendant on March 28, 1920, in an application for a loan to be secured upon the property, stated its value to be the sum of $110,000. The loan was made thereon for $40,000 upon an appraisal by the mortgagee of $90,000, and expert witnesses called by the respective parties placed its value in the months of January and February, 1920, at amounts varying from $85,000 to $110,000.

[5, 6] It was not alleged in the complaint that the partnership relation was not disclosed, and it is contended by the defendant that to establish a constructive fraud all the facts relied upon as giving rise to the trust must be averred.

[7] That such is the general rule may be conceded, but where a fiduciary relation is admitted and it appears that an advantage was gained by the one standing in that relation, allegations of actual fraud are unnecessary. Alaniz v. Casenave, 91 Cal. 41, 27 P. 521. The transaction under such circumstances is presumed to be constructively fraudulent, and the burden is upon him to show not only that he exhibited the utmost good faith, but that the transaction was in all respects fair and was entered into with a full knowledge of the facts. Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 156 P. 509; Wright v. Rohr, 41 Cal. App. 265, 182 P. 469; Bauchle v. Smylie, 104 App. Div. 513, 93 N. Y. S. 709.

[8] The court found in effect that none of the representations by the defendant were fraudulently made, and it appears that his statement of the date of the maturity of the mortgage, though incorrect, did not mislead the public administrator, as the true date was contained in the inventory and appraisal filed by him before the proceedings leading to the sale were commenced.

Although these findings are fairly supported, no explanation was made of the failure to apprise the administrator or the court of the partnership relation, and it further appears beyond reasonable question that the value of the interest of the estate in the property was in fact and to the knowledge of the defendant largely in excess of the price paid.

The defendant by reason of the partnership relation occupied a position of advantage which enabled him to procure a profitable bargain, which, had the relation been known, would not have been approved by the court without an inquiry into the partnership affairs and a close scrutiny of the transaction. Moreover, it is reasonably certain that had all the facts as to the value of the property known to the defendant been fully disclosed the sale would not have been confirmed for the price offered.

In view of the relations of the parties and the circumstances shown, we are satisfied that the defendant failed to show that decree of fairness and good faith which the law required of one in his position, and that the implied conclusion of the trial court to the contrary was not sustained by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

MOSKOWITZ v. McGLINCHEY. (Civ. 5823.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 20, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 17, 1927.

Judgment ~~6~~143(8)—Refusal to appear after service of summons on erroneous advice held not to entitle defendant to have default judgment set aside (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where defendant gave summons to attorney who was present, and who had represented him in prior case, and who stated objections and returned it to plaintiff, and defendant had not appeared at trial on advice of attorney, though service of summons was good, mistake was one of law and refusal to set aside default judgment in proceeding, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, was not abuse of trial court's discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy Judge.

Action by Charles Moskowitz against William McGlinchey. From an order denying a motion to set aside a default judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jos. F. O'Malley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order of the court below denying defendant's motion to set aside a default judgment. The motion was heard upon affidavits, under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The facts as shown by the affidavits were briefly as follows: Defendant herein was a defendant in a criminal prosecution in the police court growing out of the same automobile accident involved in this action. On the trial of that case one of the attorneys for the defendant and appellant herein was attorney for the defendant therein, and the attorney for the plaintiff and respondent herein was special prosecutor. After that trial was concluded and the parties came into the street, plaintiff's attorney approached the automobile in which the defendant herein was seated with his counsel, and handed defendant a copy of a complaint and summons in this action, stating "Here is a summons for you" (disputed). Defendant's counsel immediately took from defendant's hands the paper served on him, opened it (disputed), and called out objections to the service, claiming the copy of summons was unsigned by the county clerk, and demanding that the original summons be exhibited to the defendant. He took the summons over to the automobile of plaintiff's attorney, told him that the service was not good, and threw the summons on or at the plaintiff's automobile. He then returned to defendant's automobile and told the defendant not to pay any attention to the document. At least for the purposes of this appeal it is conceded now by appellant that this advice was erroneous, and that the service was good. Defendant did nothing more concerning the matter, but followed the advice of the attorney and paid no attention to the document. His default was taken October 20, 1924, and judgment some time thereafter was entered in favor of plaintiff. Immediately before the expiration of the period of 6 months a motion was made to be relieved from the default judgment.

While the affidavits are conflicting, they sustain the conclusion that the defendant knew he had been handed a summons in a civil action. Although his attorney had not yet been employed to represent or advise him in this case, defendant accepted and acted upon the advice given him, and we cannot see that this circumstance puts him in a more favorable position than if he had employed and paid an attorney for advice or in a more favorable position than if he had acted for himself in the same manner. In either case, it was a mistake of law in thinking that the service was invalid. Numerous cases have been cited in which relief from judgments occasioned by mistake of law has been either granted or denied.

The authorities in which the trial court's order is affirmed are in large part governed by the principle that a sound discretion is left to the trial court in determining the facts and in granting or refusing relief. Those authorities in which the orders affirmed grant relief are governed in large part by the additional principle that courts favor a trial upon the merits. There are two cases, however, in which the trial court's determination of an application for relief upon the ground of mistake of law has been reversed. In Shearman v. Jorgensen, 106 Cal. 483, 39 P. 863, the trial court granted relief for the mistake of an attorney in believing that notice of overruling demurrer served by mail was unauthorized. This order granting relief was reversed as an abuse of discretion. On the other hand, in Waite v. Southern Pacific Co., 192 Cal. 467, 221 P. 204, the trial court refused relief applied for on the grounds of mistake of law in believing that the federal and not the state court had jurisdiction of the action. This order denying relief was reversed as an abuse of discretion. In the former of these two cases a mistake of law was held inexcusable, and in the latter excusable. The facts of the two cases have differences as well as similarities. There are differences in the difficulty of the legal question erroneously decided, in the manner of solving it, and in the reasons and motives that actuated counsel in not resolving the question in the direction of safety.

This case should be governed by the principle of Shearman v. Jorgensen, supra, and by those authorities which uphold the discretion as exercised by the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

agreement and the evidence sustained the view that defendant sold catsup to plaintiff, plaintiff held not entitled to share in discount received by defendant from original seller.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action for partnership accounting by E. L. Heebner against Ben Senderman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hudson, Martin & Jorgensen, of Monterey, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff sought by this action of partnership accounting to require defendant to pay one-half of the losses sustained in the purchase and sale of two carloads of catsup. Defendant denied any partnership relation and asserted that the loss, if any, fell upon plaintiff alone. The trial resulted in a judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals, claiming that the testimony shows enough undisputed facts to compel a finding that the transaction was a partnership or at least a joint venture.

Defendant was the manager of a fish packing business in Monterey. Plaintiff was a New York broker dealing in foodstuffs. He made semiannual visits to the Pacific coast and frequently called on defendant at his place of business. On one such trip plaintiff had been buying large quantities of catsup on this coast. He called on defendant and asked him to secure for him more catsup at a favorable price. Defendant obtained the promise of a San Francisco firm to sell two carloads at 60 cents a gallon, although the market price was about 90 cents. Defendant was able to make this purchase on account of the friendly business relations existing between his firm and the San Francisco firm mentioned, and by defendant's representing that the catsup purchased was for himself and his own use. The plaintiff then asked the defendant to obtain this catsup and have it shipped to Monterey, because it was necessary that the seller believe that the defendant would use the catsup himself, repack the catsup, sparing no expense in this regard, and ship both carloads to the plaintiff in New York. The plaintiff agreed that he would purchase the catsup by taking up the drafts on their arrival in New York, and that, in order to repay the defendant for obtaining the catsup at so low a price, he would give the defendant one-half of the profits which should be made upon the resale of the catsup. Nothing was said by either party as to losses, such a contingency not being contemplated, in view of the condition of the market. The catsup was shipped to Monterey, where defendant repacked and reshipped it to plaintiff in New York, sending bills and drafts for the amount of the purchase price and expenses. These were paid by the defendant before receiving delivery of the shipments. The resale by plaintiff of the catsup in New York extended over a considerable period of time and resulted in a net loss.

[1, 2] There was other testimony introduced at the trial, some of which was in dispute. This testimony concerned the actions and conduct of the parties in their relation to each other and to third parties. It gave many other details of the transaction. This testimony gave justification for the trial court to believe that it was not the intention of the parties to become copartners or joint venturers, but, on the contrary, that the intention was to make an agreement by which plaintiff undertook to give defendant one-half the profits simply by way of compensating him for his services in obtaining the catsup, and that that was the full extent of defendant's interest and control in the matter. The precise wording of the initial business conversation of the parties was not such as to prohibit the findings made by the trial court. The rights of third parties are not involved in this action. It concerns only the parties themselves, so the nature of the relationship they have contracted with each other is to be determined by their intention as in other contracts. Wheeler v. Farmer, 38 Cal. 203; Westcott v. Gillman, 170 Cal. 562, 150 P. 777, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 437, note; 2 Rowley, Modern Law of Partnership, § 880; 33 Cor. Jur. 845. It is not true that every agreement to divide profits imports a partnership or joint venture and therefore imports an agreement to divide losses as well as profits. Respondent has cited numerous cases where agreements to divide profits have been held not to import a partnership or joint venture. Among these we mention two which seem quite similar to the case at bar, Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 P. 147, and Vanderhurst v. De Witt, 95 Cal. 57, 30 P. 94, 20 L. R. A. 595. See, also, 33 Cor. Jur. 847.

[3] After receiving from plaintiff payment for the shipments to New York, defendant turned about and paid the San Francisco firm the purchase price of the same, and in so doing received a 1 per cent. cash discount. Appellant contends that the trial court in any event, regardless of partnership or like relationship, should have given him judgment for the amount of this discount. We cannot see how this point had to be considered by the trial court where no accounting was taken nor partnership found to exist. The pleadings do not present this as an issue, and without different pleadings the court was not called upon to decide it unless it came up in taking an account. Where there was no partnership or similar relationship, the evidence sustains the view that defendant made an outright sale to the plaintiff at the agreed price of 60 cents, and that defendant's discount was in compensation of an immediate payment by him which he could have made or not according to his convenience.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Action by Cave J. Coutts and another against the Sperry Flour Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis B. Stanton, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages for breach of warranty. The allegations of the complaint, in so far as they are necessary for a discussion of the question here involved, recite in substance that on or about the 14th day of December, 1922, plaintiffs called upon defendant company with the object of purchasing from it certain seed barley to be used for planting, and defendant thereupon sold the same to them. That prior to such sale defendant represented and warranted that the seed so purchased was a lot of fine San Joaquin grown barley that yielded 25 or 30 sacks to the acre, and further represented that it was not Mariout barley, a variety plaintiffs did not desire to purchase. That plaintiffs relied solely upon each of the representations so made in completing the purchase. That acting upon such reliance they planted the same, which in due course grew and matured, at which time it was revealed that the same was Mariout barley. That in consequence plaintiffs' yield was a smaller one than would have been produced with the variety ordered. Damages were prayed for in the sum of $3,150.50. Defendant, answering, denied that the barley was sold as seed barley or that any representations or warranties of any kind were made by it with reference to its character or kind.

At the trial plaintiff Coutts testified, in substance, that he visited defendant's place of business in Los Angeles for the purpose of purchasing wheat and barley for seed purposes. That with reference to the barley he informed defendant's agent that he could not obtain good seed in the vicinity in which he lived as his neighbors had been using the Mariout variety which had proved disastrous, and that he wanted some of the Coast barley, whereupon the agent of defendant assured him the company had "some splendid Coast barley grown in the San Joaquin, that goes 25 to 30 sacks to the acre," that he thereupon informed the agent that it was the variety he wished to purchase. He further testified that he explained that his reason for calling on defendant was that he did not want Mariout barley such as had been sown in his neighborhood, whereupon the agent of defendant replied that his company had no Mariout barley, but had the San Joaquin variety. That upon receiving this information he purchased two tons of the represented variety. On the other hand, the agent of defendant, through whom the sale was made, testified that he had informed plaintiff at the outset that his company was not a seedhouse and would not quote any grain as seed, but would quote a good quality as cleaned grain, and that in his opinion it would be suitable for planting. The price quoted was $1.90 per cwt., at Los Angeles, plus carload freight to Vista, where plaintiff desired it to be shipped. Plaintiff then informed him that he did not want a carload, but only a couple of tons, whereupon he had replied that he ought to obtain it locally. Plaintiff then explained that the local barley was foul with smut and that he did not want it; that he wanted the northern barley. The agent thereupon stated that he was selling him barley that came from the north, meaning north of Los Angeles, but that nothing was ever said by either party about Mariout barley.

It also appeared in evidence that defendant did not buy its barley with any reference as to variety, but that all the barley defendant had in its warehouse was placed in separate bins according to quality, but without regard to variety. It further appeared that the price of the barley kept by defendant at that time was sold at $1.90 per cwt., f. o. b. Los Angeles, and this was the regular and only price which defendant charged. It was proved that the price charged for barley seed by regular seedhouses during the same period was $3.50 per cwt., and that the same was sold without any warranty. Other evidence was to the effect that defendant's salesmen were not permitted in selling seed grain to make any warranties, express or implied, as to quality or description, but that the same was simply sold as re-cleaned grain, and inventoried by the company as such. Upon this evidence the court found that at the time the sale of the barley by defendant to plaintiff was made, plaintiff especially informed defendant that he did not want Mariout barley. It further found that at this time defendant notified plaintiff that it was not a seedhouse, but had for sale northern grown barley which could be used for seed and thereby intended that plaintiff should understand that no warranty would be made as to said barley for seed purposes, but that defendant understood that the barley was not Mariout barley.

Further findings recite that defendant knew that all of the barley which it had for sale was not segregated according to variety, and defendant's agent did not know whether or not the variety which it offered plaintiff was or was not Mariout barley, and that he did not disclose such fact to plaintiff, who bought the barley in ignorance thereof, upon his understanding that it was not the objectionable variety. Upon these findings the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for damages in the sum of $1,075.20. It is appellant's contention that, the court having found that defendant had warned plaintiff of its intention not to warrant the seed, this finding, based upon the undisputed evidence to this effect, precludes a conclusion that there was a warranty, either express or implied, as to the quality or variety of the barley. The question of warranties in the sale of seed is exhaustively discussed in the recent case of Miller v. Germain Seed & Plant Co., 193 Cal. 62, 222 P. 817, 32 A. L. R. 1215. It is there said that there can be no question where a purchaser asks a seed dealer for a certain variety of seed and in pursuance of that request seed is furnished, that in the absence of any additional facts the law will, from the transaction, imply a contract of warranty, and that such warranty partakes of the nature of both an express and implied warranty. But in order that a sale shall be upon a warranty, there must be two factors present, first, an affirmation of a fact by the seller with reference to the thing sold, and, second, an intention on the part of the seller that his affirmation shall be a warranty to the buyer. The affirmation of the fact is shown by direct evidence, and the intent to warrant is inferred from the facts and circumstances surrounding the sale. In the case of the sale of seed for planting, the description of the seed by the seller is an affirmation of a fact concerning the thing sold. From the fact that the seed is sold for planting and the description of the seed is, therefore, a vital element in the contract, the intent on the part of the dealer to warrant that vital fact to the buyer is inferred.

[1] Here, the court having found that the seller expressly refused to warrant the seed, there is no room for any question of an implied warranty in connection with the sale. By the express declaration of the agent, and upon which the finding is based, defendant relieved itself of any implied warranty that the seed sold was of the variety desired. Leonard Seed Co. v. Cray Canning Co., 147 Wis. 166, 132 N. W. 902, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 79, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1077.

[2, 3] Such a refusal shows an intention that the buyer shall take the risk of the goods. 2 Williston on Contracts, p. 1871; 35 Cyc. 373. Respondent insists in support of the judgment that from the findings as a whole it is clear that there was an express warranty given by appellant to respondents that the sale was of barley seed not of the Mariout variety. While the findings do establish the fact that plaintiffs did not want the variety furnished, they also establish the further fact that defendant expressly refused to warrant the seed. As above indicated, in order to recover upon a warranty there must be two factors present, first, an affirmation of fact by the seller with reference to the thing sold, and, second, an intention on the part of the seller that his affirmation shall constitute a warranty. An express finding, as here, that the seller absolutely declined to warrant, negatives the existence of any implied warranty arising from the facts surrounding the sale, and the mere fact that plaintiffs made their purchase upon the understanding that the seed was not the objectionable variety, and that they never understood that defendant did not intend to warrant, does not alter the rule. Miller v. Germain Seed & Plant Co., supra.

[4] As argued by appellant, the finding of the lower court to the effect that there was no intent to warrant on the part of the seller finds full support in the evidence, for, aside from the direct testimony of the agent of defendant upon the subject, it was disclosed that defendant did not sell any barley as seed, but merely sold the same as re-cleaned grain; that its barley sold for $1.90 per cwt., whereas at the same time seedhouses selling barley as seed charged $3.50 per cwt., and even at that price no warranty was given. We conclude, therefore, that the facts and circumstances surrounding the sale cannot support the finding of an implied or any warranty in face of the finding that defendant's agent expressly refused to warrant. This express finding negatives any idea of warranty.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

ASSOCIATED INDUSTRIES INS. CORPORATION v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5874.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 20, 1927.

1. Insurance §665(4)—Evidence in contest between insurers held to support finding that employee's disability was recurrence of previous disability occurring when former company was insurer.

Where an employee was injured while former insurer was carrying employer's compensation insurance, and almost two years after the first period of disability became again disabled while another company was carrier, evidence in contest between insurance carriers held to sustain finding that the first injury caused the new disability, so that former insurer was correctly held liable.

2. Trial §397(5)—Where court's finding that former injury caused new disability determined case, failure to make express finding concerning new disability held immaterial.

In a contest between insurance companies to determine whether employee's disability was new, occurring while respondent was insurance carrier, or resulted from old injury occurring while petitioner was insurance carrier, where the court's finding that the original injury caused the new and further disability determined the case, failure to make an express finding that it was not due to independent injury occurring later held no error, since such an extra finding would have been useless.

Application for certiorari by the Associated Industries Insurance Corporation against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, the Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, and Thomas J. Lee, to review an order of the Commission awarding respondent Lee compensation for injuries against petitioner, and dismissing respondent Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company. Award affirmed.

Bronson, Bronson & Slaven, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. It appears from the petition that on or about April 20, 1926, respondent Thomas J. Lee filed application for adjustment of claim with the Industrial Accident Commission against respondents Allen Bros., Inc., and Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, its insurance carrier, wherein he alleged that on December 3, 1923, while employed as a rigger by Allen Bros., he sustained injuries arising out of and in the course of his employment in the following manner: "Slacking of rope, and felt my back give way," and further alleged that his injury consisted of a back strain; that the employer's insurance carrier at the time of the injury was Associated Industries Insurance Company; that in consequence of such injury he suffered disability from December 3, 1923, to March 18, 1924, and was paid disability indemnity for such period and furnished medical treatment by Associated Industries Insurance Company. It further appears that on April 17, 1926, while still employed by Allen Bros. in the same character of work, he sustained injury arising out of and in the course of his employment in the following manner: "Rolling big timbers and strained back," and that at the time of the injury on April 17, 1926, the employer's insurance carrier was Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company; that he left his work on April 17, 1926, and was still disabled at the time of the filing of his application. The employee prayed that the respondent commission determine which insurance carrier was liable for the benefits under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (Stat. 1917, p. 831, as amended), during the disability following April 17, 1926. Thereafter Associated Industries Insurance Corporation was joined as a defendant, and it filed its answer to said application admitting that it was the insurance carrier for the employer on December 3, 1923, and further admitting that it had paid compensation to the employee for disability from December 3, 1923, to and including March 18, 1924, but denying that the disability claimed in the application was due to injury on or about December 3, 1923.

Upon due notice, a hearing of the employee's application was had on July 1, 1926, before Referee Harris, of respondent Industrial Accident Commission, and testimony was taken upon the issues raised, medical reports were filed, and the matter submitted for decision. It is claimed that upon such hearing that the evidence established without conflict the following facts: That on December 3, 1923, the employee while in the course of his employment for Allen Bros. fell over a gear wheel, and that a few days thereafter, while slacking up on a guy rope, his back gave way acutely without any apparent cause. That the employee was thereafter disabled from his work up to and including March 18, 1924, and that during that period he was furnished medical treatment for his back and was paid disability indemnity by petitioner herein. That on March 18, 1924, he returned to work for Allen Bros. and was employed steadily up to April 17, 1926, with the loss of but two or three days' time shortly after he returned to work. That about a week prior to April 17, 1926, his back began bothering him again. At this time his duties required him to lift and move heavy timbers, in consequence of which he strained his back and was unable to work thereafter. That the medical testimony deduced and reports received in evidence showed that the employee was suffering from strain of the lumbar muscles and a sacroiliac arthritis.

The petition then alleges that on September 16, 1926, respondent Accident Commission issued its findings and award in which it was determined that the employee sustained injury on December 3, 1923, in the nature of a back strain, and that disability indemnity from that time to and including March 16, 1924, had been paid. It was further found that the employee sustained an injury on April 17, 1926, in the nature of a back strain, and that such employee was still partially disabled at the time of the filing of the award as a result of the back strain of April 17, 1926, and thereupon indemnity was awarded in favor of the employee and against Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company for all disability following April 17, 1926. Thereafter this insurance carrier served and filed its petition for rehearing, and the injured employee also filed a like petition, contending that the evidence did not justify the findings of fact, and alleging that he had discovered new evidence in the nature of a report of Dr. Johnson, who had been treating him. The commission granted these petitions.

A hearing was then had before Referee Crowell of respondent commission and additional testimony was given by the employee, and also by Dr. Johnson, who testified that he believed the disability had resulted from the old condition in 1923. The commission thereafter issued its decision on rehearing by which it was found as a fact that the employee sustained injury on December 3, 1923, occurring in the course of his employment in the following manner: "While taking up slack in the rope he suffered a strained back." It further found that on April 17, 1926, said injury of December 3, 1923, caused new and further disability, and that the employee was totally disabled from and after April 17, 1926, to and including July 28, 1926, and thereafter partially disabled up to the date of the award and continuing, and in said decision the commission issued its award against petitioner herein, Associated Industries Insurance Company, for all the disability and dismissed Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company and Allen Bros. from the proceedings. The Associated Company filed its petition for rehearing on said decision in which it alleged that the commission acted without and in excess of its powers and that the evidence did not justify the findings. This petition was denied and the present proceeding was instituted. It is not here claimed that the employee is not entitled to the benefits he has received under the award. Petitioner admits that the employee is now very seriously disabled as the record shows that he is facing bone graft surgery on his spine. It is apparent from the facts as recited that the controversy is one between the different insurance carriers. It is petitioner's contention that the record shows beyond all question that the applicant suffered an injury on April 17, 1926, and the commission should have so determined, and, this being so, it was in error in finding that the disability suffered by the employee since April 17, 1926, was proximately caused by the injury occurring December 3, 1923, when the applicant was slacking up on a rope. It is further claimed that the commission also erred in failing to make any finding whatsoever concerning the injury of April 17, 1926, which it is contended was clearly the cause of the employee's present disability. There is no merit in either of the objections.

[1] The issue presented to the commission for its decision was whether the employee's disability subsequent to April 17, 1926, was caused by an injury happening upon that date, or was a new and further disability caused by the original injury of December 3, 1923. The commission found that the applicant "on December 3, 1923, sustained injury occurring in the course of his employment arising out of his employment. * * *". The second finding of fact is "on April 17, 1926, said injury caused new and further disability." These findings are fully supported by the evidence. The employee testified, in substance, that his back was never strong after the original injury he suffered, and that he had never felt the same as he did before he was hurt; that at times he was compelled to quit work; that about a week before the incident of April 17, 1926, he noticed his back becoming worse, and that the pains which he suffered were located in the same place as the pains he suffered in December, 1923; that the soreness was growing worse, until April 17, 1926, when he collapsed. There was medical testimony to show that the applicant had never completely recovered from his original injury, and that such injury was the proximate cause of his disability, and the second alleged injury was merely the occasion for him to know that he had further trouble with his back. It thus appears that there is substantial evidence to support the findings of the commission that the injury of December, 1923, was the cause of and contributed to the disability suffered from and after April 17, 1926.

[2] Nor is there any merit to petitioner's contention that the commission erred in failing to make an express finding relative to the disability suffered April 17, 1926. The findings of the commission are responsive to the issue as to whether the disability suffered subsequent to April 17, 1926, was caused by an injury on that date or was a new and further disability caused by the injury of December 3, 1923. As above recited, the commission found it to be a new and further disability. An express finding that it was not due to an alleged injury suffered thereafter could add no force to the findings. The findings negative the existence of any new injury. Moreover, a finding upon this subject could in no manner alter or change the award. Where findings are made upon issues which determine the case, other issues become immaterial, and a failure to find thereon does not constitute error. 24 Cal. Jur. pp. 943, 944; Pyle Co. v. Fossler (Cal. Sup.) 252 P. 599.

From what we have said, it follows that the award should be and it is hereby affirmed.

GRANT v. GLADSTONE et ux. (Civ. 5822.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 19, 1927.

1. Gifts ¶49(5)—Evidence held to support finding that money advanced was gift.

In action on open book account for moneys lent, evidence held to support court's finding in favor of defense that money was advanced as gift.

2. Evidence ¶597—Inconsistencies in testimony do not necessarily mean that testimony will not support a finding.

Simply because there are inconsistencies in one's testimony does not necessarily mean that it will not support a finding.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Hudson Grant, as executor of the last will and testament of B. B. Tuttle, deceased, against H. V. Gladstone and wife, for money lent. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. G. Bailey, of Woodland, for appellant. Joseph Farry, of San Francisco (H. A. Vander Zee, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. This action was filed May 26, 1923. The complaint alleged that within four years last past defendants became indebted to Benjamin B. Tuttle, who died November 29, 1921, in the sum of $2,000 upon an open book account for moneys loaned to defendants. Defendants denied the loan, alleged a gift, and set up the statute of frauds.

Plaintiff's proof consisted of offering in evidence a memorandum book in the form of a diary ruled horizontally into spaces with printed dates. On the page thereof headed "April, 1920," and in the space dated "16 Fri." is found the following entry in the handwriting of the plaintiff's testator:

"16 Fri. Loaned Mr. and Mrs. H. V. Gladstone 1,800.00 to pay on a new house purchased by them the amount was to draw 6 pr ct ints. 183 Del Mar St. is the no. I also loaned Mr. H. V. Gladstone 200—for the purpose buying this same house, making in all 2,000 dollars to draw 6 pr ct."

Upon proof of the handwriting of the deceased, this book was received in evidence subject to objections as to its sufficiency and as to the sufficiency of its preliminary proof.

The defendants' testimony was uncontradicted and was to the effect that the money was given and received as an absolute gift.

[1] The court found that the deceased did not lend the said defendants said sum. This is a finding in favor of the defense of gift. The court also found that the action was barred by Code of Civil Procedure, § 339, subd. 1. This means that the item in the memorandum book was not an open book account, within the meaning of Code of Civil Procedure, § 337, subd. 2. Either one of these findings alone would support the judgment, which was for the defendants.

[2] Appellant claims that the testimony of Mrs. Gladstone, the defendant, is "inconsistent with the idea of a gift in two particulars," first, that Mr. Gladstone asked the deceased if he would accept a note and stated that he could not give a mortgage, and, second, that defendants paid interest on two occasions. Simply because there are inconsistencies in one's testimony does not necessarily mean that it will not support a finding. Appellant fails to indicate how the testimony as a whole is insufficient to show a gift. However, these "inconsistencies" were explained by the defendant Mrs. Gladstone in her testimony. She testified to the effect that the deceased refused the note and mortgage, declaring at the time that he wanted to do something for her, and that that was his time to do it; that he would not "stand for" any evidence of the money; that he had previously frequently expressed his intention of making her a gift; that at the time of the gift defendants voluntarily offered to pay interest, placing the offer upon the ground that, as the gift was made then instead of by will, he should have interest the same as though he had kept the money until his death; that the defendant refused to accept interest, but finally at a later date accepted it, "when he returned from the East." We have read but have not set forth herein all the material testimony concerning the gift.

The testimony was not insufficient to support the court's finding in favor of the defense of gift.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Alpha G. Andrews against Albert C. Russell and the Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation appeals. Affirmed.

Fred W. Heath, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clafin & Lambert, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. The respondent brought an action to quiet his title against defendant Albert C. Russell and defendant and appellant Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation in and to the land and premises described in the complaint. The defendant Albert C. Russell failed to appear and answer the complaint within the time allowed, and his default was regularly entered. The appellant Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation answered and set up its right to the possession of the property under and by virtue of a lease which had been executed and delivered by respondent to defendant Albert C. Russell and by him assigned to appellant, and set forth that it claimed no interest in or to the premises except under a lease executed by respondent.

The court found that the plaintiff was at the time of the commencement of the action, and prior to January 10, 1923, the owner in fee simple of the real property described in the complaint; that the defendant Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation claims and asserts an interest in said land adverse to plaintiff by reason of a lease entered into between plaintiff and Albert C. Russell on January 10, 1923, and thereafter assigned to the defendant Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation; that said lease contained a provision that the lessee was to commence actual drilling and continue diligently until the completion of a well on the described land, 60 days from this date (date of lease), which said lease was dated January 10, 1923, and was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Kern county, and also contained a provision that the lessee would drill on the described land continuously to a depth of 3,000 feet or more before completion, unless oil was found in commercial quantities before that depth. Said lease also contained a provision that, upon the failure of the lessee to comply fully and fairly with each of the conditions of the lease, all the rights under the lease would terminate and be forfeited. That said lessee did not, nor did his assignee, Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation, in good faith commence actual drilling and continue diligently, or drill continuously, and that said lessee and his assignee, Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation, have failed to fully or fairly comply with each of the conditions in said lease, and concludes from the foregoing that the rights of defendants Albert C. Russell and Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation in the lease have been terminated prior to the commencement of the action, and that plaintiff is entitled to judgment quieting his title against each of the defendants. Judgment was entered in accordance with the findings, and from this judgment appellant Kern-Torrance Petroleum Corporation has appealed.

Appellant urges the following points in support of his appeal: (1) That an action to quiet title without setting up the nature of the defendant's claim is not the proper method of procedure to cancel a lease where the defendant is in possession under the lease. (2) That plaintiff cannot escape the obligation to give notice of default and demand for possession as provided by law, by resorting to an action to quiet title. (3) That plaintiff cannot take advantage of the defendant's failure to perform the lease when the failure is due to plaintiff's willful violation of the covenant of quiet enjoyment implied in the lease. (4) That the court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff's witness to testify as to the act of decision of a public official, verbally made, and in refusing to admit commissioner's letter. (5) That the finding that the defendant has not in good faith, or at all, carried on drilling operations as provided in the lease, is not supported by the evidence. (6) That the judgment is not supported by the evidence and is contrary to law.

Appellant, under his first assignment, urges that "plaintiff as landlord, cannot maintain an action to quiet title against his tenants," citing us to Van Winkle v. Hinckle, 21 Cal. 343. That was an action to quiet title decided in 1863, when, in order to maintain an action to quiet title, it was necessary for the plaintiff to be in possession, and it was held in that case that a landlord could not bring an action against his tenants in possession for the purpose of determining the validity of an adverse title set up by the tenants—that the plaintiff could not claim possession through the tenants, that is, that he was in possession by reason of his tenant's possession, and at the same time bring an action against the tenant to determine the title—and, in Lyle v. Rollins, 25 Cal. 437, the court, referring to the Van Winkle Case says:

That "in Van Winkle v. Hinckle, 21 Cal. 342, possession by tenant was held to be insufficient when the action is brought by the landlord against the tenant in possession setting up a claim adverse to his landlord."

[1, 2] It is not necessary under the rule now laid down for a plaintiff to be in possession in order to maintain an action to quiet title. People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 5 P. 263, 6 P. 481. The other cases cited by appellant deal with the principle that a tenant cannot dispute the title of his landlord and are, therefore, not analogous to the question here presented.

Appellant's chief objection under this heading seems to be that a tenant, not holding adversely to the title of the landlord, has no estate in the premises, which is adverse, and that it is necessary to quiet title to set forth the nature of the defendant's claim. In Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 443, 21 P. 946, the court uses this language:

"It is contended for the appellant, in the first place, that 'an action to quiet title or to remove a cloud upon title will not lie where the facts alleged, if true, would not legally affect the plaintiff's title.' But in this the learned counsel overlooks the distinction between actions to determine adverse claims, which are provided for by the Code of Civil Procedure, and which in this state are commonly referred to as actions to quiet title, and suits to have an instrument canceled, or adjudged to be void, which are usually called actions to remove a cloud. Suits to have an instrument canceled, or adjudged to be void, were quite common in the old chancery practice, and constituted one of the applications of the principle quia timet. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 701. This suit is preserved by the Civil Code. * * * Suits to determine adverse claims such as exist in this state were not known to the old chancery practice, but were provided for by statute. The provision of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows: 'Sec. 738. An action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim' (compare section 254 of Old Practice Act, Laws 1851, pp. 92, 93). The distinction between the two kinds of action is clear. * * * It is not necessary * * * that the adverse claim should be of any particular character. As said by Baldwin, J., delivering the opinion in Head v. Fordyce, 17 Cal. 151, the statute 'does not confine the remedy to the case of an adverse claimant setting up a legal title or even an equitable one; but the act intended to embrace every description of claim whereby the plaintiff might be deprived of the property, * * * or its value depreciated, or whereby the plaintiff might be incommoded or damaged by the assertion of an outstanding title already held or to grow out of the adverse pretention' [citing cases]; and the rule may be even more broadly stated, viz., that the action may be maintained by the owner of property to determine any adverse claim whatever. For if the defendant by his answer disclaims all interest whatever, judgment may, nevertheless, be entered against him. * * * The plaintiff, therefore, is not required to set forth the nature of the defendant's claim."

The Castro Case from which we have just quoted, was cited with approval in Hyatt v. Colkins, 174 Cal. 580, 163 P. 1007, and in Landregan v. Peppin, 94 Cal. 467, 22 P. 771, the court says:

"It will be noticed that section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides for the determination of adverse claims to realty, is very broad in its terms, and includes all adverse interests, from a claim of title in fee to the smallest leasehold, and unquestionably it is the duty of the defendant to set out his interest, whatever it may be, when called upon, under this section of the Code."

Section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"An action may be brought by any person against another, who claims an estate or interest in real [or personal] property, adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim. * * *"

[3] A lease constitutes an estate. Section 761 of the Civil Code provides that estates in real property are either estates of inheritance, estates of life, estates for years, or estates at will. Our attention is also called by appellant to sections 789 and 790 of the Civil Code and section 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 789 of the Civil Code provides for the termination of a tenancy or estate at will; section 790 of the same Code, for the method of recovery; and section 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure prescribes how the notice shall be served. These sections are not applicable as the leasehold here was not a tenancy or estate at will. It was a lease for a definite term of three years, with certain provisions that it would terminate if the covenants were not fulfilled.

Appellant cites us to several cases as holding that unlawful detainer is the statutory method of restoring possession from a tenant. The decisions cited, however, do not hold that unlawful detainer is the exclusive action by a landlord against a tenant. The case of Francis v. West Virginia Oil Co., 174 Cal. 168, 162 P. 394, is the nearest in point among those cited, which holds that a vendee in possession of land under a contract of sale, who had defaulted in the payment of an installment of the purchase price, did not become a tenant at will, subject to removal by the summary method of unlawful detainer, and the action only lies where there is a relation of landlord and tenant, but the case does not hold unlawful detainer to be the exclusive remedy. It would seem that a lessee who has forfeited his rights under his lease by reason of his failure to comply with the covenants of the lease is analogous to a vendee under a contract of purchase who has defaulted in the payment of his installments, and it has been held that an action to quiet title will lie in such case (McDonald v. Kingsbury, 16 Cal. App. 248, 116 P. 380), and in Lewis v. Agoure, 8 Cal. App. 146, 96 P. 327, in which case a transfer to the Supreme Court was denied, it is held that an action to quiet title is the proper action against a lessee in whom no right remained, and here the court found that all rights of appellant in the lease had terminated prior to the commencement of the action.

[4] As to appellant's second point that plaintiff cannot escape the obligation to give notice of default and demand for possession, there is no merit. Plaintiff does not rely upon the statute permitting an action for unlawful detainer with its accompanying penalties, but upon an action to quiet title. Williams v. Edge, 192 Cal. 254, 219 P. 747.

As to appellant's third point, that plaintiff cannot take advantage of defendant's failure to perform the lease, when the failure is due to plaintiff's willful violation of the covenant of quiet enjoyment implied in the lease, it may be said that appellant has not directed us to any evidence in the record, nor have we found any, to the effect that respondent interfered with the quiet and peaceable enjoyment by appellant of its lease.

[5] We see no error in the court's ruling sustaining an objection to the introduction in evidence of a letter from the corporation commissioner and a verbal opinion given appellant with reference to a permit to sell oil stock. Such evidence was not material to the issue and is hearsay. Appellant cites us to Chamberlayne's, c. 40, § 889 et seq., and Lay v. Neville, 25 Cal. 545, as holding "The rule against hearsay is subject, also, to the exception that a public official's oral declarations on matters of public or general interest may be received if the declarant is not available." Here, however, the oral declaration of the public official did not pertain to a matter of public or general interest.

[6] As to the remaining objections urged by appellant, that the finding that defendant has not in good faith carried on drilling operations as provided in the lease, is not supported by the evidence, and that the judgment is not supported by the evidence and is contrary to law, there is no merit. The testimony of appellant and defendant Albert

C. Russell was that they had frequently visited the premises and no work was being done; that on many occasions only the watchman was at the well; that only 8 feet was drilled from January 10, 1923, the date of the lease, to March 16, the last time appellant measured the well before the suit was brought, which was on June 4, 1923, and that the day before the trial of the case the depth of the well was 193 feet. The witness Everett F. Edenberg testified that he lived within half a mile of this drill site and passed by on the road practically every day, and to be safe, on an average of four times a week. Prior to June 1st he only saw the rig going twice. That he helped drill wells within a radius of 10 miles of the place and drilled on an average of 80 feet a week. J. J. Shore, a witness called by defendant, testified on cross-examination that from his experience as a driller that he had only known of a rig such as the one on this Kern-Torrance property to go 1,200 feet. Such evidence is sufficient to support the finding complained of, and from what has been said it follows that we are of the opinion that the judgment finds support in the evidence, and that it is not contrary to law. The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte VALENCIA. (Cr. 1504.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 16, 1927.

Habeas corpus $\Rightarrow$ 21—Giving voucher to another who indorsed it in name not payee's held on habeas corpus not sufficient to hold defendant to answer.

In habeas corpus proceeding by petitioner committed on charge of forgery, evidence that the petitioner secured a certain voucher either lost or stolen from payee and turned it over to a third party with instructions to cash it, and the third party indorsed the voucher with a name other than that of the payee, held not sufficient to support charge of forgery.

Application by Luis Valencia for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of Imperial County. Petitioner discharged.

Fred Thompson, of Brawley, and Frank Birkhauser, of El Centro, for petitioner.

Elmer W. Heald, of Brawley, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The petitioner, Valencia, is in custody pursuant to a warrant issued by the justice of the peace of El Centro township, in the county of Imperial. A complaint had been filed, charging that defendant, Valencia, had committed the crime of forgery, with intent to defraud one Luis Sanchez. After examination before the magistrate, defendant was held to answer to said charge.

Petitioner contends that the evidence produced before the magistrate was not legally sufficient to establish the fact that there was probable cause to believe him guilty of the crime charged and to which he is held to answer.

From the evidence produced before the magistrate it appears that a pay roll voucher of the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, was issued and delivered to its employee, Luis Sanchez, payable in the sum of $10.27 when properly indorsed by the payee. This voucher was lost by Sanchez or was stolen from him. According to some of the testimony, the voucher came into the hands of Valencia, who turned it over to one Reynosa, with instructions to cash it. Reynosa indorsed upon the voucher not the name "Luis Sanchez," but the name "Luis Gonzales." With this paper so indorsed, he succeeded in delivering it to a merchant, who paid him the face value thereof.

Omitting sundry other circumstances shown by the evidence, the one clear point appears that the act of forgery was not committed. There is no charge that the instrument itself was forged, but only that the indorsement was forged. Necessarily, this could only be accomplished by writing the name "Luis Sanchez." We may concede that a slight variation in spelling of the name might occur, and the act still remain a forgery. But when a distinctly different name is used, it is not a forgery. So here, the writing of the name "Gonzales" cannot be accepted as a forgery of the name "Sanchez." For the purposes of this proceeding, we cannot be concerned with the fact that the defendant may have committed another kind of crime, when he, together with Reynosa, obtained said sum of money in the manner described by the testimony. The record is that petitioner has been committed and held to answer to the crime of forgery without any evidence that there was a forgery.

The petitioner is discharged from custody.

PEOPLE v. CASTRO. (Cr. 1311.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 25, 1927.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 742(1)—Where testimony of ravished prosecutrix was not inherently improbable, her credibility was for jury (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1847).

Where, in prosecution for rape, prosecutrix's testimony was not inherently improbable, question of her credibility was for the jury, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1847, who not only had the right but the duty to determine to what extent her testimony should be believed.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 470—Examining physician's testimony that prosecutrix had indulged in sexual intercourse held properly admitted, not being opinion of ultimate facts in issue.

Testimony of physician who had examined prosecutrix that, in his opinion, she had indulged in sexual intercourse held properly admitted, since witness thereby expressed no opinion on the ultimate facts in issue and province of jury was not invaded.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 518(1)—Admission of defendant's statement held proper, although he denied he had been advised of right to remain silent.

Where defendant denied that before making incriminating statements concerning rape of a child he had been advised of his right to remain silent, but there was sufficient showing to justify conclusion that statements were freely and voluntarily made, their admission was proper.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 531(1/2), 736(2) — There must be preliminary proof that confession was voluntary and without inducement, but sufficiency of preliminary proof is for court.

Though it is essential that the preliminary proof show a confession was made voluntarily and without previous inducement or intimidation, yet the question whether such preliminary proof is sufficient is one of fact to be determined by the trial court.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 531(3)—Jury's finding that statements of crime were made freely and voluntarily by defendant held sustained by evidence.

Jury's finding that statements made by defendant relative to crime of rape were made freely and voluntarily held sustained by the evidence.

6. Rape $\S$ 59(12) — Instruction relative to ravished prosecutrix's failure to resist or complain held not erroneous or misleading on question of credibility.

In rape prosecution, instruction, that "The fact, should you so find, that the female made no outcry, complaint, or resistance in any form is immaterial where she was under age of consent," etc., held not erroneous or misleading on question of prosecutrix's credibility because of failure to complain.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Fred A. Treat, Judge.

P. Castro was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Bardin, of Salinas, and J. T. Harrington, of Santa Clara, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, alleged to have been committed on one Carmen Mancha, a female aged about 15 years. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, and that the admission of certain testimony over objection and the giving of an instruction to the jury were prejudicially erroneous.

[1] The crime was alleged to have been committed in the city of Monterey, on or about October 5, 1925, and it was shown that the defendant had been acquainted with the child and her parents for some time previous to that date. It was testified that the defendant had invited the child to visit the place where he resided, that visits were made, and that on the occasion in question she was accompanied by other girls about her age. These were called as witnesses for the prosecution, and, according to their testimony, the girl Carmen on this occasion—the date of which they fixed as October 5, 1925—went into a bedroom with the defendant, where she remained for several minutes. The testimony of Carmen Mancha as to the fact charged and the place of its commission was contradictory. At the trial, after testifying that the act was committed by the defendant and relating in detail the circumstances, she retracted the statement, but subsequently on her redirect examination repeated the charge. It further appears that before the trial the witness had also retracted the charge which she originally made. Her testimony, however, tended to show that she feared that if the charge was made it would lead to her being committed to the reform school; and it is evident that the jury believed that her testimony was influenced in a considerable degree by her fears in this respect. According to her testimony, she made no resistance or outcry and no complaint subsequently, and it is apparent from the evidence that she willingly submitted to the defendant. In view of all the circumstances shown, her testimony was not inherently improbable, and the question of her credibility was for the jury (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1847), who not only had the right but the duty to determine to what extent her testimony should be believed. Estate of Gird, 157 Cal. 534, 108 P. 499, 137 Am. St. Rep. 131; Withers v. Massengill, 148 Cal. 769, 84 P. 769; People v. Kelly, 146 Cal. 119, 79 P. 846; People v. Chesney, 72 Cal. App. 570, 237 P. 793; People v. Raich, 26 Cal. App. 286, 146 P. 907.

[2] According to the testimony of a physician, a physical examination of the child was made by him on October 12, 1925, when it was found that the hymen was almost obliterated and that the external opening into the vagina was considerably enlarged, much more so than would be due to an injury. He further testified, over objection, that as the result of his examination he was of the opinion that the child had indulged in sexual intercourse, and the admission of this testimony is assigned as error.

It was held in the following cases that the opinion of a physician, based upon an examination of the sexual organs of the prosecutrix, that the condition found was caused by a rape, was incompetent: State v. Noonan, 55 Wis. 258, 12 N. W. 379; State v. Bull, 45 W. Va. 767, 32 S. E. 240; People v. Schultz, 260 Ill. 35, 102 N. E. 1045; Simmons v. State, 105 Miss. 48, 61 So. 826. In other jurisdictions, however, it is the rule that in prosecutions for statutory rape the testimony of medical experts following a physical examination that, in their opinion, the prosecutrix has indulged in sexual intercourse is admissible in corroboration of her testimony that intercourse was had with the defendant (State v. Rash, 27 S. D. 185, 130 N. W. 91; Messel v. State, 176 Ind. 214, 95 N. E. 565); and in People v. Liggett, 18 Cal. App. 367, 123 P. 225, the testimony of a physician, by whom an examination was made, that in his opinion intercourse had been effected was held to be competent. Whether the child had indulged in sexual intercourse involved the determination of a probative and not an ultimate fact; and the question whether the condition disclosed by the physician's examination was so caused reasonably called for expert medical opinion, without which persons of ordinary experience would be unlikely to prove capable of forming a correct judgment. The witness expressed no opinion on the ultimate facts in issue, nor did his testimony have the effect of usurping the function of the jury, and its admission was not erroneous.

[3] The defendant, who spoke English imperfectly, was interviewed by a police officer shortly after the arrest. On this occasion he made no reply to a question as to his guilt, but subsequently, according to the testimony of the officer, he expressed a willingness to talk about the case, and stated, in substance, that he had had sexual intercourse with the child. Later the statement was repeated through an interpreter in the presence of the deputy district attorney and other officers. It does not appear that previous to his statement to the police officer the defendant was advised that he need make no statement, or that his statements would be used against him, or that he was entitled to the advice of counsel. On the last occasion, however, according to the testimony of the deputy district attorney, he was advised that it was his right to refuse to make a statement, and that any statement which he might make could be used against him. The defendant denied that he was advised as to his rights before making either of the statements, but sufficient was shown to justify the conclusion of the trial court that they were freely and voluntarily made, and their admission in evidence was proper.

[4] Though it is essential that the preliminary proof show that the confession was voluntarily made without previous inducement or intimidation, yet the question whether the preliminary proof is sufficient is one of fact addressed to, and must be determined by, the trial court. People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 95 P. 863.

[5] The jury was instructed that it was for them to determine whether the statements were procured by threats or promises, or induced by hope or fear, and that if they found that they were not made freely and voluntarily to reject them. Aside from the fact that the defendant was in custody and that he was without the advice of counsel, nothing appears from the record which supports the contention that the statements were not free and voluntary, and we are satisfied that the implied finding of the jury was fully sustained by the evidence.

[6] The court, at the request of the prosecution, instructed the jury as follows:

"The court instructs you that the fact, should you so find, that the female made no outcry, complaint, or resistance in any form is immaterial where she was under the age of consent at the time the offense was committed, for under such circumstances the law resists for her."

Defendant concedes that, as respects consent, the fact that the child made no outcry, complaint, or resistance is immaterial, but contends that on the question of her credibility a failure to complain was relevant; that the instruction was not confined to the element of consent and was therefore erroneous.

It is evident, however, from a reading of the whole instruction, that the court was referring to the conduct of the prosecutrix at the time of the alleged commission of the act and not to a subsequent failure to complain. Such we think, was its plain meaning, and, so construed, it was not erroneous or misleading.

We cannot say that the jury was influenced by prejudice or passion in arriving at its verdict, which was supported by the evidence, or that the result was a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Ex parte BALDWIN. (Cr. 1529.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 18, 1927.

1. Courts ⇨114—Court's nunc pro tunc entry after appeal of record of admission of former conviction held valid, and to show jurisdiction foreclosing release.

On habeas corpus by one convicted in two cases of possession of intoxicating liquor on theory that penalties were in excess of jurisdiction, in view of fact that defendant, at time of plea, admitted alleged prior conviction, municipal court's entering nunc pro tunc order amending minutes to show such admission was proper, and prevented release of defendant on habeas corpus, regardless of pendency of appeal from order amending minutes.

2. Criminal law ⇨121—Sentencing one formerly convicted to 30 days' imprisonment and to pay $750 fine or suffer 75 days' imprisonment in separate cases for possession of intoxicating liquors held within municipal court's jurisdiction.

Where defendant had been previously convicted of possession of intoxicating liquors, sentence in municipal court in one case for such possession of 30 days' imprisonment, and in another case of a fine of $750, or, in lieu thereof, 75 days' imprisonment, was not beyond maximum lawful penalty.

3. Intoxicating liquors ⇨216—Complaint describing liquor alleged to have been possessed without designating it by particular name held sufficient (Wright Act, § 2; National Prohibition Act [27 USCA § 4]).

In view of Wright Act, § 2 (St. 1921, p. 79), adopting Volstead Act, complaint for possession of intoxicating liquor which described it was not defective for failure to designate by name particular kind of liquor described as intoxicating by National Prohibition Act, tit. 2, § 1 (27 USCA § 4 [U. S. Comp. St. § 10138½]), as, for example, that it was whisky or wine.

4. Intoxicating liquors ⇨222—Complaint for possession of intoxicating liquor need not specify possession was not within exception authorized by Volstead Act (Wright Act, § 2; 27 USCA § 12).

In view of Wright Act, § 2 (St. 1921, p. 79), adopting Volstead Act, complaint for possession of intoxicating liquor may state cause of action without specifying that possession was not within one of exceptions authorized by Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 3 (27 USCA § 12 [U. S. Comp. St. § 10138½aa]).

Original application by Mamie Baldwin for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles. Petitioner remanded to custody.

A. T. Folsom, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

E. J. Lickley, City Prosecutor, and J. W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Deputy City Prosecutor, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. [1] Mamie Baldwin, in whose behalf the petition was filed, is held in custody under two judgments of the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, in causes numbered 07879 and 08870, which by stipulation were tried jointly before a jury. Each complaint charged the commission of a misdemeanor by having in possession alcoholic intoxicating liquors, etc. Each complaint alleged that the defendant, before the commission of the stated offense, had been convicted in the same court of another offense of like character with the one for which defendant was now being prosecuted. In the original petition on which the writ was issued herein, petitioner alleged that there was no finding by court or jury in said causes of any previous conviction. For this reason petitioner claimed that the judgments were in excess of the jurisdiction of the court in this, that in cause No. 07879 the court imposed a sentence of 30 days' imprisonment, whereas the maximum penalty that could have been imposed would have been a fine of $500; and also in this, that in cause No. 08870 the court imposed a sentence of $750, or that, in lieu thereof, the defendant suffer imprisonment for a term of 75 days, whereas the maximum penalty that could have been imposed would have been $500 fine.

In the return to the writ it was stated that in each of said actions the defendant, at the time of entering her plea of not guilty to the pending charge, admitted the prior conviction as alleged in the complaint.

Thereafter, by permission of this court, petitioner filed an amended petition in which she alleged:

"Each of the complaints in said causes bears a memorandum notation 'Admits prior,' which is undated, unsigned, with no indication by whom it was placed there or at what time, such notation not appearing in the memorandum of proceedings on the back of the complaint, but appearing upon the face thereof, and there is no record in the proceedings of the court to show that the defendant made any admission of prior conviction of the offense alleged in the complaint in either case in open court during any of the proceedings therein in either case, the said anonymous notations on the said complaints being the only notations or memoranda regarding such alleged prior convictions, which appeared either in the files or records of either cause at the time of the sentence of the defendant in each of said causes; and said files and records do not now show any finding either by the court or the jury that the defendant, in either of said causes, had been previously convicted of the offense alleged in the complaint as a previous conviction."

Thereafter, by permission of this court, respondent amended the return to the writ so that in each case it is stated that the court by order entered in its minutes has amended its record so as to show that at the time of making her plea of not guilty to the pending charge the defendant admitted prior conviction.

tion of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor as charged in the complaint. Further, in support of this amendment to the return, respondent filed a certified copy of the minutes of the municipal court, duly signed by the judge and certified by the clerk of the court. In each order amending minutes it is recited that, it appearing that the proceedings referred to in the minutes as originally entered are not fully and completely set forth, it is ordered that the record of the proceedings had herein at the stated date be amended to read as stated in the amending order. The minutes as thus amended state the fact of arraignment and that defendant pleaded not guilty to the pending charge, but admitted the prior conviction.

The fact appears to be that down to and including the time when the judgments were entered there was no record of the fact that defendant admitted prior conviction. Across the face of each complaint in a blank space there had been written the words "Admits prior," but there had been no other record or attempt to make a record of admission of prior conviction, neither was there any finding by the court or jury upon a trial of that issue. But it now appears to be a fact, as shown by the corrected record of the minutes, that the defendant at the time of entering her plea did in each case admit the fact of the alleged conviction.

Counsel for petitioner contends that each one of said orders of amendment of the minutes of the municipal court was made without authority of law in this, that each of said orders was made ex parte, upon application of the prosecution, without notice to defendant or defendant's counsel, and affected the substantial rights of the defendant; that from each of said orders of amendment of the minutes the defendant has appealed to the superior court, which appeal in each instance is now pending and undecided; that by reason of these facts petitioner is entitled to have this proceeding determined without reference to said orders of amendment of minutes and without consideration thereof.

[2] We are satisfied that the municipal court had jurisdiction to enter the nunc pro tunc order amending its minutes. For the purpose of the present proceeding we are not concerned with any errors which the court may have committed in the exercise of such jurisdiction. There is definite authority that the court has power in a proper case to make such order of amendments of its minutes. Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 209 P. 892; Halpern v. Superior Court, 190 Cal. 384, 388, 212 P. 916. Upon the record as now before us, showing the fact of prior conviction, it must be held that petitioner's claim that the judgments were in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, in that each of them imposed a sentence beyond the maximum lawful penalty, is without merit.

[3] Petitioner further contends that the judgments are void because each of them was based on a complaint which failed to charge the defendant with a public offense in this, that it charged the defendant with mere possession of intoxicating liquor, "without stating that such liquor was any of the specific kinds of liquor described as intoxicating liquor by section 1 of title 2 of the National Prohibition Act (27 USCA § 4; U. S. Comp. St. § 10138½), or that it was other than those specifically defined as intoxicating liquor, containing the prohibited amount of alcohol, and further failed to set forth any facts which would render such possession unlawful."

The complaints are substantially alike. In each case it is represented that at the place and time stated, the defendant did willfully and unlawfully have in possession "certain alcoholic intoxicating liquors, which are fit for use for beverage purposes, which did then and there contain more than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol, contrary," etc.

"All acts or omissions prohibited or declared unlawful by the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States or by the Volstead Act are hereby prohibited and declared unlawful; and violations thereof are subject to the penalties provided in the Volstead Act." Section 2 of the California statute commonly known as the Wright Act, Stats. 1921, p. 79; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 3784.

It is provided by the Volstead Act that:

"No person shall * * * possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this chapter, and all the provisions of this chapter shall be liberally construed to the end that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage may be prevented." Barnes' Federal Code, 1919-24 Cum. Supp. p. 849 (27 USCA § 12; U. S. Comp. St. § 10138½aa).

The Volstead Act provides that the phrase "intoxicating liquor" shall be construed to include alcohol and other specified liquors, "by whatever name called, containing one-half of 1 per centum or more of alcohol by volume which are fit for use for beverage purposes." We are of the opinion that the description of the liquor alleged to have been held in possession by the defendant, without designating by name the particular kind of liquor (as, for example, that it was whisky or that it was wine), does not prevent the complaint from stating a cause of action. People v. Silva, 67 Cal. App. 351, 227 P. 976.

[4] We are further of the opinion that such complaint may state a cause of action without specifying that defendant's possession of the liquor was not within one of the exceptions authorized by the Volstead Act. People v. Cencevich, 64 Cal. App. 39, 44, 220 P. 448.

It is ordered that the prisoner be remanded to custody.

PACIFIC EMPLOYERS' INS. CO. v. ARENBURST, FARAHAN & LORAN et al.
(Civ. 5861.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 27, 1927.

1. Insurance ⇨379(7)—Agent in filling out application blank is agent of company, even though policy states otherwise.

The act of an insurance agent in filling in an application blank is the act of his company, even though the policy designates the agent as the agent of the insured.

2. Insurance ⇨146(1, 3)—Construction is to determine intention; ambiguities are interpreted against insurer.

Where the language used in an insurance policy is ambiguous or uncertain, the main object in construction is to determine in what sense the words employed were intended, and uncertainties will be interpreted against the insurer, since it drew the contract.

3. Insurance ⇨379(1)—Error of agent in stating in application that relationship of coinsureds was that of copartners held to estop company from denying such relationship.

Where insureds, who were not partners, in good faith truthfully answered questions contained in an insurance application, but the agent incorrectly designated their relationship as a copartnership, the insurance company was estopped, in an action upon the policy, to assert the falsity of such statement.

4. Insurance ⇨379(1)—That not insurance company's agent but agent's employee obtained information on which agent incorrectly designated insureds as copartners held not to relieve company from liability on policy.

Fact that the information upon which an insurance agent based his erroneous statement in the policy application that persons insured were copartners was not obtained by agent, but by his employee, held immaterial and insufficient to relieve insurance company from liability to persons insured on the policy.

Certiorari by Pacific Employers' Insurance Company to annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding Emily Jane Moffett compensation for the death of her son as against Arenbrust, Farahan & Loran and another, employers. Award affirmed.

W. R. Millington, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner and Gordon S. Keith, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. An award was made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of respondent Emily Jane Moffett and against petitioner, Pacific Employers' Insurance Company, on account of the accidental death of Mrs. Moffett's son, the award being based upon a finding that on September 2, 1926, at Stockton, Cal., "while in the employ of the defendant Dennis Loran, named herein as one of the firm of Arenbrust, Farahan & Loran, at which time the employer was insured against liability," the deceased sustained injuries arising out of and in the course of said employment which proximately caused his immediate death. Said insurance company now seeks by this proceeding in certiorari to have the award annulled, the main contention being that the contract of insurance under which its liability attaches was vitiated by false representations made by the assured as to the existence of said firm as a copartnership.

The policy was issued by the company at its San Francisco office, upon a written application prepared by or under the direction of Alan B. Hicks, the company's licensed agent at Stockton, and forwarded by him to the San Francisco office, the assured taking no part in its preparation except to give the information upon which the answers contained therein were based. When completed said application set forth the following questions and answers:

"Name of this employer, Arenbrust, Farahan & Loran. P. O. address, 712 East Jackson street, Stockton, Cal. Individual, copartnership, corporation, or estate? A copartnership."

With reference to the business relationship of the individuals named, as it existed at the time the insurance was applied for, Loran, who was the sole witness upon the subject, testified that Arenbrust, Farahan and himself had been separately engaged in the trucking business in and around Stockton, each owning and operating his own truck and hiring and paying his own men; that at a hearing of the Railroad Commission in Stockton "it was deemed advisable for men who had a single truck to form sort of a combination for the reason [that] when one truck was in operation we had to find some means of taking care of something that might turn up otherwise;" that thereafter their trucks were operated under such an agreement, whereby jobs were taken care of jointly, providing one truck could not handle the work alone, and that when so operated each owner was paid for the amount of work his truck had done, each owner taking care of his own expenses, and there being no division of income or expenses; that common headquarters were maintained at Farahan's home, 712 East Jackson street, Stockton.

Loran further testified that the foregoing working arrangement was explained when the policy was applied for, and in this respect his testimony was fully supported by that of Hicks, who testified in part as follows:

"A. The business was secured in the first place by my father out of the office. I am the licensed agent here for the company, but the business was secured through the office.

"Q. Did you talk with any of these men about the situation? A. No. The three men, Arenbrust, Farahan, and Loran, came into the office and applied for compensation insurance as Arenbrust, Farahan and Loran, working together. My understanding was that they were working together, and that when Farahan had too much work he would call in Loran, and the same would apply to Arenbrust, when their business was greater than they could take care of individually.

"Q. That is practically the same as Mr. Loran testified to here this morning? A. I couldn't hear very much from back there. That was the working arrangement, and we drew up a policy that way, the three men. The intention of the policy was— I understood how they were working and when I sent the application that way I figured to give them protection jointly and singly.

"Q. Did this policy describe them as partners? A. Described them, I believe, as a copartnership, 'co' meaning with or together, which I thought would answer the purpose.

"Q. You say you were a licensed agent here or at that time for the company? A. Am still.

"Q. Do I understand from that you are company's agent or called a broker licensed to handle their business? A. I am a licensed agent of the company. Not a broker; no."

[1] When an insured in good faith makes truthful answers to the questions contained in the application, but his answers, owing to the fraud, mistake, or negligence of the agent filling out the application, are incorrectly transcribed, the company is estopped to assert their falsity as a defense to the policy. The acts of the agent, whether he is a general agent with power to issue policies, a soliciting agent, or merely a medical examiner for the company, are in this respect the acts of the company, and he cannot be regarded as the agent of the insured, even though it is so stipulated in the application. Layton v. New York Life Ins. Co., 55 Cal. App. 202, 202 P. 958; Lyon v. United Moderns, 148 Cal. 470, 83 P. 804; Westphall v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 27 Cal. App. 734, 151 P. 159; Schmitt v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 169 Minn. 106, 210 N. W. 846.

[2] The authorities further hold that an insurance policy is a contract of indemnity for loss; and where the language used is ambiguous and may be understood in more senses than one, the main object is, as in the case of construction of contracts generally, to determine in what sense the words employed were intended; and that in the determination of such question the contract shall be construed liberally in favor of the insured, and any uncertainty or ambiguity therein be interpreted most strongly against the insurance carrier, because of the fact that the carrier draws the contract (Meyerstein v. Great American Ins. Co. [Cal. App.] 255 P. 220; Victoria S. S. Co. v. Western Assur.

Co. of Toronto, 167 Cal. 348, 139 P. 807); that under certain circumstances some flexibility of meaning must be given the standard forms of insurance, and the rigid language used therein interpreted in the light of the common understanding of the parties in order to do justice between them (Taylor v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co., 34 Cal. App. 471, 167 P. 899).

[3] It clearly appears from the evidence above narrated that the assureds in obtaining the insurance made no misrepresentations of any kind as to their business relationship, but, on the contrary, fully, fairly, truthfully, and in good faith explained to petitioner's agent the arrangement under which they were conducting their affairs; and there is no evidence indicating a subsequent departure from the plan thus explained. The evidence also shows that the statement in the application as to the existence of a copartnership did not emanate from them, but represented the agent's legal conclusion drawn from facts correctly related to him, and was by him inserted in the application; furthermore, that the very object in applying for said policy was to cover the class of employment in question, and that the use of the term "copartnership" by the agent in describing said business relationship was intended by him and understood by the assureds as giving to the latter insurance coverage "jointly and singly." Even assuming, therefore, that the legal appellation given by the agent to said business relationship was a misnomer, it cannot be said to be due to any fraud practiced by the assureds, but at most amounted to a mistaken legal conclusion on the part of the agent, and, consequently, under the authorities hereinabove cited, the insurance carrier is estopped to assert falsity as a defense to the policy.

[4] The fact that the information relating to the working arrangement was obtained by an employee in Hicks' office rather than by Hicks personally does not affect the situation, for the reason that the transaction of the issuance of the policy was consummated through the Hicks agency, and Hicks was cognizant of all the facts before he forwarded the application to the company's office in San Francisco. Nor does it matter that at the time of applying for insurance protection the assureds were aware that the cost of the policy as issued would be less than if policies were issued to them separately, for, as shown, there was no fraud or deceit practiced, and apparently the item of expense in obtaining insurance coverage was only incidental to the main object of their business association, which was to obtain more employment for their individual trucks.

The award is affirmed.

Where evidence in robbery prosecution failed to show any taking, a conviction cannot be sustained, since, under Pen. Code, § 211, there must be a felonious taking to constitute "robbery."

4. Larceny ☞70(3)—Where evidence was lacking to show taking of personal property, instructions as to larceny in robbery trial held unnecessary (Pen. Code, § 1159).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Willard H. Foss was convicted of robbery. From the judgment of conviction, and an order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Cantillon & Hamilton, Thomas P. White, A. P. G. Steffes, and Vincent C. Hickson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery and upon this appeal makes the contention that the evidence was insufficient to show the commission of that crime by him.

At the trial Thomas N. Littlewood, charged by the information to have been the victim of the robbery, testified that in the evening of October 2, 1926, he hailed the defendant, who was a taxicab driver and previously unknown to him, and entered his taxicab; that after driving to various places in defendant's taxicab they went about midnight to a hotel, where defendant engaged a room, to which he took Littlewood and a third person; that at the time they entered the room Littlewood took from his pockets a roll of bills and paid therefrom defendant's charges, amounting to about $3, and then put the balance of the money back in his pockets; that Littlewood then had in his possession about $140; that previously during their ride Littlewood had exhibited some, if not all, of his money in the presence of defendant; that upon being paid his charges defendant left the room and Littlewood undressed, placing his clothes upon a chair; that in a few minutes and while said third person was still present, defendant came back into the room and began beating Littlewood with his fists, striking him on the head and making him unconscious, but that Littlewood got several good looks at him before this happened and knew that it was the defendant; that Littlewood had not given the defendant or said third person permission to take any of his money and did not turn any of it over to said third person that night; that when Littlewood came to, he found himself alone in the room, and at once rushed from the room into the street without waiting to dress and shouted for help; that one Shepard came to his assistance and went with him back to the room, where Littlewood dressed, and then got into a car and went to the San Pedro Police Station and made a report.

Mrs. Ulma Helvig testified that she was the landlady of the hotel to which Littlewood went with the defendant; that defendant rented the room from her, and that afterwards she heard some knocks and thumps and a moan, and thinking some one was sick she sent a boy named Donald to call Shepard, who was a roomer at the hotel. She did not go out herself and did not testify that she ever saw Littlewood at all or witnessed anything occurring between him and defendant.

Stanley C. Shepard testified that he was a lodger at the hotel in question; that shortly after midnight of October 2d the boy Donald came and knocked at his door and said some one was being robbed. The statement as to what Donald said was not made in response to any question, and when the witness made it an objection was made and sustained to the conversation between him and Donald, but no formal motion to strike out the above statement was made. Shepard further testified that he then got up, dressed, and went out on the street; that he found Littlewood there and took him back into his room, where he got dressed, and Shepard then took him to the San Pedro Police Station.

Henry L. Evans, a police officer, testified that he saw Littlewood at the San Pedro Police Station about 1 a. m. of October 3d, and there were then a few scratches on his face. On cross-examination, the defendant asked this witness:

"Q. Did you examine the witness, Mr. Littlewood, to ascertain whether or not he had any money on him?"

To this question the people objected that it was wholly immaterial and not proper cross-examination, and the court sustained the objection on the latter ground, which appears to have been well taken.

Joe Williamson, also a police officer, testified that he saw Littlewood at the San Pedro Police Station about 1 a. m. of October 3d; that "he seemed to be somewhat excited in telling about the things that occurred earlier in the evening; that he had been robbed, and on his cheek was a notch or bruise on his cheekbone and another one on the edge of his jawbone just to the right of the chin."

[1-3] The foregoing is the substance of all the testimony material to the point on which we must decide this appeal. To constitute the crime of robbery, there must be a felonious taking of personal property (section 211, Pen. Code), but the evidence in this case wholly fails to show any taking. The complaining witness testified clearly and positively that he had $140 in his possession just before he was assaulted by defendant, but he gave no testimony whatever tending to prove that any part of it was taken from him by any one. As far as this court can determine from a careful examination of all of the testimony in the record, he may still have it. In response to appellant's argument on this point, the respondent asserts in its brief that Littlewood testified that when he came to his money was gone, but refers us to no place in the record where any such testimony appears, and a purported résumé of the whole evidence contained in another part of the same brief fails to state any such testimony. We cannot regard such unfortified argumentative assertions as evidence. The nearest approach to any testimony upon this point was the question asked of a police officer as to whether he had searched Littlewood for money, and the answer to this question was blocked by objection made by the prosecutor. The hearsay testimony of Shepard that the boy Donald told him some one was being robbed was probably excluded from the jury's consideration by the ruling of the court on the objection (Bloomberg v. Lavalent, 179 Cal. 620, 178 P. 496), but even if it may be regarded as remaining in the record, it is not sufficient to support a finding that Littlewood was robbed. The testimony of Officer Williamson that Littlewood complained at the police station of being robbed is also hearsay, but was given without objection. Even if these two hearsay statements can be considered at all, they are mere conclusions and do not set forth any of the facts necessary to constitute robbery or identify such robbery with that charged in the indictment. The judgment must be reversed for want of sufficient evidence to uphold the verdict.

[4-7] Appellant requested the court to instruct the jury as to the offenses of larceny and simple assault, which the court refused to do, and appellant now argues that these were lesser offenses which are necessarily included in the offense of robbery, and, therefore, under section 1159 of the Penal Code the instructions requested should have been given. In view of the total lack of evidence as to any taking of personal property, no instructions as to larceny were necessary, and the failure to give them was not error. The evidence was sufficient to warrant a conviction of simple assault. Pen. Code, § 240. It has been held that the offense of simple assault is included within the offense of assault with intent to commit robbery (People v. Demasters, 105 Cal. 669, 39 P. 35; People v. Mallon, 103 Cal. 513, 37 P. 512), and that the last-mentioned offense is included within the offense of robbery (People v. Allen, 32 Cal. App. 110, 162 P. 401). It follows that the offense of simple assault is also included within robbery, and the court erred in refusing to give the instructions requested on this point. In view of the lack of evidence justifying the verdict of robbery, we must hold that this error was prejudicial and resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded to the superior court for a new trial.

1. Appeal and error ~~§~~343(1)—Appeal will not be dismissed as not taken in time where record shows no service of notice of entry of judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 660).

Motion to dismiss appeal on ground that it was not filed or taken within time provided by law will be denied where record fails to disclose whether service of notice of entry of judgment had ever been made on appellant, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 660.

2. Appeal and error ~~§~~348(1)—Recitals in appellant's notice of motion for new trial and of appeal did not waive service of notice of entry of judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 660).

Recitals contained in appellant's notice of motion for new trial and in his notice of appeal from judgment may not be availed of as waiver by him of required service of notice of entry of judgment so as to start running the 2 months' period within which trial court might have acted on motion for new trial, under Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Phil D. Swing, Judge.

Action by L. A. Jackson against E. J. Dolan and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Gregory Ashe appeals. On motion to dismiss. Motion denied.

Randall, Bartlett & White, Vincent C. Hickson, and A. P. G. Steffes, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a money judgment entered in the plaintiff's favor by the superior court in and for the county of Imperial. Subsequent to the entry of such judgment and on December 17, 1920, the defendants moved for a new trial. The minutes of the trial court, as originally recorded, showed the motion for a new trial to have been granted as to the defendant Ashe and denied as to the defendant Dolan on Friday, Deember 31, 1920. Within the statutory period the plaintiff served and filed his notice of appeal from the order granting a new trial to the defendant Ashe. On March 23, 1921, and pending the determination of his appeal from the order granting such new trial, the plaintiff filed in the trial court a notice of motion to direct the clerk of that court to correct its minutes so as to show that the order purporting to grant a new trial to the defendant Ashe had, in fact, been made and filed on Sunday, January 2, 1921, and not on Friday, December 31, 1920, as the minutes of the trial court then indicated. The significance of this motion lies in the fact that the term of office of the superior judge who made said order had expired on midnight of December 31, 1920. After hearing thereon, the trial court made an order denying the plaintiff's motion to correct the minutes. Upon an appeal therefrom the District Court of Appeal reversed said order (Jackson v. Dolan, 58 Cal. App. 372, 208 P. 315), with directions that the trial court ascertain the true date of the order granting to the defendant Ashe a new trial and correct its minutes accordingly. Thereafter the plaintiff renewed in the lower court his motion to correct the minutes whereupon said court, on May 16, 1924, made an order, in obedience to the mandate of the appellate court, correcting its minutes. As corrected, the minutes show the order granting a new trial to have been made and filed on Sunday, January 2, 1921—two days after the expiration of the term of office of the superior judge purporting to make the same. An appeal prosecuted by the defendant Ashe from the order of the trial court correcting its minutes terminated in an affirmance of the order. Jackson v. Dolan, 72 Cal. App. 48, 236 P. 318. Thereafter and on March 27, 1925, the District Court of Appeal filed its decision reversing the order of the trial court granting to the defendant Ashe a new trial. Jackson v. Dolan, 72 Cal. App. 51, 236 P. 319. In reversing said order the appellate court declared that the action of the trial judge in granting the motion after the expiration of his term of office was functus officio and void; that the case therefore stood, in legal contemplation, as though no order disposing of the motion for new trial had been made; and that the motion for new trial was therefore deemed to have been denied by the lapse of time provided for in section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant Ashe, on May 21, 1925, and within 30 days after the decision reversing the order granting to him a new trial had become final, filed his appeal herein from the judgment entered in the plaintiff's favor on December 15, 1920.

On February 26, 1927, the respondent filed in this court a notice of motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment, it being asserted in said notice of motion that the appeal had not been filed or taken within the time provided by law. The motion to dismiss was granted by this court on March 7, 1927, and an order made dismissing the appeal. A petition for rehearing was thereupon filed herein by the appellant Ashe, which petition led the court to conclude that the appellant had not been served with proper notice of the motion to dismiss his appeal. The order dismissing the said appeal was for this reason vacated and the matter ordered on the June, 1927, calendar of this court. Upon the calling of that calendar, the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment was argued at length by counsel, and said motion is now before us upon its merits.

The appellant asserts that the facts of this case present a novel situation and suggests that where, as here, an order granting a new trial is declared upon an appeal therefrom to be void, and for this reason reversed, the time for an appeal from the judgment should be held not to expire until 30 days have elapsed after the filing in the trial court of the remittitur issued upon such reversal of the order granting a new trial. In advancing this contention the appellant attempts to find comfort in that part of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides for the taking of an appeal from a judgment within 30 days after entry in the trial court of the order determining a motion for new trial "or other termination in the trial court of the proceedings upon such motion." The filing in the trial court of the remittitur issued upon the reversal of the order granting a new trial is asserted by the appellant to constitute such "other termination" in the lower court of the proceedings on new trial as to warrant the taking of an appeal from the judgment within 30 days thereafter.

The respondent and moving party urges, in support of his motion to dismiss, that the only termination, contemplated by the provisions of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure, of proceedings on new trial, other than the trial court's order thereon, is that which results from the expiration of the 2 months' period prescribed by section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Reasoning from this premise, the respondent concludes that the appeal herein was not taken within 30 days of the expiration of said 2 months' period.

[1] In the treatment by counsel of the problem presented herein a matter which we deem decisive thereof has escaped attention. In our opinion the record before us will not warrant the granting of the motion to dismiss, for said record fails to disclose whether service of notice of the entry of judgment had ever been made upon the appellant. Section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, in part, that:

"The power of the court to pass on motion for a new trial shall expire within two months after the verdict of the jury or service on the moving party of notice of the entry of the judgment. If such motion is not determined within said two months, the effect shall be a denial of the motion without further order of the court."

The absence from the record herein of any showing of service of notice of the entry of judgment precludes, at this time, an accurate determination of the period within which the trial court might have passed upon the motion for new trial. This being so, we are unable to ascertain the exact date upon which the motion for new trial was denied by operation of law. It is true that in the case of Jackson v. Dolan, 72 Cal. App. 51, 236 P. 319, it is asserted that the motion for new trial is deemed to have been denied by the expiration of the 2 months' period prescribed in section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That case fails to indicate, however, when such statutory denial of the motion for new trial occurred. In the absence of a showing herein of the service of notice of the entry of judgment, it is impossible for us to ascertain the exact time of the termination in the trial court of the proceedings on new trial. This, in turn, precludes a declaration that the instant appeal from the judgment was not taken within 30 days of the termination in the trial court of the new trial proceedings.

[2] From what has already been said, it is apparent that this conclusion is rendered necessary by reason of the absence from the record of any showing of service upon the appellant of notice of the entry of judgment. Our examination of the record has failed to disclose any thing tending to suggest a waiver by the appellant of such notice of the entry of judgment. The recitals contained in the appellant's notice of motion for new trial and in his notice of appeal from the judgment may not be availed of as a waiver by appellant of the required service of notice of the entry of judgment so as to start running the 2 months' period within which the trial court might have, under the provisions of section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure, acted upon the motion for new trial. Strehlow v. Mothorn, 197 Cal. 112, 114-116, 239 P. 850. That case refers with approval to the case of Moore v. Strayer, 175 Cal. 171, 165 P. 530, wherein it was contended upon motion to dismiss an appeal that the appellants by serving and filing their notice of intention to move for a new trial without waiting for service of notice of the decision of the court had thereby set in motion the running of the time within which the trial court had power to determine said motion, and that said motion, not having been determined by the court within said time, had been denied by operation of law upon a date more than 30 days prior to the filing of the notice of appeal. In passing upon this contention the court, in Moore v. Strayer, supra, declared:

"If the rights of the party appealing were alone to be considered, the giving of the notice of intention might, as to him, be construed as a waiver of service of notice of decision, but the provision relates to the power of the court, jurisdiction of which to pass upon the motion is divested only by the service of notice of decision followed by the lapse of a period of three months, during which it is empowered to act on the motion for a new trial."

The opinion in the case of Strehlow v. Mothorn, supra, states that:

"The Legislature of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 240) amended the foregoing amendment to said section by substituting the words 'notice of the entry of the judgment' in place of the words 'notice of the decision of the court,' and the Legislature of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 233) further amended the same by shortening the time within which the power of the trial court to pass upon motions for new trial must be exercised from 'three months' to two months. In making said latter amendment the Legislature re-enacted the section with the interpretation which this court had theretofore placed upon it."

It follows, therefore, that in the absence from the record in the instant case of any showing of service of notice of the entry of judgment the time within which the trial court might have passed upon the motion for new trial is not susceptible of definite ascertainment. In view of this fact, we are not prepared to hold that the appeal from the judgment was taken more than 30 days after the trial court might have acted upon the motion for new trial.

The motion to dismiss said appeal is therefore denied.

PEOPLE v. GALLOWAY. (Cr. 2961.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 2, 1927.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 923(2)—In murder trial, juror's concealment, on voir dire, of prejudice authorized court to grant new trial; misconduct not being known to defendant until after conviction (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1181, subd. 3).

Where, in murder trial, juror concealed her prejudiced state of mind when examined on voir dire, and entered upon her duties as juror, her misconduct not being known to accused until after trial and verdict, court was authorized, by virtue of Pen. Code, $\S$ 1181, subd. 3, to grant accused a new trial.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 923(2)—Court may grant new trial because of juror's prejudice arising after she is sworn unless accused failed to exercise diligence, knew of misconduct before verdict, or was not injured thereby (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1181, subd. 3).

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1181, subd. 3, court may grant new trial because of juror's misconduct arising after she is sworn as jury member, subject to the qualification that the misconduct will not be considered sufficient, where accused has failed to exercise diligence in the premises, or has knowledge prior to the verdict of such misconduct, or has not been injured thereby.

3. Jury $\S$ 33(2)—Juror's withholding fact of prejudice on voir dire violated defendant's constitutional right of jury trial (Const. art. 1, $\S$ 7).

Where juror had actual prejudice against the prisoner but withheld such fact on her voir dire, trial was in violation of Const. art. 1, $\S$ 7, guaranteeing that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 956(8)—Court erred in refusing to consider affidavits of prejudicial statements of juror made both before and after being sworn.

Where accused filed affidavits setting forth statements of juror showing prejudice, such statements having been made both before and after juror's being sworn, court erred in striking out and refusing to consider the affidavits on motion for new trial.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 763, 764(17)—In murder trial, charge that evidence of drunkenness could be considered only in determining degree of crime violated defendant's constitutional right (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 19).

Court's charge, in murder trial, that "Evidence of drunkenness in murder cases can only be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining the degree of crime, and for that purpose it must be received with great caution," was a violation of Const. art. 6, $\S$ 19, forbidding court's charging juries with respect to matters of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Frederick David Galloway, alias Fred Roland, was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

S. F. Holstein, of San Jose, and O'Gara & De Martini, of San Francisco, for appellant.

C. C. Coolidge and Frank J. Waterhouse, both of San Jose, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PRESTON, J. Appellant was convicted and sentenced to pay the death penalty for murder of one Andrew Pashuta. In support of his appeal from the order denying a new trial he urges insufficiency of the evidence to justify conviction for first degree murder, the elements of premeditation and deliberation being, so it is claimed, wholly unproved, erroneous instructions given by the trial court to the jury, and prejudicial misconduct on the part of one of the jurors.

The homicide occurred on the last of the Rose Festival at San Jose, Saturday, May 22, 1926, about midnight, on a road near the highway to Monterey, some four or five miles from San Jose. On the preceding Thursday appellant and deceased had met for the first time in St. James Park and became acquainted through their mutual fondness for the ukulele, which both had and played. They spent Thursday evening, part of Friday, and Saturday evenings together. Appellant was at that time about 24 years of age, while Pashuta was a year or so younger. Pashuta resided in San Jose at the house of Mrs. Ida M. Bunch, 353 South Fourth street, and as appellant was only in town for the festival Pashuta introduced him to Mrs. Bunch as his friend, and on the fateful evening had asked her permission for appellant to occupy his room with him that night. The boys went to Pashuta's room to dress for the evening, and Pashuta asked Mrs. Bunch to come up and hear appellant play the ukulele, saying, "He can make it talk." He also asked if he might defer payment of his rent as he and appellant wished to have a good little time that evening. The boys left the house in Pashuta's automobile, an old Chevrolet roadster, about 8 o'clock. They first purchased two bottles of "white liquor," and after drinking some of it drove on to St. James Park. There they talked with three other boys, two of whom testified that they drank with both Pashuta and appellant, and one of whom stated Pashuta and appellant were intoxicated while with him and that they left about 10:30 p. m. saying they intended to go to some other place to make some money—evidently Chick Leddy's, a roadhouse. The testimony of the various witnesses, without conflict, shows that appellant and Pashuta were apparently very good friends during this entire period, dancing and singing together and playing their ukuleles.

As to what took place after they left for Chick Leddy's, we have only the testimony of appellant, which was, in substance, as follows: The boys left the park with the intention of driving to the above-mentioned roadhouse, which was some distance south of San Jose, but as it was too early to go there, being only about 11 o'clock, they turned up a side road, facing the machine towards the highway, and there remained until the fatal occurrence. The car belonged to Pashuta, and he drove it. They drank as they went along, Pashuta having a jug of wine in addition to the "white liquor."

When appellant was arrested in Venice, Cal., about two weeks later, he made a written confession, introduced in evidence by the prosecution, stating his subsequent actions to have been substantially as follows: While he and Pashuta were parked near the highway, as above set forth, and while both of them were intoxicated, an argument arose between them. Appellant stated that about six months previous in a fit of despondency he had enlisted in the United States army, from which he had deserted about four months later, after a night of intoxication. This he had confessed to Pashuta, and it was Pashuta's threat to expose him as a deserter which led to the final argument culminating in death.

"Q. Where were you at the time this man threatened to turn you in for desertion? A. To the best of my knowledge, we were seated in his car parked on the Los Angeles Highway south of San Jose.

"Q. How long a time elapsed between the time he made a threat of exposure and the time you killed him? A. As I remember, the act was committed immediately after the voicing of the threat.

"Q. Did you make up your mind at the time he made this threat to kill him? A. I was incapable of making up my mind, but I remember taking up the first thing that came handy and striking at him.

"Q. Did you strike more than one blow? A. I did.

"Q. How many times did you hit him with this crank? A. I have no recollection of how many times I struck him, although it was more than once."

The crank used to start the motor was the weapon used and the autopsy surgeon testified to four wounds on the head and face, two of them of a most serious and brutal character.

Appellant told substantially the same story as a witness at the trial. He there stated:

"I was terrified at the thought of exposure, what it would mean to me and to my people, and the awful disgrace to them. As far as I can remember, at the moment of the threat I lost control of myself, and picked up the first thing that came handy and struck at him. Hazily I remember dragging him from the car into a field at the side of the road. I did not know I had killed him. I returned to the car. After some confusion, finally, I drove to his house where I packed his things with my own, to give the impression I had left."

After the homicide, appellant dragged the body of deceased into a field, a distance of about 75 feet and, placing it in an open furrow, partially covered it with two handfuls of dry grass. He then drove back to San Jose, went to the room of deceased, and took a suit of clothes, an overcoat, and blanket. His statements from the period when they left the park were partially corroborated by the physical condition of the body when found about a week after death, as well as by the blood stains upon the automobile. Mrs. Bunch testified that the next morning she found the room of deceased in great disorder, things all over the floor, dirty clothes in the middle, etc., and that a suit of his clothes was gone and a blanket.

About 2 o'clock Sunday morning a garage man in San Jose, who supplied appellant with two gallons of gas, testified that appellant was nervous and fidgety and aroused his suspicion, but when he questioned him appellant merely stated that he was sleepy. The witness could not say that appellant was not under the influence of liquor.

About 6:15 appellant drove up to the farmhouse of Ed Smith, about four miles north of Salinas on the highway, his engine having stopped for want of water. His actions there were also peculiar. Mr. Smith testified that as appellant drove in, he kind of hit the gate; that after he had tried to fill appellant's radiator for him appellant persisted in attempting to crank the machine and kept talking to it and calling it some odd name; that they finally pushed the machine over towards the barn and as Mr. Smith walked out, he heard appellant playing the ukulele and singing; that when his wife asked him to have appellant come in for breakfast, he said, "Let the boy go on, I do not think from his condition, I do not think he wants any breakfast;" that appellant later attempted to give him seven cents, saying it was all the money he had; that appellant explained the blood spots on his shirt as the result of a fight with a Mexican in San Jose over a girl during a dance; that appellant then left after having a drink of water; that later the same morning he saw appellant in Salinas in a small Greek restaurant; that he asked appellant for his address so he could notify him what the garage man would charge to fix his car; that appellant first gave him the name of "Fred Roland, New York City," and later the address of "2634 Thorpe avenue, Los Angeles"; that appellant's breath was a little loud, or it might have been his side or hip or his clothes, as he considered him sober, but that he knew he could smell "jack" on him. Appellant testified that he adopted the name of Fred Roland while on the stage in New York and continuously thereafter used the same.

Assuming the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict against the attack that as a matter of law it is insufficient, still the cause must be reversed upon another ground.

In support of appellant's motion for a new trial there were offered and read in evidence four affidavits alleging misconduct on the part of Juror Ida M. Roberts, by reason of which a fair and due consideration of the case had been prevented and a verdict arrived at by means other than a fair expression of opinion on the part of impartial jurors. Before setting forth the contents of said affidavits, it should be noted that the case came on for trial September 14, 1926, on which day the entire jury was sworn. On the following day one of the twelve jurors was excused and another juror was selected to take her place, whereupon the entire jury was resworn. Some testimony was also taken on this day. On September 20th the taking of testimony was concluded and arguments for the prosecution and defense heard. On September 21st the district attorney made the closing argument for the prosecution and the jury was instructed and retired. Verdict was rendered on the same day.

The affidavit of O. B. Brott stated, in substance, that while driving his automobile in San Jose on September 12, 1926, Mrs. Finley, Mrs. Pratt, and Mrs. Roberts being with him as guests, said Mrs. Roberts stated in his presence and hearing and that of said other persons, that she would hang anybody that would get drunk.

The affidavit of Mrs. Minnie Hussey stated, in substance, that on September 15, 1926, she met Mrs. Roberts and walked with her along South First street, in San Jose; that on that occasion said Mrs. Roberts stated to her that she had been called as a juror in this case and further stated:

"Well, I have no use for any one that drinks, and I'd hang him."

The affidavit of Alice M. Pratt stated, in substance, that about September 13, 1926, after said Mrs. Roberts had been summoned as one of the jurors in this case, but before her examination, said Mrs. Roberts was present at a ranch of affiant near San Martin; that she stated in the presence of affiant that she expected to be called on the jury, and if so called she would hang him (referring to appellant); that affiant said, "Oh! Ida, I will challenge you;" that said Ida M. Roberts answered, "Just try it;" that thereafter on September 17, 1926, and while said Ida M. Roberts was a juror in the trial of said case, she held a conversation over the telephone with affiant and discussed therein the testimony of the witness Mrs. Bunch; that she related to affiant the testimony given by said witness and said, "Poor little Andrew Pashuta was a fine boy, and it was a shame that this Galloway boy (meaning appellant) had taken him out and given him liquor and started him drinking when he never drank before;" that on Sunday evening, September 19, 1926, said Ida M. Roberts again had a telephone conversation with affiant, discussing therein appellant's testimony, and stating that he was a nice appearing young man and was a nice smooth talker and very calm, but that nevertheless he would hang; that on the evening of September 20, 1926, said Ida M. Roberts had another telephone conversation with affiant in which she stated that the argument of the deputy district attorney was "wonderful" and "masterful"; that appellant's attorney had made some weak sort of argument to try and save his client from the gallows, but she repeated and repeated that appellant would nevertheless hang; that on Sunday, September 19, 1926, affiant visited a ranch near Mountain View with said Ida M. Roberts, and while there said Ida M. Roberts told affiant of the testimony of various witnesses during the trial and, pointing to an irrigation ditch, said, "That is the kind of a ditch or furrow that the Galloway boy put little Andrew Pashuta in and put the grass over him;" that affiant remonstrated with said Ida M. Roberts on several occasions, but said Ida M. Roberts only laughed and shrugged her shoulders and expressed her determination that appellant should hang; that on the evening of September 21, 1926, said Ida M. Roberts telephoned affiant that the case was over and the verdict was hanging, of course; that she further stated three of the jurors held out for a while, but that "We whipped them into line."

The affidavit of Mrs. M. E. Finley stated that about September 15, 1926, affiant was present as a guest in the home of Mrs. Pratt in San Jose, and while there said Ida M. Roberts stated in the presence and hearing of affiant and others that she expected to be selected as a juror to try said case, and, if so, she would hang appellant.

The above affidavits were supplemented by the affidavit of S. F. Holstein stating that he was the only attorney for appellant and that he had no knowledge or information of any of the above set forth statements or conversations at any time until several days after the verdict of the jury had been returned.

In addition, there was introduced in evidence record of the voir dire examination of said Ida M. Roberts. Therein she stated that she knew nothing of the facts of the case except what she had read in the paper; that she had no opinion one way or the other as to the guilt or innocence of appellant; that she thought her mind was open and free for the reception of evidence and knew of no reason why she could not give appellant a fair and impartial trial upon all of the evidence had.

Thereupon there was filed on behalf of the prosecution counter affidavit of said juror, Ida M. Roberts, specifically denying the numerous averments contained in the above-mentioned affidavits and alleging that the conversations referred to in the affidavit of Alice M. Pratt were initiated and solicited by said affiant, Alice M. Pratt; that she, the said Ida M. Roberts, had no feeling or prejudice against appellant; that she was not influenced by any matter out of court, but was guided and governed solely by the evidence of the witnesses and instructions of the court and rendered her verdict solely on such evidence and instructions and gave appellant a fair and impartial trial in all respects. But in her said affidavit, said juror, Ida M. Roberts, did admit the following: That on September 5, 1926, at the ranch house of said Alice M. Pratt, near San Martin, and before affiant had been summoned or otherwise officially notified that her name had been drawn from the jury box to serve on any venire in the trial of any case, and with no particular defendant, case, cause, or trial in mind, and in response to a question asked her by a member of the party, she replied that she would, if acting as a juror in a proper case, vote for the death penalty. She further alleged in her said counter affidavit that said Alice M. Pratt called her on the telephone repeatedly and persistently while she was acting as a juror; that said Alice M. Pratt asked her about the testimony of Mrs. Ida Bunch, to which affiant replied that Mrs. Ida Bunch had spoken clearly and distinctly, and nothing more; that on a later date in reply to a question asked her by said Alice M. Pratt, she stated "that defendant was a nice appearing boy; that he used good English, and that affiant wondered how he got his education," and nothing more; that on the following evening, by means of the telephone, and in response to the question of said Alice M. Pratt, affiant stated that Mr. Frank Waterhouse had made a wonderful and masterful argument and that Mr. Holstein's argument was tiresome, or words to that effect.

On objection of the district attorney, the trial court struck out and refused to consider: (1) Statements set forth in said affidavits alleged to have been made by said juror prior to being sworn; and (2) statements contained therein alleged to have been made subsequent to rendition of verdict. The court refused to permit counsel for appellant to cross-examine said juror with reference to the matter set forth in her affidavit, or to permit him to present four additional affidavits, corroborating the statements contained in the affidavits previously read, in support of his motion for new trial upon the particular ground of misconduct of said juror, and denied said motion. Immediately thereafter counsel for appellant renewed his offer of said additional affidavits, asked to put said Ida M. Roberts on the stand for cross-examination, and stated that one of the additional affidavits was the affidavit of the husband of said affiant, Alice M. Pratt, to the effect that said juror had asked him to call Mrs. Pratt to the telephone, thereby showing that said juror had initiated the conversations relative to said case; that another of said affidavits was that of the wife of said affiant, O. D. Brott, corroborating her husband's statements. The court thereupon refused to reopen the matter or to permit said juror to be cross-examined or said additional affidavits to be filed.

Some confusion appears to have crept into our previous decisions respecting the proper interpretation of subdivision 3 of section 1181 of the Penal Code when read in connection with sections 1066 and 1068 thereof. Under the two last-mentioned sections, a challenge of a juror for actual bias is allowed, but it must be taken before the juror is sworn, or, at the latest, after he is sworn but before the jury is completed. Under the first above-mentioned section, however, the language of the statute is to the effect that the court may grant a new trial when the jury has "been guilty of any misconduct by which a fair and due consideration of the case has been prevented."

In People v. Plummer, 9 Cal. 298, discussing section 440 of the Criminal Practice Act (Wood's Dig. 1850-58, p. 304), which is practically the same as subdivision 3 of section 1181 above mentioned, the court held that where a juror made statements previous to the trial showing actual bias, which rendered him incompetent to try the case, and where a verdict of guilty was found by such juror, a new trial should be granted. In that case it appeared that each of the two jurors in question had answered "satisfactorily" on his voir dire.

Discussing this same section of the Criminal Practice Act, this court in People v. Fair, 43 Cal. 137, 147, expressly overruled the case of People v. Plummer, supra, and held that failure to challenge for actual bias before a juror was sworn foreclosed any inquiry as to that juror's state of mind, for the reason that under said section the existence of actual bias on the part of a juror prior to the time he was actually sworn had not been enumerated as a ground of motion for new trial and, not having been specifically so enumerated, it was in effect expressly excluded and could not be invoked. Relying exclusively upon People v. Fair, supra, two later cases have been found, as follows: People v. Mortimer, 46 Cal. 114, and People v. Samsels, 66 Cal. 99, 4 P. 1061.

This situation remained until the case of People v. Emmons, 7 Cal. App. 685, 702, 95 P. 1032, 1039, where the doctrine in the case of People v. Fair, supra, was alluded to, but apparently weakened by reference thereto as follows:

"We must infer, of course, in support of the action of the court, that appellant knew at the time he examined the juror Johnson of what he proposed to show by the witness Kelly, and that by his failure to present the facts before the trial he waived them."

So the latest expression of the court upon this subject throws doubt upon the rule announced in People v. Fair, supra.

[1] We think that People v. Fair, supra, omits the recognition of a well-defined distinction which exists between a case where a juror was not interrogated upon the subject, or where he admitted his bias and expressed the belief that he could lay it aside, and a case where a juror concealed his prejudiced state of mind when examined on his voir dire and entered upon the discharge of his duty as such juror while in such mental condition. In the second instance, actual bias becomes, where concealed, positive misconduct and continues to be such throughout such juror's service on the case, and if such misconduct is not known to the accused until after the trial and verdict, we see no reason whatsoever why the court should not have power to grant to the accused a new trial, basing it upon said subdivision 3 of section 1181 of the Penal Code. To use as an illustration an extreme situation: Suppose a juror had been actually corrupted, had corruptly agreed to vote for a verdict of guilty regardless of the evidence, had concealed this fact on his voir dire examination, and had served as a juror, the facts respecting the situation being unknown to the accused during trial and only discovered after verdict. Can it be said for a moment that a trial court would be without power to grant a new trial?

We agree with the language of People v. Turner, 39 Cal. 370, 371:

"After an issue of fact is joined in a criminal case, every step thereafter taken for the purpose of a determination of that issue, in the court where the cause is pending, up to and including the verdict upon such issue, must be regarded as a step or proceeding 'arising during the course of the trial,' within the meaning of section 440 of our Criminal Practice Act; hence, any substantial error of the court upon any matter or question intervening between the joining of issue of fact and the rendition of a verdict thereon, and any misconduct of a juror, who participates in the verdict, from the time he is called in the case and sworn and examined on his voir dire up to the final act of rendering the verdict, is proper ground for a motion for a new trial under said section, and on appeal from an order of the court denying or granting such motion, based upon such grounds, the appellate court is confined to a review of the proceedings within these limits."

To the same effect see People v. White, 5 Cal. App. 340, 90 P. 471.

Or as said in Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 385, 80 P. 234, 236:

"The trial of a cause includes all the rulings of the court and the proceedings before it which conduce to the decision which it makes upon the issues in the case as the basis of its judgment."

See, also, Stow v. Superior Court of Alameda County, 178 Cal. 140, 143, 172 P. 598.

[2] We think the proper rule is this: That under section 1181, subd. 3, it is within the power of the trial court to grant to an accused a new trial because of misconduct of a juror whether such misconduct consists of failure to disclose a prejudicial mind at the time he is sworn or whether such misconduct arises after he is sworn as a member of the trial jury, subject, of course, to the qualification that such misconduct will not be considered sufficient where the accused has failed to exercise diligence in the premises or has knowledge prior to the verdict of such misconduct; nor will it avail an accused when, from a consideration of the whole case, it can be seen that he has suffered no injury therefrom. In other words, a safe rule applicable to the situation would be that the court would not be warranted in setting aside a verdict on account of such misconduct unless from a review of the entire case it can be seen that the accused has not only been diligent but has suffered an injustice by reason of the action of such juror.

"The right to unbiased and unprejudiced jurors is an inseparable and inalienable part of the right to a trial by jury guaranteed by the Constitution. Upon this proposition all the authorities agree." Lombardi v. California Street Railway Co., 124 Cal. 311, 317, 57 P. 66, 68. See, also, Sherwin v. Southern Pacific Co., 168 Cal. 722, 145 P. 92.

The holding announced above is in harmony with the declarations of practically all the text-writers. Mr. Wharton in Criminal Pleading and Practice (9th Ed.) p. 605, section 844, states the rule in the following language:

"When it appears after trial that a juror had beforehand prejudged the case, but had improperly withheld this fact before acceptance, or when asked as to opinion on voir dire had given false answers, and such formation of opinion was unknown to the party at the time, a new trial will be granted."

"Where a juror has prejudged defendant's guilt before hearing the sworn testimony, it cannot be said that defendant has had a fair trial before an impartial jury, and a new trial will be granted. Usually this ground is established by proof of prior statements of the juror concerning the case, bias being deemed to be established where the juror's declaration, on his voir dire, that he was not biased, is negated by proof of prior statements of such a character as to show a fixed opinion on the part of the juror, and which, if unknown to defendant until after verdict, will call for a new trial." 16 Corpus Juris (Criminal Law) p. 1154.

"But, if through undiscoverable and unknown wrong, the defendant has been tried and convicted by a panel containing an unfit juror the evidence of which must be very distinct where the verdict is right, a new trial will be granted." Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, § 949 b2.

And as far as we can ascertain, the decisions of practically all the states are to the same effect. Cases in states having statutes identical with our own and sustaining the conclusion herein announced are State v. Mott, 29 Mont. 292, 74 P. 728, and State v. Morgan, 23 Utah, 212, 64 P. 356. Under a similar statute, see State v. Swafford, 88 Wash. 659, 153 P. 1056.

[3] Then, too, our Constitution, section 7, art. 1, provides:

"The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate."

A defendant is entitled to a speedy public trial by an impartial jury, and we think this right is denied him where there are upon the panel one or more jurors who have actual bias against the prisoner and have concealed or withheld the fact on their voir dire. In such case the jury is not omni majores exceptione.

In Sherwin v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, a civil case, this court directly intimated that false statements made by a juror on his voir dire examination furnish a sufficient ground for granting of a new trial, saying:

"It may be conceded that the conduct of the juror Horton in giving a false answer to the questions put to him constituted misconduct or irregularity on his part sufficient to warrant the granting of a new trial therefor. See Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) § 45."

1 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, at page 226, states the rule as follows:

"Sec. 45. If a Juror Be Examined as to his Qualifications and He Does not Answer Truly, a New Trial Will Be Granted.—Where the party has examined the jurors concerning their qualifications, and they do not answer truly, it is manifest that he is deprived of his right of challenge for cause, and is deceived into foregoing his right of peremptory challenge. If on ascertaining the truth he were not allowed to present the matter on motion for new trial, the grossest injustice might be done. The employees or partisans of one party could, by perjury, get on the jury and decide the case for him, or prevent an agreement against him, and no relief could be obtained. This would be contrary to the first principles of justice. And accordingly in most states, the fact that a juror answered falsely as to his qualifications is a recognized ground for a new trial."

[4] Shall a new trial in a civil case be more easily obtained than in a case where life or liberty is involved? It follows that in this case the court should have considered the affidavits tendered not only as to the conduct of the juror after being sworn, but also as to her conduct prior thereto, especially her conduct after she was summoned to serve as a member of the panel.

[5] Again, the court after instructing the jury on the subject of intoxication, ended his charge upon that subject with the following language:

"Evidence of drunkenness in murder cases can only be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining the degree of crime, and for that purpose it must be received with great caution."

Section 19 of article 6 of the Constitution provides that the courts "shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact." The identical instruction here under consideration was before the court in People v. Nihell, 144 Cal. 203, 77 P. 916, where the court said:

"We know of no rule of law which, in view of our constitutional provision as to charging juries upon matters of fact, justifies the giving of such instructions, but we cannot see that the giving of the same could have affected the substantial rights of the defendant."

In the case at bar the actual intoxication of the defendant seems practically certain and up to and within an hour of the time of the tragedy is practically conceded. It rests not upon the testimony of the defendant alone, but upon the testimony of disinterested witnesses. This, too, was practically his sole claim for a reduction of the degree of crime. The above instruction therefore should not have been given.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss any of the further points made by appellant as none of them are likely to arise upon a new trial of the cause.

Judgment reversed.

85 Cal. App. 313

HUGHES et al. v. BEEKLEY. (Civ. 5950.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 2, 1927.

1. Quieting title $\S$ 34(5)—Complaint alleging that judgment held by defendant was cloud on plaintiffs' title to homestead held not to state cause of action, under enumerated sections of statute (Civ. Code, §§ 3412, 3413; Code Civ. Proc. § 1050).

Complaint alleging that judgment against plaintiffs held by defendant clouds plaintiffs' title to premises designated as plaintiffs' homestead held not to state cause of action, under Civ. Code, §§ 3412, 3413, or Code Civ. Proc. § 1050, since there is nothing alleged showing that judgment constituting cloud is void or voidable.

2. Quieting title $\S$ 34(5)—Complaint alleging that defendant's judgment clouds title of plaintiffs to homestead, and that market value thereof was thereby lessened, stated cause of action to quiet title, under statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 738).

Complaint alleging that judgment against plaintiffs held by defendant clouds title of plaintiffs to homestead, and that market value thereof has thereby been lessened so that premises cannot be sold, held to state sufficient cause of action to quiet title, under Code Civ. Proc. § 738.

3. Pleading §403(2)—Defects in complaint may be cured by averments of answer.

It is familiar rule of pleading that defects in complaint may be cured by averments of answer thereto.

4. Quieting title §52—Judgment of dismissal held erroneous, in action to remove cloud of judgment held by defendant from plaintiffs' title to homestead (Civ. Code, §§ 1240, 1241).

In action to quiet title to homestead, in which plaintiffs alleged that judgment held by defendant constituted cloud, judgment of dismissal was erroneous where it was not shown that judgment constituting cloud fell within any of the exceptions of Civ. Code, §§ 1240, 1241, since plaintiffs were entitled to have court determine whether title to homestead property was subject to execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Isadora D. Hughes and husband against Mary E. Beekley, also known as Mary E. Reid. From judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Kenneth E. Matot, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. D. Martindale, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county, dismissing the action upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Defendant has not submitted any authorities or made any argument in support of the judgment of dismissal that she obtained in the trial court. The appellants state that the trial court granted the motion of defendant to dismiss the action for the reason "that, inasmuch as the complaint did not state that an execution had been issued and that appraisers had been appointed within 60 days as required by section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

In this statement appellants are obviously in error, as section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure refers to the procedure to be taken when a homestead is selected by a person in his lifetime and is returned in the inventory and appraisal of his estate appraised at not exceeding $5,000, the superior court must set it aside to the person entitled, and further provides for the payment of the debts of deceased and the enforcement of any liens or incumbrances on the homestead, etc. This section could not possibly have the remotest bearing upon the case presented by the pleadings here.

Plaintiffs might have intended to refer to sections 1245, 1246, et seq. of the Civil Code, but there is nothing in the answer or anywhere in the record to show that defendant has made any application to the court for relief under the provisions of these sections. Therefore we are left entirely in the dark as to the theory or ground upon which the judgment of dismissal was entered.

The complaint after alleging the formal matters and that plaintiffs have been husband and wife since April 24, 1920, states:

"II. That on the 24th day of April, 1920, and for some time prior thereto, the plaintiffs herein were the owners of that certain parcel of land situated in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, and more particularly described as follows, to wit: (Here follows description of real estate.)

"III. That on the 24th day of April, 1920, the plaintiff Isadora D. Hughes, for the purpose of preserving the above-described premises as a permanent home for herself and husband, Leroy H. Hughes, did make her declaration of homestead on said premises, and that said declaration of homestead was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county. * * *

"IV. That said declaration was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county of the 24th day of April, 1920, and that before and on said day the plaintiffs were living together as husband and wife on said premises, and that said premises have at all times since been the home and residence of plaintiff. That said premises were and now are of the value of less than $5,000 and of the proximate value of $4,500.

"V. That on the 24th day of January, 1921, the defendant herein, under the name of Mary E. Beekley, did secure a judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county, in an action designated and entitled Mary E. Beekley v. Isadora D. Hughes et al., No. B82092, and that said judgment was recorded in Judgment Book No. 517, at page 32, on the 22d day of January, 1921. * * *

"VII. That said judgment is not a lien on the above said homestead premises, nor is the said premises subject to execution thereunder, as provided by statutes, and that all proceeds from said premises are exempt therefrom, but that said judgment clouds the title of plaintiffs thereto, and that the market value thereof has thereby been lessened to such an extent that said premises cannot be sold."

The complaint concludes with a prayer that plaintiffs' title be quieted, and that defendant be forever barred from any claim to the property adverse to plaintiffs, etc.

[1] There is a form of action, provided by section 3412 et seq. of the Civil Code, under which the pleader in the case at bar was evidently trying to state a cause of action. This section provides:

"A written instrument, in respect to which there is a reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may, upon his application, be so adjudged, and ordered to be delivered up or canceled."

Actions under this section are for the purpose of having instruments canceled or adjudged to be void, and such actions are usually called actions to remove clouds, and were quite common in the old chancery practice and constituted one of the applications of the principle "Quia Timet." 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 701; Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 443, 21 P. 946. In this kind of action the statute provides (section 3413, Civ. Code) that if the instrument is void upon its face, or when construed with another instrument with which it is necessarily connected, the relief will not be granted. This provision is the embodiment, in statutory form, of an old and well-established rule of equity.

It is clear that the plaintiffs have not stated a cause of action under either of these sections. In Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Ordway, 38 Cal. 681, in an action to remove a cloud, under section 3412, the court said:

"There can be no question but that the facts which show the apparent validity of the instrument which is said to constitute the cloud, and also the facts showing its invalidity, ought to be stated."

See, also, Castro v. Barry, supra.

There is nothing alleged in the complaint showing that the judgment against the plaintiff Isadora Hughes is void or voidable for any reason; on the contrary, the conclusion drawn from reading the complaint is that said judgment is a valid and subsisting indebtedness against said plaintiff. For practically the same reason the complaint does not state a cause of action against the defendant, under section 1050 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes an action by "one person against another for the purpose of determining an adverse claim, which the latter makes against the former for money or property upon an alleged obligation."

[2] There is, however, an entirely different form of action provided for under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that:

"An action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real or personal property, adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim. * * *

The provisions of this section are very broad. In Castro v. Barry, supra, the court said:

"The statutory action to determine adverse claim is an improvement upon the old bill of peace. The statute enlarges the class of cases in which equitable relief could formerly be sought in the quieting of title. It is not necessary, as formerly, that the plaintiff should first establish his right by an action at law. 'He can immediately, upon knowledge of the assertion of such claim, require the nature and character of the adverse estate or interest to be produced, exposed, and judicially determined, and the question of title be thus forever quieted.' * * * Nor is it necessary that the adverse claim should be of any particular character. As said by Baldwin, J., delivering the opinion in Head v. Fordyce, 17 Cal. 151, the statute 'does not confine the remedy to the case of an adverse claimant setting up a legal title or even an equitable one; but the act intended to embrace every description of claim whereby the plaintiff might be deprived of the property, or its title clouded, or its value depreciated, or whereby the plaintiff might be incommoded or damaged by the assertion of an outstanding title already held or to grow out of the adverse pretension.' * * * And the rule may be even more broadly stated, viz., that the action may be maintained by the owner of property to determine any adverse claim whatever. For if the defendant by his answer disclaims all interest whatever, judgment may, nevertheless, be entered against him, though in such case it must without costs."

See, also, Hyatt v. Colkins, 174 Cal. 580, 163 P. 1007.

In Landregan v. Peppin, 94 Cal. 467, 29 P. 772, the court said:

"It will be noticed that section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides for the determination of adverse claims to realty, is very broad in its terms, and includes all adverse interests, from a claim of title in fee to the smallest leasehold, and unquestionably it is the duty of the defendant to set out his interest, whatever, it may be, when called upon, under this section of the Code. * * * The main effect of said section is to give parties the right to compel others by suit to litigate and determine controversies in cases where such right did not before exist."

While there is no direct allegation in the complaint "that defendant claims any interest or lien upon the property adverse to plaintiffs and that such claim is without right," etc., as is generally alleged in actions to quiet title, under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, still the complaint does allege "that said judgment clouds the title of plaintiffs thereto, and that the market value thereof has thereby been lessened to such an extent that said premises cannot be sold." No demurrer was interposed to this complaint. This allegation together with the other allegations of the complaint stated a sufficient cause of action to quiet title, under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If, however, it be conceded that the complaint, standing alone, does not state a cause of action to quiet title, under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for a lack of averments of essential facts, such missing allegations are supplied by the answer.

[3] The defendant by her answer denies among other things, first, that plaintiffs were actually living together as husband and wife on said premises at the time said homestead was made and recorded, thus putting in issue one of the essential elements to establish a valid homestead, for unless plaintiffs could prove these facts defendants' judgment would be a lien against said property. The answer further denies "that said judgment mentioned in paragraph 5 of the complaint is not a lien upon the above said homestead, nor are the said premises subject to execution thereunder," etc. Therefore defendant has put in issue the question whether the homestead is valid, and also the question whether the judgment is a lien against the premises described in the complaint and thereby admits that she claims a lien upon the homestead property adverse to the plaintiffs and admits that she claims the homestead is invalid and that the property is subject to execution in satisfaction of her judgment, thus supplying the missing allegations in plaintiffs' complaint. In Vance v. Anderson, 113 Cal. 536, 45 P. 817, the court said:

"It is a familiar rule of pleading that defects in a complaint may be cured by the averments of an answer thereto. County of San Diego v. Seifert, 97 Cal. 594 [32 P. 644]; Harkness v. McClain, 8 Utah, 52 [29 P. 964]; Code Civ. Proc. § 475; Diefendorff v. Hopkins, 95 Cal. 344 [28 P. 265, 30 P. 549]; Schenk v. Hartford Ins. Co., 71 Cal. 23 [11 P. 807]; Cohen v. Knox, 90 Cal. 266 [27 P. 215, 13 L. R. A. 711].

"Pomeroy is of opinion this rule of the curative property of an answer should be confined to cases in which the answer affirmatively alleges the very fact which is omitted from the complaint, but says it has sometimes been enforced, although the answer simply contained a denial of the necessary facts which should have been averred by the plaintiff." Pomeroy on Remedies, § 579. The practice in this state has been to treat express denials as sufficient to cover the defect."

See, also, 21 Cal. Jur. 290, etc., and cases there cited.

[4] The homestead is exempt from execution or forced sale, except in the following cases:

"The homestead is subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained:

"(1) Before the declaration of homestead was filed for record, and which constitute liens upon the premises.

"(2) On debts secured by mechanics, contractors, subcontractors, artisans, architects, builders, laborers of every class, materialmen's or vendors' liens upon the premises.

"(3) On debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and acknowledged by husband and wife, or by an unmarried claimant.

"(4) On debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record." Civ. Code, §§ 1240 and 1241.

It is not shown in the record anywhere that said judgment against the plaintiff Isadora Hughes falls within any of the above exceptions. Therefore, the homestead of plaintiffs, if found to be valid, is not subject to execution to satisfy said judgment of defendant and said judgment created no lien or incumbrance on said homestead property.

At most, the effect of said judgment and the claim of lien thereunder, asserted by defendant, was to create an apparent cloud upon the title to the homestead property, and plaintiffs have a right to bring an action to quiet title and have the court determine that the title to said homestead property is not subject to execution in satisfaction of said judgment and is unimpaired and unaffected thereby. Magneson v. Pacific Mfg. Co., 26 Cal. App. 52, 146 P. 69; Price v. Central Savings Bank, etc., 62 Cal. App. 583, 217 P. 800.

It follows, therefore, from what has been said, that we are of the opinion that plaintiffs were entitled to have their case heard and determined by the trial court on the merits.

The judgment is reversed.

GITTELSON v. GANDOLFO. (Civ. 5121.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 2, 1927.

Appeal and error ⇨82(3)—Order denying statutory motion to set aside judgment and enter different judgment held appealable under statute (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, 963).

Order denying motion made under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, to set aside judgment and to enter a different judgment on the findings, held appealable under section 963, providing that an appeal may be taken from any special order made after final judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. W. Guerin, Judge.

Action by Max Gittelson against Josephine E. Gandolfo. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant moved to set aside the judgment. From an order denying the motion, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

H. A. Massey and Peyton H. Moore, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Shapiro & Shapiro, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. Respondent claims that an order refusing to set aside judgment and to enter a different judgment on the findings is not appealable.

The notice of motion to vacate judgment, an appeal from the ruling on which is the matter now before this court on appeal, is a somewhat lengthy and somewhat complicated notice of motion, and recites that it is made under the provisions of sections 663 and 663a, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The cases cited by the respondent in his motion to dismiss the appeal were apparent authority for the contention of plaintiff in his motion to dismiss. However in the later case of Bond v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 159 Cal. 270, 273, 113 P. 366, 367 (48 L. R. A. [N. S.] 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50) the court says:

"The order made after judgment, denying the motion to vacate the judgment and render a judgment consistent, as plaintiff claimed, with the answers of the jury to the questions put to it, is clearly an appealable order. By section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, an appeal may be taken from any special order made after final judgment. This order is one of that kind. It is an order authorized by section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that an order 'granting such motion may be reviewed on appeal in the same manner as orders made on motions for a new trial.' This was intended either to authorize a review of such an order on appeal from the judgment afterward made in pursuance of it, or to authorize a direct appeal from the order itself. In either case it should not be construed so as to affect the right given by section 963 to appeal from an order denying the motion, as from an order made after judgment. Respondent's position in that behalf is untenable."

The sole question ruled on by the court in the case of Westervelt v. McCullough, 64 Cal. App. 362, 221 P. 661, was whether an appeal on the identical grounds stated herein would lie. As to this question they say:

"An order denying a motion made under section 663 is unquestionably a special order made after final judgment, and as such is appealable under section 963—unless there be some good reason for holding otherwise. Because in section 663a, the Legislature expressly provided that an order granting such a motion may be reviewed on appeal in the same manner as a special order made after final judgment, respondent argues that, under the familiar rule of construction, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, it should be held that the lawmakers did not intend that there should be a right of appeal from an order denying the motion. To support this view respondent cites Modoc Co-operative Ass'n v. Porter, 11 Cal. App. 270, 104 P. 710. It is true that certain dicta may be found in the opinion in that case which seem to give color to respondent's contention; but since that case was decided our supreme court has stated unequivocally that an order denying a motion made under section 663 is appealable under section 963, as a special order made after final judgment. Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 P. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50; Condon v. Donohue, 160 Cal. 749, 118 P. 113. The rule thus announced is binding here."

In the amendment to the opinion in the case of Andreoli v. Hodge, 71 Cal. App. 762, 236 P. 333, said amendment appearing on page 766 (236 P. 335) thereof, the court says:

"Since the decision herein was filed, our attention has been called to the fact that, since the time of the decisions to which we referred as indicating that there is no right of appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside a judgment and on the findings enter another and different judgment, later decisions have determined that there is such right of appeal. Condon v. Donohue, 160 Cal. 749, 750, 118 P. 113; Westervelt v. McCullough, 64 Cal. App. 362, 221 P. 661."

The motion made in the instant case in the lower court did request, in addition to other relief, the same identical form of relief as was requested in the case of Westervelt v. McCullough, supra.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

HILLE v. JOHNSTON. (Civ. 3299.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 29, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨690(5)—Failure to incorporate judgment roll in another case in transcript prevented consideration whether excluding it from evidence was error.

On appeal from judgment in action to recover attorney's fees, failure to incorporate in transcript judgment roll in action by present defendant against attorney to set aside compromise of case prevents consideration as to whether its exclusion from evidence constituted error.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1078(5)—On appellant's failure to make point in briefs as to finding against plea of limitations, such plea is presumed to be abandoned.

On appellant's failure to make point in briefs as to finding against her plea of statute of limitations, such proposition is presumed to have been abandoned.

3. Appeal and error ⇨671(1)—Whether briefs contain portions of record necessary to proper review or whether merits of case may be reviewed without them rests in discretion of appellate court (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Whether in given case briefs of party, where attempt has been made to include portions of record necessary to proper review pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, are sufficient, or whether, when no attempt has been made to follow such provision, merits of case may be reviewed, presents question whose decision is in discretion of appellate court.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1126—Appellant's failure to incorporate in brief portions of record held, under circumstances, not to require granting motion to affirm judgment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 953c).

In action by assignee on contract to recover attorney's fees where evidence was not extensive and record could be examined with no greater trouble or inconvenience than if it had been inserted in appellant's brief or supplement appended thereto pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, failure to include record in brief on appeal on record pursuant to section 953a did not require affirmance of judgment on motion.

5. Set-off and counterclaim ⚡28(2)—Generally, in action on contract, defendant may cross-complain for damages caused by plaintiff's breach thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 442).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 442, generally, in action to recover on contract, defendant may cross-complain for damages caused by plaintiff's breach thereof.

6. Set-off and counterclaim ⚡28(2)—In action to recover attorney's fees, cross-complaint for damages for breach of attorney's contract held proper (Code Civ. Proc. § 442).

In action to recover attorney's fees, cross-complaint for breach of attorney's contract on which fees were based was germane to cause of action stated in complaint and related to or depended on contract or transaction on which action was brought, within Code Civ. Proc. § 442.

7. Set-off and counterclaim ⚡49(2)—Defendant, sued on contract for attorney's fees, held entitled to set up set-off existing at time of, or before, notice of assignment (Code Civ. Proc. § 368).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 368, defendant, sued on contract for attorney's fees, was entitled to interpose as defense any set-off existing at time of, or before, notice of assignment.

8. Appearance ⚡20—Assignor of contract filing demurrer to cross-complaint held to make "general appearance," waiving personal or other service of summons (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 406, 416).

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 406, 416, where assignor of contract on which defendant was sued for attorney's fees filed demurrer to cross-complaint for damages because of his breach of contract, he made "general appearance," waiving personal or other service of summons.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, General Appearance.]

9. Pleading ⚡147—Cross-complaint for attorney's breach of contract of employment held to state cause of action on general demurrer.

In action by assignee of contract for attorney's fees, cross-complaint for attorney's breach of contract of employment held to state cause of action on general demurrer.

10. Set-off and counterclaim ⚡49(1)—Defendant, sued by assignee of contract for attorney's fees, held entitled to set up damages sustained through assignor's breach of contract (Code Civ. Proc. § 442).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 442, defendant, sued by assignee of contract for attorney's fees, was entitled to set up any set-off against claim constituting basis of cause of action or cross-complaint for damages by way of recoupment for any damage sustained by her through attorney's violation of contract of employment.

11. Parties ⚡84(5)—Failure to make assignee suing on contract for attorney's fees party defendant to cross-complaint against attorney should have been presented by demurrer or answer (Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 4).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 4, failure to make assignee suing on contract for attorney's fees party defendant to cross-complaint, based on attorney's breach of contract of employment, constituted nonjoinder of parties cross-defendant, which should have been presented either by demurrer or answer.

12. Attorney and client ⚡166(1)—In action on contract for attorney's fees defended on ground of breach, excluding defendant's testimony as to conversation with attorney relating to steps to collect judgment held error.

In assignee's action on contract for attorney's fees in which answer set up breach of contract through attorney's failure to collect judgment and in compromising case without consent of defendant, excluding defendant's testimony as to conversation with attorney after obtaining judgment as to what he should do about collecting money under it held error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by J. G. Hille against Catherine M. Johnston on a contract for legal services. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Berkeley B. Blake and Irving D. Gibson, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff was awarded judgment for the sum of $2,391.41, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of said judgment, on account of and for professional services alleged to have been performed by plaintiff's assignor, as attorney for defendant, in a certain action tried and prosecuted to judgment in the superior court of Sacramento county, wherein the defendant herein was plaintiff and August De Bock, his wife, Clara E. De Bock, and Millie Fisher were defendants.

The defendant appeals from the judgment upon a record prepared in pursuance of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

On the 14th day of July, 1915, the defendant and appellant (then known as and called Catherine M. De Bock) and P. H. Johnson, an attorney and counselor at law, entered into a written contract, by the terms of which said Johnson, for a certain contingent consideration, agreed to perform for defendant certain professional services in the action, above named, in which the defendant as plaintiff sued the De Bocks and said Fisher for damages "for alienating the affections of the husband of defendant." Omitting the preamble or the explanatory language therefrom, the contract, which is made a part of the complaint, is as follows:

"Now, therefore, it is agreed on the part of said Catherine M. De Bock that in consideration of the legal services of said P. H. Johnson so rendered, in prosecuting said claim for damages against said parties hereinabove named, the said Catherine M. De Bock will defray the necessary court costs, jury fees, witness fees, and all other expenses of trial in said action, and pay to the said P. H. Johnson one-half of all money or moneys recovered or paid on account of said claim for damages, either by settlement, compromise, or pursuant to a judgment of court, or otherwise.

"That, in consideration of the foregoing promises on the part of the said Catherine M. De Bock, the said P. H. Johnson agrees to prosecute the claim of said Catherine M. De Bock for such damages against the said parties hereinabove named, through all the courts of this state, provided, however, that the said Catherine M. De Bock, in case of appeal from any court of the above-mentioned action, will pay and defray all costs and expenses of appeal of whatever nature or kind necessarily incurred.

"That it is mutually agreed that neither party to this agreement shall settle or compromise the said claim without the consent of the other party thereto."

The complaint is in two counts, but the two contain substantially the same allegations. It is alleged therein that, after the making of said agreement, said Johnson commenced said action for damages in behalf of defendant, and "thereafter duly and regularly prosecuted said action and said claim of defendant for damages against said defendants in said action named through all the courts of said state of California and to a final judgment in said action in favor of defendant herein." It is further alleged that on the 15th day of August, 1924, the sum of $4,528.50 was paid to defendant on said judgment, and that, under and by virtue of the terms of the said (above) agreement between said Johnson and said defendant, one-half the moneys so collected upon said judgment "remains due, owing, and unpaid from defendant; that, prior to the commencement of this action, said P. H. Johnson assigned and transferred to plaintiff all his right, title, and interest in and to and all moneys paid on account of said claim for damages, and the plaintiff is now the lawful owner and holder thereof."

As to both counts of the complaint, the answer pleads the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337 and 339), admits the execution of the above agreement, but denies that the said sum of $4,528.50 or any part thereof on account of the judgment obtained in said action was collected by said Johnson, or that plaintiff in said action (defendant here) received said sum or any part thereof through the efforts or labor of said Johnson, alleges that, before any money was recovered in said action, said Johnson abandoned said contract and refused to continue further on his part to perform the same, and that defendant thereupon employed another attorney to collect the judgment obtained in said action, and that "said attorney other than said Johnson collected the said sum of $4,528.50 and all thereof for the defendant herein." The answer further alleges that said Johnson did prosecute such action to judgment, which judgment amounted to $5,800; that the defendants in said action, August De Bock and Clara De Bock, for the purpose of fraudulently preventing the defendant in this action from recovering on said judgment, filed a homestead on certain property owned by them (the De Bocks) in Sacramento county; that said De Bocks were not at the time of the filing of said homestead residing upon said property and "said homestead was void;" that P. H. Johnson caused an execution to be issued on said judgment and caused the property covered by said homestead to be sold under execution; "that upon the sale of said property under execution, this defendant bought the same in;" that the defendant herein was prevented from getting possession of said property on account of the claim of the De Bocks that the same was protected by said homestead, and that thereafter said Johnson for and on behalf of defendant commenced two actions against said De Bocks, the one to have said homestead declared invalid and void, and the other to eject said De Bocks from said premises; that after commencing said actions the same were set for trial and were about to be tried, when said Johnson, "without the knowledge or consent of this defendant, entered into an agreement to compromise said judgment and requested this defendant to ratify this agreement and to satisfy said judgment of record; that this defendant refused to accept said compromise and refused to satisfy said judgment of record; that thereupon said Johnson, without the knowledge or consent of this defendant, and without the authority of this defendant, * * * himself satisfied said judgment of record and received from said August De Bock and Clara E. De Bock the sum of $4,500; that thereupon said P. H. Johnson retained and kept all of said sum of $4,500, and refused to deliver or pay any part thereof to this defendant unless this defendant would ratify said agreement of compromise and satisfy said judgment of record; that said P. H. Johnson refused to further prosecute said action to set aside said homestead and eject said August De Bock and Clara De Bock; that thereafter this defendant employed one R. Platnauer, an attorney admitted to practice in all the courts of the state of California, to prosecute an action in her name to set aside said satisfaction of said judgment so entered by P. H. Johnson; that said action to set aside said satisfaction of said judgment was thereafter prosecuted in the superior court of the county of Sacramento and a judgment was entered therein vacating and annulling the satisfaction of said judgment so entered by said P. H. Johnson, as defendant's attorney; that after said satisfaction of said judgment was vacated said R. Platnauer caused an execution to be levied in said action and recovered under said execution said sum of $4,528.50; that no part of said sum of $4,528.50 was collected or recovered by said P. H. Johnson or through his efforts, and the same was recovered long after said P. H. Johnson had refused to do anything further under said agreement set out in plaintiff's complaint."

The defendant, by permission of the court, filed an amendment to her answer, in which she attempted to set up, by way of estoppel against the right of the plaintiff here to maintain the present action, the judgment referred to in her answer as originally filed as having been obtained in the action instituted and prosecuted by Attorney Platnauer for the purpose of setting aside the satisfaction of the original judgment in favor of the defendant here against the De Bocks.

The defendant also filed a cross-complaint and, after by reference making those paragraphs of the answer setting forth the allegations last above referred to herein parts of said pleading, alleged therein that "by reason of the refusal of said P. H. Johnson to further carry out his contract with this defendant, and by reason of his breach thereof in compromising said judgment and satisfying said judgment of record, this defendant was forced to and did employ an attorney to vacate and set aside said satisfaction of judgment and to further prosecute said action to recover said sum of $4,528.50 and was forced to expend a great deal of time in said matter and was forced to incur various expenses in said matter to the damage of this defendant in the sum of $4,000." The prayer of the cross-complaint was that the plaintiff take nothing by his action and that the defendant recover upon her cross-complaint against said P. H. Johnson the sum of $4,000, and that she be awarded costs against both plaintiff and said Johnson.

A demurrer was interposed to the cross-complaint upon general and special grounds. The special ground of the demurrer was that "there is a misjoinder of parties cross defendant in said action, in this, that said P. H. Johnson is not a proper party or cross-defendant in said action." The demurrer was sustained by the court without leave to amend.

[1, 2] The court found that the plaintiff's action was not barred by the statute of limitations, as alleged in the answer, and, further, that plaintiff was not estopped from maintaining this action by reason of the judgment entered in favor of defendant, as plaintiff therein, in the action brought by defendant against P. H. Johnson to set aside the compromise agreement referred to. As to the latter proposition, the record shows that the attorney for the defendant offered the judgment roll in evidence, but the court sustained the objection of plaintiff to the admission of it in evidence. Nor is the said judgment roll in the transcript. As to that matter therefore, the record is such as to preclude a review and a determination of the point that the ruling excluding the judgment roll in said action from the record involved error. If defendant desired that that point be reviewed by this court, it was incumbent upon her to have incorporated the judgment roll in the transcript. The defendant does not in her briefs make any point as to the finding against her plea of the statute of limitations, hence it is to be presumed that she has here abandoned that proposition.

Preliminarily to a consideration of the points mainly relied on for a reversal, it is orderly at this point to consider and dispose of the motion by respondent for an affirmance of the judgment. The ground of the motion is that the briefs of defendant are legally deficient, in that there are not printed therein, or in any supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as the "defendant desires to call to the attention of the court" (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c), or, in other language, that said briefs do not contain the portions of the record which are necessary to a proper review and determination of the points urged by defendant for a reversal. The disposition of cases on appeal on their merits is always to be preferred to a disposition thereof upon a failure, in preparing the appeal, to observe some rule of procedure, where it is clear that such course does not carry with it serious impingement upon the mode prescribed for taking and presenting appeals to courts of review. In the spirit of that wholesome policy of the appellate courts we will consider and review the motion and some of the cases having occasion to consider section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, or that provision thereof which furnishes the foundation of the motion here.

In denying a petition for a hearing of the case of California Savings & Commercial Bank v. Canne, 34 Cal. App. 768, 770, 169 P. 395, 396, the Supreme Court, speaking of the rule with respect to the preparation of records on appeal, as prescribed by section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, said that, while the law requires that "enough [of the record] must be printed [in the briefs or a supplement appended thereto] to illustrate the points made and to enable the court to determine those points," yet "just exactly what must be printed in any particular case in order to comply with this requirement necessarily depends upon the circumstances of the case." In San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irr. Co. v. Stevinson, 16 Cal. App. 235, 239, 116 P. 378, 380, it is said, referring to said section 953c, "that it would be difficult to lay down a 'hard-and-fast' rule as to the practice under the new sections or one that would meet the exigencies of all cases that are brought to the appellate courts by the alternative method of taking appeals." In Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 229, 239 P. 1054, 1056, it is said:

"It has been reiterated approximately one hundred times in the decisions of this court and of the district courts of appeal that it is incumbent upon an appellant who relies upon a typewritten transcript [referring to the alternative method of taking appeals], to print in his brief or in a printed supplement thereto sufficient of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment or order appealed from. 2 Cal. Jur. 643 et seq. Furthermore, as we pointed out some months ago (Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 233 P. 330), since the 1923 amendment to the section last cited (section 953c), an appellant who fails to do this incurs thereby the risk that the order or judgment appealed from may be affirmed upon motion."

In Furlong v. Alexander, 243 P. 887, 888, the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, held, upon the authority of People v. Woods, 190 Cal. 513, 519, 213 P. 951, that the provision of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure requiring "the parties" to "print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto," certain indicated portions of the record, was "merely directory."

As accounting for the conclusions announced in some of the cases from which brief excerpts are above given, it should be explained that section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure has been amended several times since its adoption into said Code as a part of the procedure of our appellate practice in the year 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 751). The Legislature of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 261), amended the section by adding thereto the following provision:

"No appeal shall be dismissed nor shall any appeal be decided adversely to any party for failure to print in his brief the portion of the record or any part thereof in support of his points, but in such case the court hearing the appeal shall direct such party to print and serve on the adverse party and file with it a supplement to his brief in which shall be set forth in full that portion of the record relied on by such party and not printed in any former brief."

But the Legislature of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 748) again amended said section by eliminating therefrom the part just quoted herein and inserting in lieu of said provision the following:

"In filing briefs on said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court. The court may in all cases, upon good cause shown, extend time to a party to print and file his brief, provided that the application is made before calling of the calendar for oral argument on the appeal or upon good cause being shown the court may extend time to a party to print and file a supplemental brief."

The case of California Savings & Commercial Bank v. Canne, first hereinabove referred to, was decided October 9, 1917, when the section read as it was originally passed by the Legislature of 1907. The case of San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irr. Co. v. Stevinson, supra, was also decided prior to the amendment of the section by the Legislature of 1919. The opinion in Jeffords v. Young, supra, was filed on October 1, 1925, at which time, as seen, section 953c had been amended by the Legislature of 1923, restoring to said section the provision thereof now under inquiry as it read prior to the amendment thereof by the Legislature of 1919 and as it now reads.

The case of People v. Woods, supra, was decided on March 1, 1923, but before the amendment of the section by the Legislature of that year went into effect, so that that case dealt with said section as it was amended in 1919. The case of Furlong v. Alexander, supra, was decided and the opinion therein filed on December 31, 1925, at which time section 953c, in the particular in which we are now considering it, read as it was originally passed in 1907 and as it now reads, except that there was added thereto the provision (above herein quoted) authorizing the court to extend the time to a party to print and file his brief, etc. It is in that case, it will be remembered, that it is held, upon the authority of People v. Woods, supra, that the provision of section 953c presently under review is directory only.

It is to be observed from the foregoing review of some of the many cases in which the provision in question has been considered that the construction which it has been given by the courts has been from different viewpoints created by varying conditions arising and existing by reason of the several amendments to which it has been subjected. We do not think that, as it now reads, the provision can, consistently with the mandatory nature of its language, be held to be directory. This would mean that it would be entirely in the discretion of the party taking an appeal to determine whether the briefs should contain any portions of the record.

[3] We are of the opinion, however, that whether, in a given case, the briefs of the party, generally the appellant, where an attempt has therein been made to comply with the terms of the provision, sufficiently measure up to the requirements thereof, or whether, where no attempt whatever has been made in the briefs to satisfy the commands of the provision, the merits of the case may or may not be reviewed, presents a question the decision of which rests in the discretion of the court of appeal, dependent in its exercise upon the nature and number of the points made and the conditions and the situation in general intrinsically characterizing the record. For instance, where, as here, the party has failed to print in his brief, or in a supplement appended thereto, any part of the record, it is entirely in the discretion of the reviewing court to determine whether the record is such that it may or may not, without an extra amount of labor or great or unusual inconvenience, be examined for the purpose of determining whether the points which are to be reviewed are or are not well grounded. There are cases in which, notwithstanding the failure of the appellant to comply properly with the provision in question, the reviewing courts have, nevertheless, considered and decided the appeals upon the merits of the cases. See Miller v. Oliver, 174 Cal. 404, 163 P. 357. On the other hand, in Marcucci v. Vowinkel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 P. 430 (an action for damages for alleged injuries to one of the plaintiffs [the wife] from alleged unskillful advice and treatment by defendant in his professional capacity as a physician, and in which the appeal was from the judgment of nonsuit), the appellant having failed to print in his brief, or in a supplement thereto testimony, if any there was, "on the subject of want of care and skill on the part of the defendant," the court refused to review the evidence for the purpose of determining whether the nonsuit was or was not properly granted. The court said:

"Nor does he [counsel for appellants] in his brief point out or refer to such evidence on the part of the record where it may be found. He does not argue the question at all. We will therefore assume, for the purposes of this review, that there was no evidence of such want of care or skill."

The court stated, however, that:

"The only point worthy of mention, in his brief, is the claim that the court below improperly refused to continue the trial from the afternoon of the last day thereof until the following morning, to give the plaintiffs an opportunity to procure the attendance of three additional witnesses to testify on behalf on the plaintiffs."

The court then proceeded to consider and decide that question and for that purpose examined the transcript to ascertain what the showing was in the court below on the application for the continuance.

So it appears that, as above stated, whether a review will be allowed, where the appellant has failed, wholly or partially, to comply with the provision in question of section 953c, is to be determined by the reviewing court in the exercise of its discretion founded upon the situation of or the conditions characterizing the particular case in hand. The court's discretion in that particular should not and, of course, would not be abused. This construction would seem to be reinforced by the consideration that, where the appeal is taken in accord with the alternative method, the requirement that certain specified portions of the record are to be printed in the briefs, etc., is primarily for the benefit or convenience of the court to which the appeal is taken, although incidentally it is also for the benefit as well of the adverse party. The construction harmonizes with the policy of reviewing courts (above adverted to) that all appeals should be determined upon the merits rather than disposed of upon some technical rule among those established for the purpose of regulating the procedure by which appeals should be presented to such courts where it can be done without too drastic a departure from the requirements of said rules. And the construction accords with what we conceive to be the view of the provision as expressed in Jeffords v. Young, or as is to be implied from the language of Chief Justice Myers, author of the opinion in that case, as follows:

"An appellant who fails to do this [referring to the requirement of the provision that certain indicated portions of the record be printed in the brief], incurs thereby the risk that the order or judgment appealed from may be affirmed upon motion."

The warning, however, thus given the members of the legal profession still stands, and it may well be repeated here that, in preparing appeals according to the alternative method, the failure on the part of attorneys to follow, in a proper manner, the course prescribed by the provision in question will always be at their own risk, for cases will certainly arise where, to excuse such failure, would involve an abuse of discretion and amount, practically, to a judicial nullification of the provision.

[4] In the present case, the points are few in number, the judgment roll is not voluminous, and the evidence is comparatively brief. As to the evidence, it consists entirely of the agreement between plaintiff's assignor and the defendant, whereby the former was employed to render professional services as a lawyer for the latter in the alienation action, the judgment roll (superfluously) in the latter action and the testimony of the defendant, which is very brief. Thus the record is such that it may be and has been examined with no greater trouble or inconvenience than if the whole record had been inserted in the brief of appellant or a supplement appended thereto. To grant the motion of the plaintiff for an affirmance of the judgment upon the ground stated under such circumstances would involve an unnecessary denial of the defendant's right to have her appeal considered upon the merits. The motion to affirm the judgment is, therefore, denied.

[5-7] As to the order sustaining the demurrer to the defendant's cross-complaint, it may first be observed that it is the general rule in this state that, in an action to recover on a contract, the defendant may cross-complain for damages caused by plaintiff's breach of the same contract. Code Civ. Proc. § 442; 21 Cal. Jur. 79; Mackenzie v. Hodgkin, 126 Cal.

591, 59 P. 36, 77 Am. St. Rep. 209; Campbell v. Heney, 128 Cal. 109, 60 P. 532; Imperial Water Co. No. 4 v. Meserve, 62 Cal. App. 603, 217 P. 553. Of course, it will not be questioned that the subject-matter of the cross-complaint is germane to the cause of action stated in plaintiff's complaint, and "relates to or depends upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought," within the meaning of section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Nor will it be doubted that, notwithstanding that the said agreement and any rights accruing to said P. H. Johnson thereunder were assigned to plaintiff, the defendant is entitled to interpose as a defense against the enforcement of the agreement any set-off existing at the time of, or before, notice of the assignment. Code Civ. Proc. § 368.

[8, 9] It does not appear that said P. H. Johnson was served with summons and a copy of the cross-complaint, but he, nevertheless, within due time, made a general appearance by filing a demurrer to that pleading, and thus waived personal or other service of summons. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 406 and 416; 3 Cal. Jur. p. 14 et seq.; 21 Cal. Jur. p. 477, § 4. The demurrer, as seen, was sustained, without leave to amend. The specific ground upon which it was sustained is not stated by the court, or, at least, is not disclosed by the record. There can be no doubt, however, that the cross-complaint, as against a general demurrer, states a cause of action for damages. Under the agreement between the defendant and said Johnson, the latter was entitled to be compensated for his professional services for instituting and prosecuting to final judgment, on behalf of the defendant, the "alienation action" (as for brevity that action may hereinafter be described), only in the event that any judgment which might be secured for defendant therein was satisfied or paid. In other words, under a fair or reasonable construction of said agreement, it was the duty of said Johnson, before he would be entitled to compensation for the professional services required of and rendered by him in said action, not only to obtain a judgment but to secure the satisfaction or execution thereof. If, therefore, having obtained a judgment for defendant in said action for damages, said Johnson refused to proceed to take the necessary legal steps to secure satisfaction thereof, such conduct would amount to an abandonment of the agreement on his part before its terms had been fulfilled; or, if, without the consent of the defendant, Johnson, upon an agreement of compromise between him and the judgment debtors, accepted, as in full satisfaction of the judgment, a sum less than that for which the judgment called, he (said Johnson), by reason thereof, would be guilty of a breach of the agreement for which breach defendant would be entitled to such compensation by way of damages as she might have suffered therefrom. There can be conceived no just ground for doubting that thus the agreement is correctly construed. Indeed, the very fact that whether said Johnson was to receive any compensation at all for his professional services in said action was by the agreement made contingent upon the securing of the fruits of any judgment which might be obtained for defendant therein, constitutes indubitable evidence that it was intended by the parties that Johnson's obligations under the agreement would not terminate until such judgment was satisfied in whole or in part. Moreover, the language of the agreement is, as will be noted, that "said P. H. Johnson agrees to prosecute the claim of said Catherine De Bock (defendant) for such damages against the said parties hereinabove named through all the courts of the state." In other words, said Johnson would prosecute any claim of damages which the defendant here had against the defendants in the alienation action to its fructification, or until such claim was judicially established and satisfied. That the said Johnson was without authority to compromise the claim for damages or a judgment establishing such claim, without the consent or acquiescence of the defendant, is plainly spoken in the agreement, and equally clear is it that any compromise of such claim or judgment agreed to or effected by Johnson without the defendant's consent would constitute a breach of the agreement by Johnson for which she would be entitled to be reimbursed by way of damages, if any actual damage to her resulted therefrom.

Referring now to the cross-complaint more specifically than the averments thereof are above referred to, it will be observed that therein it is alleged that said Johnson, after prosecuting to judgment defendant's claim for damages in the alienation action, "abandoned said contract and refused to continue further; that, upon the abandonment of said contract and said refusal of said P. H. Johnson to further continue under said contract, this defendant hired another lawyer to prosecute said action and to collect said money; * * * that said Johnson, without the knowledge or consent of this defendant, entered into an agreement to compromise said judgment and requested this defendant to ratify this agreement and to satisfy said judgment of record; that this defendant refused to accept said compromise and refused to satisfy said judgment of record; that thereupon said P. H. Johnson, without the knowledge or consent of this defendant, and without the authority of this defendant, and contrary to this defendant's wishes, himself satisfied said judgment of record and received from said De Bocks the sum of $4,500;" that said Johnson refused to deliver said sum or any part thereof to defendant, and that the latter was compelled to and did employ another attorney to commence and prosecute an action to set aside said satisfaction of said judgment and obtained judgment annulling said satisfaction of judgment; that thereafter said attorney other than said Johnson recovered under an execution issued on the judgment in the alienation action the sum of $4,528.50; "that no part of said sum was collected by said Johnson or through his efforts and the same was recovered long after said P. H. Johnson had refused to do anything further under said agreement set out in plaintiff's complaint;" that as a result of the said alleged breach of the said agreement by said Johnson and his refusal "to carry out his contract with this defendant," the latter "was forced to expend a great deal of time in said matter, and was forced to incur various expenses in said matter, to the damage of this defendant in the sum of $4,000." Thus it is clear that, as against a general demurrer, the cross-complaint sufficiently stated a cause of action for damages against said Johnson for a breach of the agreement. But it seems to be the view of counsel for plaintiff (and possibly it was the view of the trial court) that the demurrer was good on the special ground, to wit, "that there is a misjoinder of parties cross-defendant in the action, in this, that said P. H. Johnson is not a proper party or cross-defendant in said action."

[10, 11] Under our code system of practice and procedure and the authorities above named, the defendant was, notwithstanding the assignment by said Johnson of his claim to plaintiff and that the action to recover thereon is by said assignee, entitled to set up in her answer any set-off she might have against the claim constituting the basis of plaintiff's cause of action or cross-complaint for damages by way of recoupment for any damage she might have sustained by reason of the alleged violation by said Johnson of the terms of their agreement. Campbell v. Heney, supra. Of course, the plaintiff should be made a party cross-defendant with Johnson, for, while he is in no way responsible or liable for any damage defendant might have sustained by the alleged wrongful acts of said Johnson with reference to his agreement with defendant, he, nevertheless, is interested in the cause of action stated in the cross-complaint, since he has the right to defend against the claims of that pleading and thereby prevent, if he can, any diminution, by way of the counterclaim practically so pleaded, in the amount of any judgment to which the court might find him to be entitled by reason of his action. The situation then is that, in the place of a misjoinder of parties cross-defendant, there is a defect or nonjoinder of parties cross-defendant, and this should have been the objection interposed to the cross-complaint either by demurrer or answer. Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 4; Work v. Campbell, 164 Cal. 343, 349, 128 P. 943, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 581. That the cross-complaint is proper in this case, we have no doubt. Indeed, it would violate the very spirit or central object of the reformed procedure, which was adopted and has long existed as a more enlightened system for administering the substantive law of rights and wrongs than the archaic system which it superseded, to hold that all matters growing out of precisely the same transaction between virtually the same parties should be required to be litigated by piecemeal in different and independent actions. This statement is peculiarly applicable to the instant case. As seen, our Code provides that an action by an assignee of a claim is subject to any defenses or offsets that might have been set up as against the assignor or the original owner of the claim sued on, had he himself brought the action. There is no good reason why, in such case, where the defendant has good cause for affirmative relief growing out of or directly connected with the transaction upon which the plaintiff's action is grounded, the defendant may not cross-complain against both the assignor and the assignee.

[12] The next and last assignments to be considered pertain to rulings excluding testimony purporting to be addressed to the proof of the allegations of the answer charging Johnson with a breach of the agreement. Counsel for defendant asked the defendant, as a witness, a number of questions as to said P. H. Johnson's conduct with regard to the alienation judgment after the same had been obtained. The court sustained objections to some of those questions on the ground that they were improperly framed, in that they called for answers which would have involved conclusions of the witness and also, in some instances, legal conclusions. Those rulings were, in the main, technically sound. But counsel for defendant, proceeding along the lines of his special or affirmative defense, asked defendant these questions:

"Well, Mrs. Johnston, do you recall the time of a conversation with Mr. P. H. Johnson, after the obtaining of the judgment (the alienation judgment), relating to what he should do about collecting the money under it? * * * What, if any, conversation did you have with Mr. Johnson relative to him proceeding with your action prior to employing other attorneys?"

To both questions objection was interposed that they were "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial," and the objection sustained. The rulings were erroneous. The obvious purpose of the questions was to show that P. H. Johnson had, without the consent of defendant, compromised the judgment in favor of the latter against the De Bocks, and refused to proceed further in the matter after he had secured such compromise. The defendant, under her answer, was entitled to show by her testimony every act of Johnson and every conversation she had had with him tending to prove the charge in her answer that the latter refused to take steps looking to the satisfaction of the De Bock judgment, or that he violated the terms of the agreement by accepting a compromise arrangement with the De Bocks whereby he reduced said judgment to an amount less than it called for. The questions were neither irrelevant, nor immaterial, nor incompetent. They, in proper form, called for proper testimony. The testimony, if given, might not have carried with it much, if any, force, or might wholly have failed to throw any light upon the allegations of defendant's answer to the proof of which it was addressed, but, obviously, for that reason testimony relevant and material to the issues of a case and in legal form sought to be brought out may not legally be excluded.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to the cross-complaint and thereupon grant leave to defendant to amend said complaint by making the plaintiff a party defendant thereto with said P. H. Johnson, and in any other respect that may be deemed necessary, and to amend her answer to plaintiff's complaint with respect to the special defense therein set up, if, in either or both instances, she be so advised.

As regards right of school district to employ counsel to defend litigation, Pol. Code, § 1576, providing that each city forms a school district, creates a school district as a public corporation separate from the city, so that board of education members are not "city officers" within San Diego Charter (St. 1889, p. 664) art. 3, c. 5, § 2, requiring city attorney to assist city officers.

As regards right of school district to employ counsel to defend litigation, Pol. Code, § 1576, making every incorporated city a school district, creates a school district as a separate entity, so that city of San Diego was not "legally interested" in district's litigation within charter (St. 1899, p. 664) art. 3, c. 5, § 2, requiring city attorney to assist in suits and matters in which the city might be "legally interested."

If the counsel, to whom by statute a school district is legally entitled to have to defend litigation, refuses to act, the district has the power to employ other counsel.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by M. L. Ward against the San Diego School District in San Diego County, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. J. Higgins, City Atty., and Arthur F. H. Wright, Deputy City Atty., both of San Diego, for appellants.

Ward, Ward & Ward, of San Diego, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The appeal herein was taken from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants in an action brought to recover the sum of $2,250, which was the unpaid balance due on a contract for legal services rendered by plaintiff to the defendants in connection with the defense of certain litigation which arose from the construction of a school building by the defendant school district.

It is contended by the appellants that neither the San Diego school district nor its representatives had any authority, either express or implied, to employ the plaintiff or any other attorney to represent it in any litigation, but that, in any litigation which might arise concerning either the rights or the liabilities of said school district, either the city attorney of the city of San Diego, or the district attorney of the county of San Diego, was the proper attorney to represent the San Diego school district and the members of its board of education.

The record discloses that the district attorney of the county of San Diego refused to represent the defendants in the litigation in question; and, because it was generally understood that it was no part of the duty of the city attorney to represent the defendants in any way, no request was made that he do so in the litigation which forms the basis for the judgment in the action upon which the appeal herein is predicated.

The decision of the questions here involved primarily depends upon the statutes relating thereto, together with such charter provisions of the city of San Diego as may be applicable. For the purpose of this decision only, it may be conceded that, while no statute expressly authorizes or directs either the city attorney of said city, or the district attorney of the county of San Diego, to assume charge of litigation in which a board of education is directly interested, certain statutes, as distinguished from charter provisions, at least indicate that the duty rested with such district attorney, rather than with said city attorney. On the other hand, it is contended that by certain provisions of the charter of the city of San Diego (Stats. 1889, p. 664), the city attorney is impliedly charged with the duty of such representation. Article 3, c. 5, § 2, of the San Diego charter is as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the city attorney to prosecute, in behalf of the people, all criminal cases arising upon violations of the provisions of this charter and city ordinances, and to attend to all suits, matters, and things in which the city may be legally interested; provided, that the common council shall have control of all litigation of the city, and may employ other attorneys to take charge of any such litigation, or to assist the city attorney therein. He shall give his advice or opinion in writing whenever required by the common council, mayor, or other city officers, and shall do and perform all such things touching his office as by the common council may be required of him."

On the part of appellants, it is urged that, in accordance with the language of such charter provision requiring the city attorney to give his advice or opinion to "the common council, mayor, or other city officers, * * *" the duty of the city attorney in the litigation in question was clearly indicated. Partly in answer thereto, the respondent points to the language of such charter provision which in effect limits the duty of the city attorney to those "suits, matters, and things in which the city may be legally interested."

In order, perhaps the first thing which requires consideration, is the question of whether members of a board of education are "other city officers."

[1] Although as a matter of first impression it might appear that all officers elected by the electors of a city were necessarily "city officers," upon reflection, and possibly more mature consideration of the legal aspects involved, together with the authorities handed down by the Supreme and Appellate Courts of this state, it will become apparent that the election of the several members of the board of education is merely a preliminary means of inducting such members into their respective offices, and that, when seated therein, they become, and thenceforward are, officers of a political subdivision of the state, separate and distinct from the municipality within the boundaries of which the school district is located.

In the case of Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 P. 558, it is held that, under the provisions of section 1576 of the Political Code, every incorporated city constitutes a school district, having the powers of a public corporation wholly distinct from the municipality in which it is situated. In considering the question of whether, in accordance with a charter provision of the city of San Diego, the funds of the school district should be deposited in the city treasury of the city of San Diego, the court said in part:

"Section 1576 of the Political Code declares that 'each county, city, or incorporated town, unless subdivided by the legislative authority thereof, forms a school district.' By virtue of this legislative authority, each school district becomes a public corporation (Estate of Bulmer, 59 Cal. 131; Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 414 [28 P. 1067]), and its functions and powers as such corporation are those which are given to it by the act under which it is created. The legislative declaration that every incorporated city is a school district does not import into the organization of the school district any of the provisions of the city charter, or limit the powers and functions which, as a school district, it has by virtue of the Political Code. The city is a corporation distinct from that of the school district, even though both are designated by the same name, and embrace the same territory. The one derives its authority directly from the Legislature, through the general law providing for the establishment of schools throughout the state, while the authority of the other is found in the charter under which it is organized; and, even though the charter may purport to define the powers and duties of its municipal officers in reference to the public schools in the same language as has the Legislature in the Political Code, yet these powers and duties are referable to the legislative authority, and not to the charter."

To the same effect are City of San Diego v. Dauer, 97 Cal. 442, 32 P. 561; Hancock v. Board of Education of the City of Santa Barbara, 140 Cal. 554, 74 P. 44; Los Angeles City School Dist. v. Longden, 148 Cal. 380, 83 P. 246; Malaley v. City of Marysville, 37 Cal. App. 638, 174 P. 367; People ex rel. Williamson v. Rinner, 52 Cal. App. 747, 199 P. 1066.

In the case of Hancock v. Board of Education of the City of Santa Barbara, 140 Cal. 554, 83 P. 246, the principal of a high school brought an action on contract against the board of education. Among other things, the court said:

"The defendant further contends that the plaintiff should have begun the action against the city of Santa Barbara, and not against the board of education. This claim is not tenable. Every city constitutes a separate school district, including such outlying territory as may be legally attached to it. Pol. Code, § 1576. * * * A city charter adopted under the provisions of the Constitution has no effect whatever upon the existence or legal character of a school district formed under the general law. The school system is a matter of general concern, and not a municipal affair. Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 434 [32 P. 558]. The function of the city under the charter is simply to furnish the officers who compose the governing body of the district, and, when the new charter was adopted, the former board of school trustees was superseded as the governing body by the city board of education. * * *

[2] The only authority which might be interpreted as being in any manner opposed to the views of the appellate courts as expressed in the cases hereinbefore cited, is that of Ackerman v. Moody, 38 Cal. App. 461, 176 P. 696, which case ultimately involved solely the question of whether a recall of members of the board of education was a municipal affair. It was there held that under the charter of the city of San Diego the right vested in said city not only to elect the members of the board of education, but to recall them as well. While in the course of the opinion some language may be found which in its tenor may be construed as out of harmony with that heretofore quoted herein as affecting the question of whether members of a board of education are "other city officers," upon consideration of the several cases to which reference has been had it will appear that, because of the unanimity of the several opinions to the effect that a school district is a corporate entity separate and distinct from the municipal corporation, it would necessarily follow that the officers of the San Diego school district were not "other city officers" of the city of San Diego, and, consequently, not within the purview of the provisions of the city charter which prescribes the duties of the city attorney with reference to the persons or officials whom he shall counsel and advise. Those cases, especially the cases of Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 P. 558, City of San Diego v. Dauer, 97 Cal. 442, 32 P. 561, and Hancock v. Board of Education of the City of Santa Barbara, 140 Cal. 554, 74 P. 44, are likewise convincing, if not conclusive, authority to the effect that in the circumstances surrounding the instant case the city of San Diego was in no wise "legally interested"—which fact, according to the charter provision of the city of San Diego, was a prerequisite to the proper assumption by the city attorney of the duty of defending the litigation which was the basis of the employment of the respondent.

To revert to the case of Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 P. 558, a reading thereof discloses the fact that therein the city of San Diego was seeking to compel the county treasurer of the county of San Diego to deposit with the city treasurer of the city of San Diego certain moneys then in the custody of such county treasurer, which had been derived in part from the public school fund and apportioned to the San Diego school district. Although the city charter expressly provided for the eventual custody of such funds in the city treasury, the ruling by the Supreme Court was to the effect that such provision did not supersede the requirements of the Political Code that all moneys belonging to the school fund should be paid into the county treasury.

In the Dauer Case, supra, 97 Cal. 442, 32 P. 561, the city of San Diego sought to enjoin the county treasurer of the county of San Diego from paying out of school funds a warrant for the salary of the superintendent of public schools of the city of San Diego. In the course of the opinion it is said:

"These moneys are in the treasury [of the county] to the credit of the school district, and the city of San Diego, as a municipal corporation, has no interest therein."

It therefore becomes manifest that, as to each of the two requirements specified in the charter provision of the city of San Diego to which reference has been had, no duty was enjoined upon the city attorney to represent the school district in the litigation in question. If the city of San Diego was in no wise "legally interested" in the funds belonging to the school district, the injection by the city of its attorney into the litigation, while in no sense a gratuitous act, could be of no other or different effect than would legally result from a like attempted interference upon the part of a private individual, similarly situated so far as lack of legal interest in the litigation was concerned.

[3-5] The question of whether it was the duty of the district attorney of the county of San Diego to defend in the action brought against the board of education is not involved in this controversy; but, if it were here involved, it need only be said that the record discloses the admitted fact that such district attorney "refused to represent the school district in such litigation and advised the representatives of the school district to employ private counsel therein." In such circumstances the only recourse left to the board of education was either to permit judgment to be entered against it, or to follow the suggestion of the district attorney and engage an attorney to care for its interest in the action in question. Faced by such a situation, the only concern of the school district in the premises was whether it possessed the corporate power to employ counsel. With reference thereto, in the absence of express authority, it is conceded, alike by judicial authority and by text-writers, that one of the implied powers of a corporation is to sue and to be sued. While every man is presumed to know the law and authorized to represent himself in legal proceedings, as a matter of common knowledge it is almost universally accepted that such a presumption is nothing less than legal fiction, and that as a matter of fact the trained lawyer who assumes to appear for himself in litigation to which he is a party is but poorly represented. If the corporation had the implied power to become a party to the action, the incidental power therewith connected is the right to have advice of counsel. If the counsel to which by statute it is legally entitled refuse to act, its plainly authorized remedy is to employ other counsel.

The case of Denman v. Webster, 139 Cal. 452, 73 P. 139, is cited by appellants herein as an authority to the effect that no implied power to employ counsel exists in a corporation of the character of that here considered. A reading of that case, however, discloses the fact, that, in terms, but one justice of the Supreme Court insisted that such was the rule, and even he admitted the existence of such power "under certain circumstances." Without writing an opinion thereon, a second justice of the Supreme Court concurred in the view expressed in the opinion by the first justice. In a concurring opinion by a third justice of the court, it is said that—

"It [the school board] cannot in such a case employ other counsel until it has exhausted every means available to it to procure the services of the attorney provided by public authority to act for it without expense."

A fourth justice in effect concurred in such opinion. In a dissenting opinion, which was written by a fifth justice and concurred in by two other justices, it is said:

"* * * It is quite apparent that in performing many of these duties [thereinbefore enumerated] the board may not be able to escape litigation. It may be sued on a contract for supplies where the contractor had violated the contract, and where it is the plain duty of the board to refuse payment; it may be sued to recover a school lot or other property under its control; it may be compelled itself to institute an action for the protection of such property, or to remove obstructions in the way of performance of its duties. The records of this court show numerous instances of litigation into which boards of education have been forced, and the right of such boards to sue and be sued has been universally recognized. See cases cited in the opinion of the court in Mitchell v. Board of Education, 137 Cal. 375 [70 P. 180]. From the nature of the duties imposed upon the board, as above stated, and its right to sue and its subjection to the burden of being sued, it has the clearly implied power, in certain cases at least, to employ an attorney to prosecute or defend an action or proceeding to which it is a party. And we think that the action described in the complaint was a proper case for the exercise of that power. * * *

The implied power of a school board, at least "under certain circumstances," to employ counsel, thus becomes the unanimous opinion of the members of the court. As is expressly stated therein, the controversy before the court did not involve the school board, as a corporation, but concerned only certain members of the board in opposition to another person claiming to be a member thereof. The language of the prevailing opinion with reference thereto is as follows:

"The contest here was in reality one between certain individuals claiming to be the only members of the board and another individual claiming to be also a member."

In the instant case the school board, as a corporation, was the only party interested in the litigation. Other than the statement in the concurring opinion that "it (the school board) cannot in such a case employ other counsel until it has exhausted every means available to it to procure the services of the attorney provided by public authority to act for it without expense," what circumstances could be more potent than the refusal to act by the attorney whose legally specified duty it was to do so is not pointed out in the Denman Case. It is manifest that, by a proper request that the district attorney perform his assumed duty and by his refusal to do so, everything that was practicable had been done which might have been done in the premises to procure the assistance and advice of such counsel as was presumably provided by statute. The only possible recourse remaining to the school board was that of some sort of a legal proceeding to compel the district attorney to perform his duty. But clearly such a course likewise would have involved the necessity of employing an attorney, which fact, with the element of certain and disastrous delay and in the end, uncertainty of successful outcome, presented obstacles which we think fairly brought the case within the situation denominated by the writer of the prevailing opinion in the Denman Case, namely, "certain circumstances," which warranted and justified the exercise by the corporation of its implied and incidental power of employing counsel.

This court is therefore of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. HRJAK. (Cr. 1514.)District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 1, 1927.

As Amended Oct. 13, 1927.

1. Criminal law §176—Prior discharge by justice, for insufficiency of evidence to hold for trial party arrested and examined, is not available as "former jeopardy."

Where one arrested was merely examined by a justice and discharged for insufficiency of evidence to hold him for trial, this is not a bar as "former jeopardy" to further arrest and examination and trial for the same offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Jeopardy (In Criminal Law.).]

2. Criminal law §178—It is only dismissal for delay beyond statutory period in finding indictment, filing information, or bringing on trial that is "bar to other prosecution" (Pen. Code, §§ 1382, 1387).

Pen. Code, § 1387, providing that an order for dismissal of action, "as provided in this chapter," is a bar to other prosecution, applies only to those orders for dismissal enumerated in section 1382, part of such chapter, namely, for failure to find indictment or file information, within 30 days after defendant has been held to trial, or to bring him to trial within 60 days after finding of indictment or filing of information, unless trial had been postponed on his application.

3. Criminal law §166(1)—Forfeiting bail, if improper, could not have affected substantial rights so as to require reversal of conviction.

Conviction will not be reversed for forfeiting of defendant's bail, even if it was improper; it being impossible to see how it could have affected his substantial rights.

4. Bail §79(2)—Relief from any illegal forfeiture of bail cannot be had on appeal from conviction.

The method for relief provided by the statute for illegal forfeiture of bail must be followed; it cannot be had by appeal from the judgment of conviction.

5. Criminal law §511(1)—Rule against conviction on corroborated testimony of accomplice held inapplicable, in view of other evidence alone warranting conviction.

Rule against conviction on uncorroborated testimony of accomplice has no application where the corpus delicti was abundantly established and the jury were warranted from the facts and circumstances before them, without accomplice's testimony, in finding defendant guilty.

6. Criminal law §741(2)—Identification of defendant as the criminal need not be positively proved, but substantial facts and circumstances tending to connect him makes question for jury.

Identification of defendant as the one guilty of the crime charged need not be positively proved, but weight and sufficiency of evidence is entirely within the province of the jury where there are substantial facts and circumstances tending to connect him with the offense.

7. Criminal law §394—Court will not inquire as to source of competent evidence produced or means by which it was obtained.

Where competent evidence is produced on a trial, the courts will not inquire into its source or means by which it was obtained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Wm. H. Ellis, Judge.

George Hrkak was prosecuted for unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor. From a judgment of conviction, and an order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph Seymour, of Riverside, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. On February 10, 1927, a complaint was filed with the justice of the peace of Temescal township, in the county of Riverside, charging the appellant with having committed "the crime of misdemeanor, to wit, the unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor," in the city of Corona, Riverside county, on or about February 9, 1927. The justice of the peace thereupon issued a warrant for appellant's arrest, and on the same date he was apprehended, brought into the justice's court, pleaded not guilty, and his preliminary examination was had on February 15, 1927. After hearing the evidence the justice of the peace of Temescal township found "that there is not sufficient evidence upon which to hold the defendant, George Hrkak, and it is ordered that the defendant be discharged," and appellant was released. On February 16, 1927, another complaint was filed with the justice of the peace of Riverside township, in said county, wherein appellant was charged with having manufactured intoxicating liquor in the county of Riverside on or about February 10, 1927. He was arrested, posted cash bail in the sum of $500, and on March 10, 1927, a preliminary examination was held, and the last-mentioned justice of the peace made and entered an order reciting, in part, "that from the evidence presented it appears that the offense charged has been committed, and there is probable cause to believe that the defendant committed it. He will therefore be held for trial in the superior court of this county." Thereafter the case was tried before a jury in the superior court. The defendant's personal appearance was waived, evidence was introduced, a verdict of guilty was returned, and judgment was entered accordingly. Appellant failing to appear, his bail was forfeited, and a bench warrant was issued, during the deliberations of the jury. The defendant appealed from the verdict and judgment, and attacks various steps taken by both the justice's court of Riverside township and the superior court, but the principal ground requiring attention here, and which was strenuously urged at the second preliminary and during the trial, is that of alleged former jeopardy. Stating the proposition in the appellant's own language as presented in his briefs, it is insisted "that the defendant had a hearing of the same identical charge, and was discharged, for insufficient evidence and subsequently was rearrested, tried, and convicted of said identical charge," and that the superior court "denied the defendant's offer to prove that he had been once in jeopardy and that he had been acquitted."

[1] We think to state the ground here urged for reversal is to furnish the obvious answer to it. To argue that one justice of the peace deemed the evidence insufficient to warrant holding appellant for trial, and that another justice, upon the evidence before him, decided that appellant should be held for trial, amounts to no more and no less than an admission that he had not yet been tried, and consequently had not been once in jeopardy. This question was decided in Ex parte Fenton, 77 Cal. 183, 19 P. 267, wherein the Supreme Court said:

"The fact that defendant had been previously arrested on the same charge, examined before a magistrate, and discharged, is not a bar to a second arrest and examination.

"A person cannot be said to have been once in jeopardy until he is put upon trial before a court of competent jurisdiction, upon indictment or information which is sufficient in form and substance to sustain a conviction, and a jury has been charged with his deliverance." (Italics as quoted.)

[2] Appellant refers to section 1387 of the Penal Code, and upon it bases a claim that because the justice of the peace of Temescal township made the order above quoted, no further prosecution for the same offense can be maintained. This section has no application to the instant case. It reads:

"An order for the dismissal of the action, as provided in this chapter, is a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense, if it is a misdemeanor," etc.

The language is too plain to be mistaken. It limits the application of the section to those orders for dismissal provided in chapter 8, tit. 10, of the Penal Code. Such orders are those enumerated in section 1382 of that Code, and both subdivisions 1 and 2 thereof refer to cases where a person has been held for a public offense. In subdivision 1 it is provided that an action must be dismissed if an indictment is not found or information filed within 30 days after the defendant has been held to answer; and in subdivision 2 it is provided that where a defendant is not brought to trial within 60 days after the finding of an indictment or filing of an information, and a trial has not been postponed upon his own application, the prosecution must be dismissed. These are the only orders for dismissal to which section 1387 applies.

[3, 4] Concerning appellant's complaint that his bail was forfeited improperly, it is sufficient to say that inasmuch as he has made no attempt to point out any way in which error in that behalf, if committed, could have affected his substantial rights and we are unable to perceive how such a result could follow, it is unnecessary and inexpedient to pass upon that question. If his bail was illegally forfeited, the law provides a method by which he might seek its recovery, but he cannot do so through an appeal from the judgment. Where no other or different judgment than that rendered would result even though the action complained of was erroneous, the judgment will not be reversed. People v. Scott, 24 Cal. App. 440, 141 P. 945; People v. Gibson, 106 Cal. 458, 39 P. 864; People v. Grider, 13 Cal. App. 703, 110 P. 586.

[5, 6] It appears that appellant owned a large still for the manufacture of whisky, which he and one Hoffman operated on the second floor of the premises where Hrbak was arrested; that Hoffman was not present at the time of the search and arrest of appellant, but that appellant was apprehended as he came down the stairs; he admitted to the officers that it was his home, but when asked as to his true name he gave a fictitious one. Hoffman's wife testified as to the ownership of the still and admitted that at times she may have watched it for the two men; that she assisted in bottling the product. A large quantity of the whisky was also found on the same floor, together with mash, sugar, etc. It is argued that if it be held that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment, Mrs. Hoffman was shown to have been an accomplice, and that a conviction based upon her uncorroborated evidence would have to be reversed. This point requires but brief attention, since the rule contended for is not applicable to this case. The corpus delicti was abundantly established, and the jury may well have been warranted from the facts and circumstances before them, even in the absence of Mrs. Hoffman's testimony, in finding the defendant guilty. Identification of a defendant as the criminal need not be positively proved, and the weight and sufficiency of the evidence is entirely within the province of the jury, where, as here, there are substantial facts and circumstances tending to connect him with the offense. People v. Rolfe, 61 Cal. 540; People v. Franklin, 46 Cal. App. 1, 188 P. 607.

[7] The only other contention worthy of discussion is the asserted error of the trial court in declining to instruct the jury as to the law governing the issuance of search warrants, their service, etc. None of these matters was relevant or proper to be considered by the jury. Where competent evidence is produced on a trial, the courts will not inquire into its source or the means by which it was obtained. People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 237, 205 P. 435, 24 A. L. R. 1383.

Other alleged errors are assigned for reversal, but they consist of rulings of the court and the giving or refusing to give instructions based upon erroneous theories which have already been disposed of.

The judgment and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

ENGLISH v. CULLEY et al. (Civ. 5302.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 1, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 31, 1927.

1. Pledges ⇨28, 30(3)—Pledgee holding trust fund as security has responsibility similar to trustee's, and though he may buy at sale transaction must be bona fide.

Relation between parties to transaction, where collateral security is placed with pledgee with power of sale in case of default, is in nature of a trust, and, although the pledgee may himself become the purchaser of the pledged property, under the Code, the purchase must be made in the utmost good faith.

2. Pledges ⇨30(3)—Pledgee's buying property at forced sale for inadequate price and profiting by prearranged subsequent sale would be fraud on pledgor.

Pledgee's buying property covered by trust deed, which was pledged to secure note, at a forced sale for an inadequate price, and profiting by a prearranged subsequent sale, would be fraud on pledgor.

3. Pledges ⇨30(3)—Pledgee selling property has duty of collecting as much as possible to apply on debt.

Where a trust deed covering certain property was pledged to secure a debt, the pledgee selling the property covered by the trust deed has the duty of collecting as much as possible for application on the principal debt.

4. Pledges ⇨30(3)—Very slight additional evidence will impeach sale of pledged property to pledgee, where price is grossly inadequate.

While mere inadequacy of price may not be sufficient ground for refusing to give effect to a sale caused by the pledgee where the property was bought by the pledgee himself, where such inadequacy is great very slight additional evidence is sufficient to impeach it.

5. Pledges ⇨30(3)—Profit made by pledgee from buying property at forced sale held to inure to pledgors' profit.

Profit made by pledgee of trust deed covering property which he caused to be sold at a forced sale and bought himself, later selling according to prearranged plan, held to inure to pledgors' benefit.

6. Pledges ⇨30(5)—Rejecting evidence that pledgee of trust deed bought property covered at forced sale to sell at profit held error.

Rejecting evidence to the effect that the pledgee of a trust deed bought the property covered at a forced sale which he had caused and had subsequently sold the property according to a prearranged plan at a great profit held error, such evidence being admissible to show fraud on the pledgors.

7. Pledges ⇨30(3)—Pledgee of trust deed purchasing property covered cannot deduct accrued interest on debt secured before crediting price paid on pledgors' indebtedness.

Pledgee of trust deed purchasing property covered by the trust deed cannot deduct accrued interest on the debt which the trust deed secured before crediting the price which he paid for the property on the pledgors' principal indebtedness.

8. Pledges ⇨30(3)—Pledgee in possession of lands under trust deed held not entitled to credit for cattle feed, where feed was produced on land at pledgors' expense.

Where a pledgee had possession of land under a trust deed and grew cattle feed thereon at defendants' expense, which he fed to the cattle, held, that in accounting with pledgors pledgee was not entitled to credit for cattle feed, since the feed was a profit arising from the land for which pledgee was bound to account to pledgors.

9. Usury ⇨111(2)—Usury need not be pleaded where contract shows on its face its usurious character.

Where a contract is on its face usurious it is not necessary to plead usury, and it is the court's duty on its own motion to deny interest.

10. Usury ⇨47—Note providing that 12 per cent. interest be compounded semiannually held to violate usury law providing that maximum rate should be 12 per cent. per annum (Usury Law, § 2).

Note providing for interest payments at 12 per cent. per annum, interest payable semiannually, and if not paid to be compounded, held usurious, under Usury Law, § 2 (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), providing that interest shall not exceed $12 upon $100 for 1 year.

11. Usury ⇨88—Where note was usurious, judgment providing for legal interest payments did not free note from illegal taint and was erroneous.

Where note was usurious because providing for maximum interest rate compounded semiannually, a judgment providing that interest should be compounded annually held not to free the note from the taint of usury and to be erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action for an accounting by P. A. English against Fern Hays Culley and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Lucien Gray, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action was commenced by plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining a decree declaring a certain trust deed made by the defendant Smith to the plaintiff to be a mortgage to secure a note executed by the defendants Culley to the plaintiff and foreclosing the same. The defendants filed an answer claiming certain credits in addition to those admitted by the plaintiff in his amended and supplemental complaint, and the action developed into one for an accounting between the parties. The amended and supplemental complaint alleged, in substance, that on the 24th day of June, 1920, the defendants Fern Hays Culley and B. F. Culley were indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $49,892, and on the 31st day of July, 1920, they executed and delivered to plaintiff their promissory note for said amount. The note is then set forth in hæc verba. It provides for interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from date until paid, interest payable semiannually, and if not so paid to be compounded and bear interest at the same rate as the principal. The complaint further alleged that on the 24th day of June, 1920, the defendant M. B. Smith, a widow, for the purpose of securing the aforesaid indebtedness and promissory note, executed and delivered to plaintiff a deed in fee simple of certain described property situated in the city of Long Beach, county of Los Angeles. That notwithstanding its form, the same was intended to operate as a mortgage as security for the debt. That as and for additional security said Smith, as a part of the same transaction made and delivered to plaintiff an assignment and transfer of all her right in and to a certain promissory note for the sum of $15,000, executed by her in favor of one Dora B. Morris, dated June 23, 1920. The assignment recited, among other things, that this note was due twenty-five years from date and was being held in escrow for the benefit of the payee during her lifetime and upon her death was to become the property of M. B. Smith or her heirs, or assigns, and it was secured by deed of trust on the property in Long Beach, which had been conveyed by M. B. Smith to plaintiff as hereinabove recited. Other allegations then allege the interest of M. B. Smith and Dora B. Morris in the property, but a recital of such interest is not necessary for a discussion of the case.

The complaint proceeding alleges that defendants Fern Hays Culley and B. F. Culley have or claim to have an interest in the said lands which it is alleged is subsequent and subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage. Then follows an allegation as to certain payments made by defendants upon the note sued upon and the prayer for judgment foreclosing defendants' rights in the property. Defendants, by an amended and supplemental answer, alleged, in substance, that plaintiff had been receiving since March 1, 1921, a rent of $160 per month from the Long Beach property, and on January 1, 1921, received $2,245.71, and on May 1, 1921, $1,000, to apply on the note, and had received other items of interest from collateral security held by plaintiff as additional security for said note; that on or about October 15, 1921, plaintiff had received $25,500 on said note, and on or about January 6, 1922, a further sum of $15,000. For a second defense and counterclaim they allege that on said last-named date defendants Culley delivered to plaintiff a certain note in the sum of $15,000, known as the Delano note, made by one D. M. Alexander to order of plaintiff secured by a deed of trust on real property situated in Kern county, and on July 10, 1922, plaintiff received the sum of $15,940 in payments thereon and had refused to credit said sum or any part thereof on the note sued upon. As a third separate defense defendants alleged that on July 31, 1920, defendants Culley delivered to plaintiff a note for $32,500, dated June 15, 1920, executed by Kate and John Haering and indorsed by J. R. Milligan in favor of defendant Fern Hays Culley and secured by a trust deed by the makers on certain real estate in San Diego county, and that said Fern Hays Culley assigned said $32,500 to plaintiff as collateral security; that plaintiff received $1,500 on the principal of said note, and also received interest thereon amounting to the sum of $745.71; that said note was on January 1, 1921, surrendered and a new note for $31,000 dated December 13, 1920, executed by the Haerings and Milligan in favor of Fern Hays Culley, secured by a like trust deed, and also assigned to plaintiff as collateral security, and that plaintiff received on said note on May 1, 1921, a payment of $1,000 and interest in the sum of $1,695; that plaintiff declared a forfeit on said $31,000 note and trust deed and caused said premises to be sold; that prior to such sale plaintiff agreed with defendants that if they would not appear and bid at such sale plaintiff would take the $31,000 note as his own at a valuation of $25,500 and would credit such amount on their indebtedness and that by reason of such promise they did not attend or interfere with the sale. For a fourth separate defense and counterclaim defendants alleged all the facts set up in the third defense, and also that prior to the date of sale plaintiff agreed with one Connor to sell to him the real estate described in the trust deed for the sum of $30,000, in addition to all charges and expenses incurred or paid by reason of the sale, and that Connor at that time agreed to purchase the same for such amount; that at the date of the sale the property was reasonably worth the sum of $50,000. That plaintiff acquired the property at the sale for the sum of $20,000 and received a conveyance thereof, and immediately thereafter conveyed the same to one Ober at the request of Connor, who thereupon paid plaintiff the sum of $38,303.41 for said conveyance to Ober; that if defendants had not understood from plaintiff that he would, upon acquiring the property under the sale, credit them with the sum of $25,500 upon their note, they would have attended the sale and bid the sum of $35,000 for the property; that plaintiff refused to credit them with the $25,500 as agreed, or to account to them for any part of the proceeds realized from said sale to Connor, or to credit their note with any sum whatsoever derived from the sale except the sum of $11,520.24. For a fifth and separate defense and by way of counterclaim defendants alleged that the $31,000 note was further secured by a chattel mortgage upon certain farming utensils, which mortgage was also transferred to plaintiff as security for the indebtedness sued upon; that said personal property was of the value of $7,000; that plaintiff converted a large amount thereof to his own personal use and has refused to account to defendants for the same. They prayed that plaintiff be compelled to credit them with the various amounts claimed to be due them, and an accounting was asked for to ascertain this amount.

Among other facts, the trial court found that plaintiff did not agree to take the $31,000 Haering trust deed note for $25,500 as his own, and credit the note sued on with said amount as alleged by defendants, but that such agreement was upon condition that defendants pay the balance of their indebtedness in cash, which they failed to do. It found that plaintiff bid in the property at the trust deed sale for $20,000; that plaintiff's bid was the only one received at such sale, but that the property was worth $40,000; that plaintiff credited the note sued on with the sum of $13,592.31, the net proceeds of said sale. At the trial plaintiff offered and there was received in evidence an itemized statement of all expenses incurred by him in the care of the property sold under the trust deed and the expenses of sale, which amounts were deducted from his bid of $20,000. The trial court disallowed several of these items, thereby increasing the amount of the credit on defendants' indebtedness, but allowed an item of $855.39 as interest, which defendants claim to be an improper charge. The court further found that plaintiff did not receive the $15,000 Delano trust deed note to apply on the note sued on, but found that said $15,000 was given to secure other claims of plaintiff and that only a balance of $6,330.41 received by plaintiff from the $15,000 note was to be credited on account of the note sued upon. It was also found that plaintiff and Connor did not agree to sell and purchase the property in the $31,000 Haering trust deed, and that Connor did not pay to plaintiff $38,303.41 as alleged by defendants or any other sum. With reference to the claim that plaintiff had permitted the farming utensils subject to chattel mortgage to be removed or lost, the finding was against defendants. The court rendered judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $38,120.55 as of February 5, 1923, with attorney's fees and costs. Defendants have specified numerous errors as grounds for reversal. It is first claimed that error was committed by the trial court in rejecting all evidence to sustain the allegations of the defense and counterclaim that plaintiff had agreed to sell, and did sell to Connor for $38,303.41, the property included in the Haering and Milligan trust deed, and that such agreement was made prior to the date that plaintiff bid in the property for $20,000. The findings of the trial court that no such agreement was made or that Connor ever purchased the property exists solely for the reason that the court rejected all evidence upon this subject, and then found negatively that there was no evidence to support defendants' allegations with reference thereto. In this connection it is appellants' contention that the trial court erred in the rejection of this evidence for the reason that, as plaintiff held the Haering and Milligan note and trust deed as collateral security for the payment of the note given by the defendants Culley to the plaintiff, he was a pledgee, and his position was, therefore, that of a trustee, and, consequently that any profit made by him out of the transaction while such pledgee inured to the benefit of the pledgors, the defendants Culley. Plaintiff, on the other hand, claims that he exercised his lawful right in making the sale in a lawful way. That as a pledgee holding a mortgage as collateral security for a loan, he had the right to foreclose the same when due and purchase at his own foreclosure sale, and it is no concern of the defendants whether or not he subsequently sold the property and made a profit.

[1] While this may generally be true, still the relation existing between parties to a transaction, where collateral security is placed in the hands of a pledgee as security for the payment of a debt with power of sale in case of default, is in the nature of a trust. The responsibility of the pledgee to the pledgor is similar to that of a trustee; he holds the stock for specific purposes—namely, to return it to the pledgor in the event of payment of the indebtedness, or if sold by him either at public or private sale to so act that the sale will be fair and bona fide. The fact that the pledgee himself may become the purchaser, by reason of the Code provision, which was not permitted at common law, affords an additional reason why the pledgee is held to the utmost good faith in dealing with the pledged property. Hudgens v. Chamberlain, 161 Cal. 710, 120 P. 422.

[2, 3] Defendants charged and sought to prove that plaintiff, prior to the sale, had entered into negotiations for a private sale of the land, and in fact had actually sold the same. That the price he received under this arrangement was $38,303.41 and the price he paid was only $20,000, a profit of $18,303.41. By his act in negotiating the sale, assuming the rejected evidence to be true, he certainly practiced an imposition amounting to fraud upon the defendants. It is reasonable to suppose that but for the arrangement with Connor the latter would have himself bid at least the amount he agreed to pay to plaintiff. It was the duty of plaintiff to collect all that he could from the security pledged to him for application on the principal debt. Assuming the arrangement with Connor to be a fact, such arrangement on his part certainly tended to prevent the accomplishment of this result. Here there is an express finding that the interest in the property¹ was worth $40,000.

[4] While mere inadequacy of price may not be sufficient ground for refusing to give full effect to a sale of this character, still where such inadequacy is apparent and great, very slight additional evidence is sufficient to impeach it. Winbigler v. Sherman, 175 Cal. 270, 165 P. 943. It is a circumstance therefore to be considered with the claim that plaintiff had arranged for a private sale of the lands at a price approximating the value found by the court. The private arrangement would certainly tend at least in some degree to create a weak market, thus preventing the obtaining of a fair price. It certainly shows a lack of good faith and fair dealing with the pledged property and places plaintiff in an attitude antagonistic to his trust, and such interference with the sale tends to impeach the fairness of the transaction. Odell v. Cox, 151 Cal. 70, 90 P. 194.

[5, 6] Here no right of redemption existed, and a profit made under the claimed circumstances should inure to the benefit of defendants. Nor can the plaintiff avoid his duty to account for a profit made under such circumstances by claiming that he did not purchase pledged property, which was the note and trust deed, the real property being mere security. Plaintiff cannot by such a claim change the nature of the transaction. Plaintiff sold the security which he held as pledgee as evidenced by the note and trust deed, and if, as claimed, he interfered with the sale so as to acquire the property for less than it was worth, and did so acquire it, he should be made to answer for the profits realized. Upon this subject, therefore, we conclude that the trial court erred in rejecting the offered evidence.

[7] Appellants further object to an allowance to plaintiff of certain items of expense claimed by him to have been incurred in the care of the property sold under the trust deed, and which was deducted from his bid of $20,000 before crediting the amount to defendants. The first of these items has reference to a charge of accrued interest for $855.39. We are of the opinion that there is no evidence in the record to support the allowance of this claim. Plaintiff testified with reference thereto that he thought it was expended by him for interest on a prior mortgage existing on the property sold, but he expressed a doubt upon the subject. On cross-examination, he admitted that the amount was computed by an officer of a bank. The evidence, however, conclusively shows that the amount was computed by such officer as accrued interest on the $30,000 trust deed note under which the sale was made. The interest on this note has been paid up to October 1, 1921. The officer computed the interest due up to the date of sale which took place February 25, 1922. This collateral note bore interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and at simple interest the amount of accrued interest totaled $845.80. Plaintiff revised these figures by compounding the interest, which then totaled the sum of $855.39, the exact amount charged and allowed. It is manifest that defendants should not be charged with the amount of this item. It was part and parcel of the security purchased by plaintiff for which he paid $20,000. He never expended this or any other sum as accrued interest on this note or any other obligation to any one, so as to entitle him to a credit. It was a part of the security which he held and subsequently purchased. As counsel for appellant suggests, if the property had been sold to a stranger the full amount of the purchase price would have to be paid by him, and plaintiff is in no different position. It is true, the interest was due on the collateral note which he held, but so was the principal. He purchased the property secured by the note for this indebtedness, and he paid $20,000 for the same. He could not then credit himself with the accrued interest any more than he could with a part of all of the principal. He was therefore not entitled to a credit of this amount, and the court erred in allowing it to him.

[8] The same may be said with reference to the credit allowed plaintiff for cattle feed, and which was deducted by him from the amount received under the Delano trust deed. The evidence upon the subject shows that plaintiff, while in possession of the lands under the trust deed, produced feed amounting to the sum of $2,352. This feed was by him fed to certain cattle upon the lands. It was produced upon the land and the expense of its production was charged to defendants. It was therefore a profit arising from the land for which he was bound to account to defendants. The allowance to plaintiff of this amount as a credit was therefore unauthorized. And, finally, appellant contends that the interest provided for in the note sued upon is usurious and void by reason of the provisions of section 2 of the Usury Law (Stats. 1919, p. lxxxiii). As hereinabove recited, the note provides for the payment of the principal sum of $49,892, "with interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from date until paid, interest payable semiannually and if not so paid to be compounded, * * * and bear the same rate of interest as the principal; and should the interest not be paid semiannually, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note." The Usury Law provides, in substance, that no greater sum for the loan or forbearance of money shall exceed the rate of $12 upon $100 for 1 year; and in the computation of interest it shall not be compounded nor shall the interest be construed to bear interest unless an agreement to that effect is clearly expressed in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith. It also provides that any agreement or contract of any nature in conflict with the provisions of this section shall be null and void as to any agreement or stipulation therein contained to pay interest, and no action at law to recover interest shall be maintained, and the debt cannot be declared due until the full period of time it was contracted for has elapsed.

[9-11] Counsel for respondent urgently insists that a contract for the payment of interest semiannually at the maximum legal rate, and compounded if not so paid, is not usurious, but merely states a penalty for failure to pay interest when due. He also insists that the defense of usury was not pleaded, and therefore cannot now be raised. In addition, he argues that the Usury Law violates the Constitution of the state and the Constitution of the United States, all of which, it is pointed out, are designed to prevent arbitrary and unwarranted discriminations and classifications. A discussion of these questions would answer no useful purpose. The note here sued on does, in express terms, provide for interest at the maximum rate per annum, payable semiannually, and if not so paid, to be compounded, and bear the same rate of interest as the principal. Since the submission of this cause our Supreme Court had handed down three opinions which discuss the Usury Law invoked by appellants. In Haines v. Com. Mtg. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 805, it is held that a contention that as long as the limit of the rate of interest is maintained at 12 per cent. per annum, the compounding of the interest, if not paid at the time provided for, should be allowed, is in the teeth of the statute itself and cannot be maintained. It has also been held that it is not necessary to plead usury where the contract shows on its face its usurious character. Under such circumstances, it is the duty of the court sua sponte to deny any interest. Wallace v. Zinman (Cal. Sup.) 254 P. 946. The constitutionality of the act has likewise been passed upon and upheld. In re Washer (Cal. Sup.) 254 P. 951; Wallace v. Zinman, supra. Other questions, considering our conclusions become unimportant.

The trial court found that plaintiff was entitled to judgment on the note sued on, together with interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, compounded annually. The note provided in unambiguous terms for compounding the interest semiannually. The Usury Law declares such a note to be null and void as to the agreement to pay interest. The mere fact that the judgment, contrary to the terms of the note, provides for compounding the interest annually, does not free the note from its illegal taint. 39 Cyc. 1003. The usurious transaction having been completed, the penalty attaches. A large amount of the judgment is made up of interest charges, and to that extent it is unauthorized.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

MACK v. GAVELLO et al. (Civ. 5826.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 7, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 2, 1927.

1. Brokers ⇨57(2)—That terms of purchase varied from terms specified in broker's contract authorizing purchase held no defense to broker's action for compensation, where modifications were readily accepted.

That contract between prospective purchasers and broker authorized purchase of hotel for $115,000 with a trust deed for $15,000 to be given to the owner, whereas the terms of the purchase were the same price with $7,500 cash and a trust deed for $7,500 to be given to the owner, was no defense to the broker's action for compensation, where the modifications were readily accepted by the purchasers.

2. Brokers ⇨44—Broker's contract authorizing purchase of hotel might be canceled at any time before owner agreed to sell, where it did not specify time limit.

Where broker's contract authorizing purchase of hotel did not specify a time limit within which the owner's agreement to sell should be obtained, contract might be canceled at any time before owner signed agreement to sell.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Court's findings may not be ignored on appeal, where based on conflicting evidence.

Where the trial court's findings are based on conflicting evidence, they may not be ignored on appeal.

4. Brokers $\S$ 56(2)—Broker did not lose any rights to compensation under contract authorizing him to purchase hotel because purchasers participated in consummation of deal.

Where prospective purchasers authorized broker to consummate purchase of hotel for them, that they themselves thereafter came forward and had interviews with owner and her agent and thereby expedited the purchase was no defense to action by broker for compensation under contract.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 1010(1)—That evidence did not sustain trial court's findings on immaterial matters held not to require reversal.

Fact that evidence did not sustain certain of trial court's findings on immaterial matters, as, for example, on matters of evidence, held not to require reversal.

6. Brokers $\S$ 63(4)—Where purchasers' acts prevented their broker from obtaining release of claim, existence of claim was no defense to broker's action for compensation.

Broker held entitled to compensation under contract authorizing purchase of hotel as against purchasers' contention that he failed to furnish marketable title because of existence of certain claim, where purchasers' own acts prevented broker from putting into effect a tentative contract for release of claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action for compensation for negotiating the purchase of a hotel brought by W. H. Mack against P. Gavello and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; WASTE, C. J., and RICHARDS, J., voting for transfer.

C. F. Humphrey and Grant & Zimdars, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Herman Weinberger and Walter C. Fox, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff sued to recover compensation alleged to have become due and payable through a real estate transaction. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The plaintiff pleaded his case in two separate counts. The defendants did not interpose a demurrer, but appeared and answered. Some uncontroverted facts are that prior to the beginning of these transactions the defendants were attempting to locate a property which would be suitable for their business location, and which they could purchase; that the Hotel Woodrow, located at 364 O'Farrell street, in San Francisco, was such a property; that the plaintiff took the defendants to that hotel and showed it to them; that the hotel was owned by Mrs. S. R. Spotts; that it was heavily incumbered, and that foreclosure proceedings were then being instituted; that the hotel was satisfactory and the estimated cost was satisfactory to the defendants; that on the 11th day of August, 1921, the defendants executed and delivered to the plaintiff what the parties call "the second offer" to purchase the Hotel Woodrow, and that on the same day they delivered to the plaintiff a written authorization of employment to purchase for them the said hotel, and that, on the same day, the plaintiff placed the offer before the owner of the Hotel Woodrow; that the offer was never rejected, but that the exact terms of the sale were not assented to by the parties thereto until August 16, 1921. The record discloses no attack as to the sufficiency of the writings. The plaintiff's contract contained no statement as to the length of time in which the plaintiff would be required to perform his contract. The parties do not controvert but what under these circumstances the plaintiff would have a reasonable length of time, and it is not asserted that he was dilatory; and, indeed, under the facts, it could not well be claimed that the plaintiff did not act with all due speed. Under the terms of his written employment, the plaintiff was to receive as his compensation the difference between $122,500 and the amount paid as the purchase price.

[1] The consummation of the transaction involved numerous disagreements between the plaintiff and the owner and her agent, and between the plaintiff and his employers. Among other things, the defendants claim that the plaintiff abandoned the contract. On that issue the evidence was distinctly conflicting, and the trial court made a finding thereon in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants asserted that they discharged the plaintiff. The same comment applies. It is not controverted but what an executory contract to buy and sell was executed August 16, 1921, and that the transaction was finally completed, and that the defendants obtained title to the property. During the progress of the proceedings the defendants came forward and had interviews with the owner and her agent, and there is evidence to the effect that in so doing they expedited the consummation of the contract. In doing what they did they acted within their rights, but such acts did not so operate as to release them from their obligations to the plaintiff. In finally closing the transaction, the terms of the sale were slightly modified by the vendor and vendee. The total cost remained at $115,000, but the amount actually paid the owner consisted of $7,500 cash and a trust deed in the sum of $7,500 instead of a trust deed in the sum of $15,000 as provided in the second offer. The undisputed facts are that it was readily accepted by the defendants. The modification therefore constituted no defense in this case. Twogood v. Monnette, 191 Cal. 103, 215 P. 542; 9 C. J. 601, § 89.

[2, 3] The defendants contend that as there was no time limit in the so-called obligation of August 11, 1921, within which the consent of the owner to a sale should be obtained, the defendants had the power to cancel the obligation at any time before the owner signed the obligation agreeing to sell. That contention may be conceded, but the trial court made a finding that these defendants did not cancel the obligation. The evidence was conflicting—so conflicting that the trial court intimated, at times, that witnesses for the defendants were reckless in their statements, and that the trial court did not believe them. Such findings may not be ignored.

[4] The defendants also contend that before the plaintiff could recover it was essential that he secure an owner, who was able to transfer a good and marketable title, an agreement in writing whereby the owner would agree to sell upon the terms stated in the written authorization. The vice in this contention is that according to the findings of the court the plaintiff did all these things. Of course, we realize that the defendants are taking the position that they did some of them, but to that the plaintiff may properly reply that conceding the defendants did assist the fact is no defense. They need not have given assistance. Having employed the plaintiff to consummate the contract, they need not have further concerned themselves. But having come forward and participated in the consummation of the contract, the defendants did not thereby preclude the plaintiff from any of his rights under the contract. Blumenthal v. Goodall, 89 Cal. 251, 26 P. 906; Quist v. Goodfellow, 99 Minn. 509, 110 N. W. 65, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 153, 9 Ann. Cas. 431, note on page 434.

[5] The trial court made a vast number of findings. The defendants attack some twenty of the findings as being unsustained by the evidence. We have carefully examined all of those attacks and find no merit in them. Within the mass of irrelevant matter in the record, we have indicated there were material facts on which the plaintiff had a clear right to recover. On each and every element that was material to that right the findings are supported by the evidence. As to some immaterial matters, it may be conceded that the findings are not supported. For example, both parties pleaded some of their evidence instead of facts. Findings in response to those matters were immaterial, and it may not be said that there was a miscarriage of justice because those immaterial findings are not supported by the evidence.

[6] On the argument the defendants contended that the plaintiff did not obtain a marketable title by reason of the existence of the Gross claim. It was even intimated that the Gross claim was a concoction of and was put of record on the instigation of this plaintiff. The title which was delivered was the sheriff's deed made pursuant to the foreclosure proceedings. It is not even suggested that the deed did not have the effect of conveying the title free and clear of the Gross claim. There was evidence that the plaintiff had nothing to do with the creation or recordation of the Gross claim. There was also evidence that when he heard of its existence he at once entered into negotiations with its owner to obtain a release, and that he succeeded in making a tentative contract to that effect, but the acts of the defendants operated to prevent the plaintiff from putting into effect his tentative contract with Gross.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. VALENCIA. (Cr. 1487.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 1, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 31, 1927.

1. Criminal law §517(4)—Where all elements of rape were established by other witnesses, defendant's confession held admissible.

In prosecution for rape where prosecutrix and doctors gave evidence covering all elements of the offense, corpus delicti held sufficiently established to permit introduction in evidence of defendant's confession.

2. Rape §43(2)—Where prosecutrix testified she had had intercourse only with defendant, evidence of birth of child less than seven months after act charged held admissible.

Where prosecutrix in prosecution for statutory rape testified that she had never had sexual relations with any one except defendant, evidence of the birth of a child about six and a half months after the act charged held admissible.

3. Rape §57(1)—Weight of testimony in prosecution for rape held for jury.

Weight of doctors' testimony of pregnancy and birth of child and testimony of prosecutrix as to age, act of intercourse, and that she had never had sexual relations with any one except defendant held for jury.

4. Criminal law §1159(5)—Evidence held sufficient to show corpus delicti for purposes of considering appeal.

For purposes of considering an appeal from a conviction of statutory rape, evidence held sufficient to establish the corpus delicti.

5. Criminal law §1130(5)—Point not supported by argument or authority will not be considered.

Point asserted without argument or authority held not sufficient presentation of alleged error to demand consideration.

6. Witnesses $\S$ 37(1)—Prosecutrix held to have sufficient knowledge to justify admitting her testimony of statutory rape, notwithstanding lack of ability to express herself.

Prosecutrix held to have sufficient knowledge to justify admitting her testimony of statutory rape, notwithstanding that she appeared to be at a loss as to the manner of expressing herself.

7. Witnesses $\S$ 37(1)—Whether prosecutrix had knowledge concerning nature of rape sufficient for basis of discrimination held to concern weight of testimony, and not admissibility.

Whether the knowledge of the prosecutrix concerning the nature of the act of rape was sufficient for her to have a basis of discrimination held a matter effecting the weight of her testimony, and not its admissibility.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 119(4)—In absence of record showing that 30-minute limitation for argument prejudiced defendant convicted of rape, limitation held no error.

On appeal from a conviction for statutory rape, where it was not shown in the record how defendant's rights were prejudiced by the court's limiting the time for argument to 30 minutes, limitation held no error.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 772(4)—Refusal to charge that rape committed on any other day than that charged would not sustain conviction held no error, where only one offense was proved.

Where only the act of statutory rape charged in the information was proved, it was not error to refuse to charge that defendant must have committed offense on date charged, and that commission of act on any other day would not sustain a conviction.

10. Rape $\S$ 52(1)—Evidence held to support conviction for statutory rape.

Evidence held sufficient to justify verdict that defendant was guilty of statutory rape as charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Armando Valencia was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Joe R. Marquette, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendant was charged by an information in two counts with the offense of statutory rape. At the time of the trial the prosecutrix testified that she did not have sexual intercourse with the defendant on the day of June 13, 1926, as alleged in the second count, and for that reason it was dismissed. She did, however, testify that the offense charged in the first count was committed on June 6, 1926. The jury returned a verdict of guilty on this count, and the defendant appeals from the judgment pronounced thereon and also from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

While put by appellant in several different forms, his attack upon the judgment amounts to this: (1) That the corpus delicti was not proved and the confession of defendant was improperly admitted; (2) that the court erred in permitting the prosecutrix to testify concerning the act, because she demonstrated a lack of knowledge sufficient for a basis of discrimination; (3) that counsel's argument at the time of trial was erroneously curtailed; (4) that the court refused to give a requested instruction; and (5) that the evidence is so incredible, improbable, and far from being clear and convincing that it is insufficient to justify the verdict.

[1-4] Assuming for the moment that the testimony of the prosecutrix was admissible, and that the objections which counsel has to it run to the weight rather than to its admissibility, then the testimony related by her and two doctors furnishes evidence covering every element of the offense and establishes the corpus delicti sufficiently for the introduction of the confession of the defendant. She testified to her age of 15 years and to the act of sexual intercourse. Dr. Beatty examined the witness on November 18, 1926, and found that she had been pregnant seven or eight months. Dr. Polesky testified to the birth of a child to the complaining witness on December 25, 1926. While the defendant argues that the testimony of the doctors should have been stricken, and that instead of proving the act it tended to disprove it by reason of the fact that the normal period of human gestation is nine months, nevertheless it must be borne in mind that the prosecutrix testified that she had never had intercourse with any other person. And in this connection, it was decided in the case of People v. Johnson, 51 Cal. App. 464, 197 P. 135, that testimony as to the birth of a child to the prosecuting witness within approximately one month after the act charged, "where it was the consistent claim of the prosecutrix that she had had no relations with any other man," was proper. The weight to be given this evidence was, of course, a matter properly left to the jury. For the purposes of considering this appeal, however, the corpus delicti was amply established.

[5] Counsel for appellant also asserts without argument or authority that it was error to permit the police officer to testify that the answers made by the defendant to the questions which were propounded to him and constituting a confession, were "free and voluntary." Such presentation of alleged error is not sufficient to demand our consideration of the points involved. People v. Zarate, 54 Cal. App. 372, 201 P. 955. Regardless of that, however, we have carefully scanned the record, and we find that counsel searchingly examined all of the witnesses present at the time the answers were given without eliciting a trace of force, coercion, or threats. The confession was properly admitted.

[6, 7] Appellant's argument that it was error to permit the prosecutrix to testify because she demonstrated a knowledge insufficient for a basis of discrimination is likewise untenable. In testifying to the act of intercourse she expressed it by saying that the defendant, while she was lying upon the ground, took out his "private parts" and put them in hers. She also testified that she did not know what the "private parts" of man were. Later, on cross-examination, when asked if she knew what was meant by the expression when applied to herself, she said, "I do not know how to say it." This statement, together with the context of the remainder of her examination, discloses that she was not so much in ignorance concerning what was meant by the expression as she was at a loss to express herself. We are satisfied that if there be any objection it concerns the weight of the testimony, and not its admissibility.

[8] After the evidence was taken, the court announced that it would give each side 30 minutes for argument, to which appellant's counsel replied that he doubted whether he could cover the ground in 30 minutes; that possibly the court was possessed of the ability, but that he was not. He now assigns the limitation as error without attempting in any manner to show wherein the defendant's rights were prejudiced. For aught that appears in the record, counsel underestimated his ability and was able to present all the argument necessary or desirable. There is nothing to indicate that it was not a reasonable limitation of time.

[9] The court refused to give an instruction requested by defendant in words:

"That the jury must find that the defendant did have sexual intercourse with the complaining witness on the date charged. Evidence of the commission of the act on any other day would not sustain a judgment of conviction."

He now assigns the refusal as error and points to the case of People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 P. 323, as his authority. The distinction between the instant case, where only one act was alleged and proved, and the Williams Case is pointed out in the cases of People v. Singh, 62 Cal. App. 450, 217 P. 121, and People v. Britt, 62 Cal. App. 674, 217 P. 767. In both of the cases last mentioned it was specifically stated that where many acts are committed and proved it is necessary that the prosecution select the one upon which it is intended to rely, but that the rule can have no application in a case where no offense is proved other than the one alleged.

[10] We have recited sufficient of the testimony heretofore that it is unnecessary for us, in considering whether the evidence is sufficient, to detail more, except to point out that in the statement signed by the defendant and introduced in evidence he admitted having had sexual intercourse with the complaining witness on or about the time charged. Under the testimony of the physicians and defendant's admission, this case does not fall in the category of such cases as People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540, wherein the prosecutrix was uncorroborated, but rather it is controlled by the principle of People v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 511, 63 P. 842, People v. Moore, 155 Cal. 241, 100 P. 688, and People v. Porter, 48 Cal. App. 237, 191 P. 951. To quote the language of People v. Porter, supra, "We cannot say that it is an irrational conclusion from the" testimony "that the defendant is guilty as charged."

Judgment and order affirmed.

REINHART LUMBER & PLANING MILL CO.
et al. v. HLADIK et al. (Civ. 5328.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 3, 1927.

Rehearing Granted Oct. 3, 1927.

1. Mechanics' liens ⇨132(4)—Filing notice of completion of building held to start time running for filing notice of mechanics' liens.

Filing of notice of completion of building starts time running for filing notice of mechanics' liens.

2. Mechanics' liens ⇨290(5)—Findings as to time of completion of building held not contradictory.

In actions to foreclose mechanics' liens, general finding that allegations of complaints were true, some of which alleged building was completed January 22, and others February 22, did not contradict finding that notice of completion was recorded January 22, so as to render it ineffective.

3. Mechanics' liens ⇨132(4)—Materialman's lien on building completed January 22, filed March 20, held too late (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, materialman's lien, filed March 20, where notice of completion of building was recorded January 22, was too late.

4. Mechanics' liens ⇨281(1)—Evidence of signing release and accepting check held to show waiver of mechanics' liens (Civ. Code, §§ 1643, 1653).

In suit to foreclose mechanics' liens, evidence that certain lienors executed release and accepted check held to show waiver of liens, under Civ. Code, §§ 1643, 1653.

5. Mechanics' liens ⇨208—Mechanic's lien may be waived by written contract.

Mechanic's lien may be waived by written contract.

4. Mechanics' Liens ⇨208—Giving mechanics' lien claimants checks held sufficient consideration for releasing liens on property, mortgage of which was to secure funds paying checks (Civ. Code, § 1605).

Where mechanics' liens claimants received checks, funds to pay which were to be secured by deed of trust on property subject to liens, release of liens was supported by sufficient consideration, under Civ. Code, § 1605.

7. Mortgages ⇨186(5)—Evidence held to support finding of failure to post notice of sale as required by trust deed (Code Civ. Proc. § 692).

Where trust deed authorized sale only after giving notice required by law for sales of land on execution, under Code Civ. Proc. § 692, requiring both posting and publication of notice of sales of land under execution where deed executed by trustees recited that notice of sale was published but was silent regarding posting, finding by court that before executing deed trustees had not posted notice of sale was sufficiently supported by evidence.

8. Usury ⇨76, 80—Violation of Usury Act does not affect principal so as to avoid trust deed.

Violation of Usury Act (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii) strikes at item concerning interest, but does not strike at principal so as to avoid entire deed of trust executed in violation thereof.

9. Usury ⇨100(1)—On charge of usury in trust deed, on new trial accounting as to amount paid out by mortgagee and amount mortgagee received from mortgagors may be taken.

In suit to enforce mechanics' liens where usury in trust deed was set up, on new trial accounting may be had as to exact amount paid out by mortgagees and amount which mortgagee received from mortgagors or for their account.

10. Usury ⇨100(1)—In taking account to determine whether trust deed is usurious, rentals after date of trustee's deed should be considered.

In suit to foreclose mechanics' lien where trust deed on property was claimed to be usurious, in taking account to find exact amount of lien represented by the trust deed, rentals collected after date of trustee's deed to mortgagee should be considered.

11. Mechanics' Liens ⇨161(4)—Interest, if allowed on mechanics' lien, should be from date of action to foreclose lien, not from date of completion of contract.

In action to foreclose mechanics' lien, interest should not be allowed lien claimants from date of completion of contract, but, if at all, only from date of action to foreclose liens.

12. Appearance ⇨9(1)—Answering some of mechanics' lien claims which had been consolidated, filing notice of motion to set for trial, making motion, obtaining order, and filing notice that trial had been set, held to constitute general appearance binding as to actions by all lien claimants.

Where several actions to foreclose mechanics' liens were consolidated, and defendants, ignoring order of consolidation, answered some and did not answer others, and later severed and filed notice of motion to set for trial, made motion, obtained order, and served and filed notice that trial had been set, and attorney, representing all but two defendants, did not object to proceeding with trial, nor ask for time to plead nor for continuance, and took part in questioning witnesses, defendants made general appearance and could not object that they were not served and did not appear in actions by certain lien claimants.

13. Mortgages ⇨151(3) — Mechanics' lien claimants, not executing release, held entitled to preference to deed of trust subsequently executed.

Mechanics' lien claimants who did not execute release of claim were, in suit to foreclose liens, entitled to preference to deed of trust subsequently executed in favor of one supplying money to pay other claims.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs, severally, commenced actions to foreclose mechanics' liens on a building located near Union and Steiner streets, in San Francisco. They named the contracting owners and certain fictitious individuals as defendants. Thereafter certain individuals claiming to be the present owners of the fee or of other interests, or representing, as trustees, other interests in said property, appeared and answered. They interposed certain denials and set forth certain new matter. A trial was had, and the trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiffs and against the persons so appearing and answering as defendants, and caused a decree to be entered in accordance with said findings. The defendants have appealed and present several points which they claim are reversible error. We will take up the points in the order presented by the defendants and state such facts as may be necessary to a consideration of each point as it is taken up.

[1, 2] 1. The defendants contend that the findings are contradictory and are therefore against law. In this connection the defendants call to our attention that in some of the complaints it is alleged that the building was completed and accepted on January 22, 1920; that in some of the complaints the date is alleged as February 22, 1920; that the court made a finding that all the allegations of the complaint of the plaintiffs are true. The plaintiffs call to our attention that the trial court also made a finding that the building was fully completed and notice of completion was recorded January 22, 1920. The record discloses similar conflicts as to some of the other claimants. The filing of that notice started the time running as to when each claimant should file his notice of lien if any. Olson-Mahoney Lumber Co. v. Dunne Inv. Co., 30 Cal. App. 332, 341, 159 P. 178. The finding as to when that notice was filed was in accordance with the allegations of several of the complaints and the admissions contained in the answers. Moreover, the notice, together with the date and place of recordation, were admitted in evidence and were in entire accord with the admissions contained in the pleadings. The pleadings contained no admission regarding any other date, and no evidence was introduced in the entire record establishing or purporting to establish any other date. Conceding, for the purpose of this decision and solely for that purpose, that the general finding is susceptible of the construction claimed by the defendants, to wit, that the trial court made findings that the building was completed on February 22, 1920, it is clear that such finding was not supported by any evidence.

[3] 2. The second point made by the defendants is closely akin to the first one. The defendants claim that the lien of the Hardy Lumber Company was not filed within the time prescribed by law, and therefore has no validity as a lien. The evidence shows and the trial court found that company filed its lien on March 20, 1920. The trial court found the building was actually completed and notice of completion was recorded January 22, 1920; the notice filed by the Hardy Lumber Company was filed too late as a materialman's lien. Code Civ. Proc. § 1187. The court did not find and the evidence does not show whether the Hardy Lumber Company was an original contractor as those words are used in the statute cited.

[4, 5] 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. The trial court made findings against the defendants' claim that the plaintiffs waived their liens and are es-topped from claiming that they hold liens prior to October 6, 1919. The defendants claim the findings are not supported by the evidence. On September 17, 1919, the construction of the building had so far proceeded that it was nearly completed. On that date the owners had exhausted their funds and were unable to pay the several contractors on the building. They entered into negotiations with Gustave O. Heine to obtain the moneys necessary to pay the claims against the owners. They were advised that they would be furnished with the moneys upon the execution of a trust deed, but that arrangement must be made with the claimants whereby the trust deed would be and become a lien prior to any mechanic's lien. Under date of September 30, 1919, W. Olschewski, Esq., an attorney at law representing G. O. Heine, prepared certain papers in couplets. A couplet was to be delivered to each claimant. The couplet consisted of two instruments. The first instrument read:

"The undersigned hereby consents to upon the receipt of $1,545 to execute a release, a copy of which is hereto attached and marked Exhibit A. Dated, San Francisco, Cal., September 30, 1919. Frank J. Klimm."

The second instrument, Exhibit A, was as follows:

"The undersigned defendants hereby release, and declare as satisfied to the date of these presents, all liens or claims he has acquired by virtue of any work or labor performed, material furnished, or money expended for concrete foundation or inside plastering in, to, or for the construction of the building now in course of construction (describing it). And that said liens are fully paid and discharged to date. Dated October 4, 1919. Frank J. Klimm."

Such instruments were not signed by W. P. Fuller & Co., Ginsberg Tile Company, and M. P. Killian. All of the other plaintiffs signed instruments identical in form with the first, differing only as to the amount, on September 30, 1919. They also signed instruments identical in form with the second instrument which we have just copied, but some signed on October 4, and some signed on October 6, 1919. At the same time and place that the second instrument was signed, a check was delivered to the signer for the amount of his claim. Each check was dated October 4, 1919. Each check was drawn on the Union Trust Company of San Francisco in favor of the claimant and for the amount due him. Each check was signed "Heine Piano Co., Inc. W. W. Reed, per G. O. Heine." On the face of each check appeared "Acct. J. C. Hladik." The deed of trust Hladik to Heine was recorded at 9 a. m. on October 4, 1919. Counsel has not called to our attention any conflict in the evidence which we have just recited. The evidence introduced in the case ran far afield. There was a very great deal of wholly immaterial evidence introduced. On that immaterial evidence there is some conflict. It is entirely unnecessary to recite such conflicts or to comment thereon. There is no conflict in the evidence to the effect that each of the purported releases was signed and delivered, and that each of the checks was delivered after the Heine trust deed was filed for record.

B. Milano had the contract for concrete foundations and inside plastering. He signed a release prior to September 27, 1919. It will be noted that every other release, whether signed by the plumber, lumberman, or otherwise, contained the phrase "for concrete foundations and inside plastering. * * *" Putting a finger on that phrase, the plaintiffs contend that it is manifest that they were not releasing anything because no one of them had done "concrete work or inside plastering." That the execution of the instruments was not a mere idle act is evidenced by the fact that each corporation was required to attach, and did attach, its corporate seal. Moreover, each claimant was asked to sign on the dotted line before he got his check. He did so. The phrase relied on by the plaintiffs is wholly unnecessary to the meaning of any one of the releases. Although the record contains upwards of 500 pages, there is not an intimation that in October, 1919, any one of the plaintiffs held anything purporting to be a claim against the property except the identical lien claims which are the subject of this controversy. But there is evidence that no one of the plaintiffs installed concrete foundations and inside plastering. To sustain the contention of the plaintiffs is to give the alleged releases no force or effect. That a mechanic's lien may be waived by a written contract is settled law. 4 C. J. 314, § 415. That we have before us such a waiver cannot be disputed. But, the question to be decided is, "Does this written waiver include this particular lien?" Under the facts above stated and following the fundamental rules for the interpretation of contracts, the question propounded must be answered in the affirmative. Civ. Code, §§ 1643, 1653; E. Aigeltinger, Inc., v. Burke, 176 Cal. 621, 628, 169 P. 373; Ames v. Southern Pacific Co., 141 Cal. 728, 731, 75 P. 310, 99 Am. St. Rep. 98; Ponder et al. v. Safety Building & Loan Co. (Ky.) 59 S. W. 858; Hughes v. Lansing, 34 Or. 118, 55 P. 95, 75 Am. St. Rep. 574, 579.

[6] No claim is made that G. O. Heine did not cause the checks to be delivered or that they were delivered by the Hladiks. The evidence to the effect that Heine furnished the moneys and that those funds were to be secured by a trust deed is not disputed. Therefore there is no question but what the releases were supported by a sufficient consideration. Civ. Code, § 1605. As we are not now discussing the estoppel theory, the conflict in the evidence (as to when, where, and pursuant to what conversations the releases were executed and who conducted those conversations and what was said) becomes immaterial.

[7] 8. After the deed of trust had been executed and at a time when the terms of the promissory note, which it was given to secure, had not been performed, the trust deed was foreclosed, and a deed was made by the trustees to the Heine Piano Company. The trial court made a finding that before executing said deed the trustees did not comply with the provisions of said trust deed because no notice of the sale of said property was posted. The defendants contend that said finding is not supported by the evidence. The contention cannot be sustained. The power granted by the trust deed authorized the trustees to make the sales therein provided for only after giving notice " * * * in the manner and for a time not less than that required by law for sales of real property upon execution. * * *" The statute concerning notice of sales upon execution against real property required both a posting and a publication of the notice. Code Civ. Proc. § 692. The deed executed by the trustees recited that a notice was published. It was silent regarding a posting. That silence was some evidence that there was no posting of the notices. Savings & Loan Society v. Deering, 66 Cal. 281, 5 P. 353. On the latter subject there was a discussion in the trial court, but no other or additional evidence was introduced. We may not say the evidence did not support the finding.

[8, 9] In reference to the Heine trust deed the plaintiffs call to our attention the fact that the record contains considerable evidence to the effect that the note executed by the Hladiks and secured by the trust deed Hladik to Heine, for $7,500, was executed in violation of the Usury Act. Thereupon they make the contention that the entire transaction was void. That claim is too broad. The violation of the Usury Act (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii) strikes at the item concerning interest, but does not strike at the principal. Haines et al. v. Commercial Mortgage Co. et al. (Cal. Sup.) 254 P. 956. Upon a new trial an accounting may be had as to the exact amount that was paid out by Heine to the Hladiks and the amount which Heine received from them or for their account. In this manner the true value of the Heine trust deed can be ascertained and determined, both in favor of and against all of the parties interested in the fund, a portion of which all are claiming.

[10] 9. After April 25, 1921, the date of the trustee's deed to the Heine Piano Company, that company collected rentals, and as a part of its decree the trial court directed that such rentals be applied in satisfaction of any deficiency judgment that might be docketed against the Hladiks. The defendants contend that the provision referred to was not supported by the facts. The plaintiffs cite no authorities which support that portion of the judgment under attack. In taking accounts for the purpose of ascertaining the exact amount of the lien represented by the Heine trust deed, the rentals collected by Heine should be considered, but we see no merit in the claim that these plaintiffs are entitled to the rentals.

10. The defendants contend that the trial court should have made a finding that the plaintiffs' liens, if any, were subsequent to a deed of trust theretofore made to Applegarth and a deed of trust theretofore made to Brickell. Findings 8 and 9 are on that subject. So are finding 13 and the conclusions of law. However, the defendants assert such findings are not sufficiently clear and complete. We think they are. They sufficiently protect the rights of the holders of those deeds of trust and the interests thereunder.

[11] 11. The trial court allowed interest on the claim of each plaintiff as from the date each plaintiff completed his contract. The particular contracts did not prescribe the date of payment. The defendants contend therefore that interest, if allowed at all, should have been provided as from the date the action to foreclose the lien was commenced. Hubbard v. Jurian, 35 Cal. App. 757, 766, 170 P. 1093. We think the contention is clearly correct.

[12] 12. The defendants say they were not served and did not appear in the actions brought by W. P. Fuller & Co., Ginsberg Tile Company, C. C. Severin, and M. P. Killian, and, therefore, that relief should not have been given against the defendants in favor of those plaintiffs. The error in this contention rests in a misconception of the record. Eight different actions were commenced to foreclose liens. All of them were commenced in May or June, 1920. Before any answer was filed by an order of court, they were consolidated on November 12, 1920. Thereafter, ignoring the order of consolidation, the defendants interposed, severally or jointly, three separate answers in each of two of the actions which had been consolidated, and one answer in each of two other actions which had been consolidated, and apparently no answer in the other actions which had been consolidated. Later the defendants served and filed a notice of motion to set for trial, made the motion, obtained the order, and then served and filed a notice that the trial had been set. When the cause was called for trial Mr. Erskine, representing all of the defendants except Mr. and Mrs. Hladik, immediately arose and called to the attention of the trial court the condition of the record. However, he did not object to proceeding with the trial, neither did he ask for time to plead, nor did he ask for a continuance. Mr. Hladik was called as a witness by the plaintiffs. He was asked some questions by counsel for the Reinhart Company and then Mr. Adams, attorney for the Fuller Company, commenced to propound some questions in behalf of the latter company. Mr. Erskine objected in behalf of the defendants to any evidence being offered by that company. We do not find that the objection was ruled upon, but Mr. Adams proceeded with the examination. Mr. Erskine did not ask for a ruling that the evidence be confined to the case as made by the plaintiffs against Mr. and Mrs. Hladik. After Mr. Adams finished his examination, Mr. Hatch, as attorney for the plaintiff Killian, proceeded to introduce his proof by examining Mr. Hladik. Then Mr. Ryan proceeded to examine the same witness regarding the claim of the plaintiff Klimm. Thereafter Mr. Aitken proceeded to examine the same witness regarding the claim of the Ginsberg Company. During the foregoing proceedings Mr. Erskine asked some questions, made many objections, and made many suggestions. If, as he contended, his clients had not been served and had not appeared, Mr. Erskine had no right to be heard. These various acts of the defendants constituted a general appearance. Martin v. Howe, 190 Cal. 187, 211 P. 453. Later in the case Mr. Severin was called and was examined as a witness in his own behalf by his attorney, Mr. O'Donnell. From what we have stated, it will thus appear that the defendants took the position that the trial was proceeding piecemeal; that is, as to four of the plaintiffs the trial was proceeding as against the defendants represented by Mr. Erskine, and as to the remaining plaintiffs the trial was not proceeding even against the Hladiks. The statute does not authorize such procedure.

13. What we have just said in disposing of the former point renders it unnecessary to discuss the claim that there was no appearance in the Ginsberg Case. That action had been merged in the consolidated action in which the defendants made a general appearance as shown by what we have said in discussing the last point.

[13] M. P. Killian did not execute a release and as to his claim the judgment is affirmed. W. P. Fuller & Co. and Ginsberg Tile Company did not execute any releases. The Fuller Company was allowed interest from February 20, 1920, whereas it was entitled to interest from May 18, 1920. The Ginsberg Company was allowed interest from January 22, 1920, whereas it was entitled to interest from May 20, 1920. The judgment is modified accordingly as to each of those claims, and as so modified it is affirmed. As to each of the other claims the judgment is reversed and the action is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with what has been said above, and the trial court is directed to allow the Hladiks to plead and to allow any of the other parties to amend their pleadings in such manner as such party may be advised. The plaintiffs M. P. Killian, W. P. Fuller & Co., and Ginsberg Tile Company are allowed their costs against the defendants, but as against the other plaintiffs the defendants are allowed their costs.

DOWD v. JOYCE et al. (Civ. 5938.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 10, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨994(3)—Where oral testimony of witness and his letters were conflicting, question of weight of statements in letters held for trial court.

Where the oral testimony of a witness relative to a deed to certain property conflicted with statements made by him in letters to plaintiff and introduced as evidence, the weight to be attached to the statements contained in the letters was a question for the trial court.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Court's finding relative to conflicting evidence as to giving of deed was not reviewable where there was evidence to sustain conclusions reached.

Where evidence on giving of deed was conflicting, but it was substantial to sustain trial court in arriving at the conclusions reached, the finding was not open to review on appeal.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1052(8)—Whether deed was erroneously admitted in evidence held immaterial since not prejudicial, where evidence without it was sufficient to sustain finding.

Whether admitting in evidence, over plaintiff's objection, a certain deed was error, held immaterial, since it was not prejudicial, there being ample evidence without it to sustain court's finding.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1079—Where appellant, urged error in failure to find upon material issue, but failed to point out specific error, point held abandoned as without merit.

Where appellant contended that the court failed to find upon a material issue, but he did not point out wherein the court erred, held, that he had abandoned this point as without merit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Daisy M. Dowd against A. J. Joyce and others, wherein defendant Immel interposed a cross-complaint. From the judgment plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Biby and Harry C. Biby, both of Los Angeles, and Drapeau, Orr & Gardner, of Ventura, for appellant.

Durley & Downes, of Oxnard, for respondents.

WARNE, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff and appellant commenced an action in ejectment alleging ownership in lot 9, block 20, in the city of Oxnard, and seeks to oust the defendants from possession thereof. Defendants, by answer, denied plaintiff's ownership, and by cross-complaint defendant Immel alleged that he and plaintiff are father and daughter; that confidential relations existed between them; that in November, 1914, he was in poor health, and, at that time, had great confidence in the integrity of plaintiff and in her love and affection and devotion and fidelity to him; that at the time he was desirous of avoiding the costs and delays of probate proceedings in the settlement of his estate in the event of his death, and at that time made and delivered to plaintiff a deed to said lot upon express oral promise of plaintiff that he, defendant, should have the right to the possession of said premises during his lifetime. It was also alleged by defendant Immel that during his lifetime he was to have the right to manage and control the property, to lease or sell the same, and to receive all the proceeds thereof, and that in the event he should make a sale of said property, plaintiff would execute and deliver a deed thereof to such purchaser as defendant might designate; and that in the event no sale was made, then upon his death plaintiff would convey the lot to Harvey Immel, a son of defendant; or, in the event plaintiff should desire to retain and have said lot, then the said plaintiff was to pay to said Harvey Immel the value of said lot. Defendant Immel also alleged that no consideration was paid for the deed, and that he would not have made the deed and delivered it to plaintiff if the alleged promise had not been made. The cross-complaint was denied by plaintiff. The defendant A. J. Joyce and his wife by answer alleged that they had no interest in the property excepting as lessees under lease from defendant Immel.

The court made findings according to the allegation of defendants, and rendered judgment in accordance with the prayer of defendants, and decreed that plaintiff had no right, title or interest, or estate whatsoever in or to the property, but held the bare legal title thereto, subject to the uses and trusts alleged by defendant Immel.

Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

It is the principal contention of the appellant that the evidence is not sufficient to support the findings or to justify the decision, and that the judgment should be reversed for that reason. The answer is (as was said in the case of Byrne v. Reed, 75 Cal. 277, 17 P. 201), that as to all of the disputed facts there was a clear conflict in evidence, that given in behalf of the respondent being quite sufficient to justify each of the findings. The well-settled rule in regard to conflicting testimony must therefore control the action of this court.

Defendant Immel testified, in reference to the making of the deed, as follows:

"Well, I had symptoms of paralysis very bad and I was afraid I might take a stroke of paralysis and wanted to give my son the property * * * that is 9 * * * and made a deed to Mrs. Dowd with the understanding that I was to have the use of it as long as I lived, and if I wanted to dispose of it, she was to sign it back to whoever I wanted to have it, and if I died and didn't dispose of it she was to convey it to her brother."

He further testified that he made the arrangement and talked the matter over with Mrs. Dowd prior to the time of making the deed; that she had agreed to it; that he made the deed and had it recorded, but did not deliver it to plaintiff until two or three years afterwards; that at the time he delivered the deed to her he talked the matter over with her again, and that he said to her that if he died without disposing of the place she was to give it to Harvey (his son), and if he wanted to sell it or dispose of it she was to make a deed to whoever he wanted it made out to; that "she said she would all right." Mrs. Hamilton, another daughter and a sister of the appellant, testified that she had a conversation with Mrs. Dowd concerning this deed, and that appellant said "that papa had made out the deed to what we call the 'Green House'—the deed to that property,—and he was to retain the use of it his lifetime;" that "he had made out a straight deed to save court expenses in having it probated or anything like that, as the other place a life estate was retained in the deed."

[1] The plaintiff contradicted this testimony, and she also contended that Immel's testimony is contradicted by statements contained in two letters which he wrote to plaintiff concerning the property. In a letter dated October 16, 1923, and addressed to plaintiff, he made this statement, "I built buildings on it with your permission to have the use of them as long as I lived, then they were to go to you when I was dead." And in a letter dated October 30, 1923, also addressed to plaintiff, he said, "You were to get it when I was done with it or when I was dead." While these statements tend to contradict Immel's testimony that he made the deed to his daughter with the understanding that he was to have the use of the property as long as he lived, "and if he wanted to dispose of it she was to sign it back to whoever I wanted to have it, and if I died and didn't dispose of it she was to convey it to her brother," the weight to be attached to the statements contained in the letters was a question for the trial court to determine. Fagan v. Lentz, 156 Cal. 681, 105 P. 951, 20 Ann. Cas. 221.

[2] We have examined the entire record in the case and are of the opinion that there is substantial evidence to sustain the trial court in arriving at the conclusions reached. In Howard v. Stephens, 38 Cal. App. 296, 176 P. 65, the court says:

"Whether the evidence in a given case is clear and convincing is a question in the first instance to be determined by the trial court, and its conclusion is not to be disturbed unless the reviewing court can say, after an examination of the entire record and all the circumstances surrounding the transaction as there disclosed, that such conclusion is clearly unwarranted by the evidence. 'If there is substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached below, the finding is not open to review on appeal,' even where the law requires proof of the fact to be clear and convincing. Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 502 (24 P. 930); Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81 (165 P. 432)."

[3] It is next contended that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence, over plaintiff's objection, a deed made by defendant Immel conveying certain of his property to another daughter at about the same time the deed in question was made. The deed was offered in evidence to prove a general scheme of distribution by defendant of his property. Even if the admission of this evidence was error (a question which we do not deem it necessary to decide), it would not be sufficiently prejudicial to warrant a reversal. There was ample evidence to sustain the court in arriving at its findings without reference to this deed and the evidence concerning the conditions under which it was made.

[4] Lastly, the appellant contends that the court failed to find upon a material issue. Appellant has not pointed out to us wherein the court erred in this particular, and we conclude that she has abandoned this point for the reason that she has concluded there is no merit in it.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOUSER, J. The purpose of this proceeding is to review certain findings, orders, and the award made in pursuance of an application to the respondent commission by an employee for adjustment of compensation as a result of injuries sustained by him while acting within the scope of his employment with the petitioner herein.

From the record it appears that the employee, who was engaged as a "spudder" on a pile driver operated by the petitioner, suffered an injury by reason of a large splinter which "flew off a pile, striking him, proximately causing injury to the right eye and cheek"; that in due course, on findings of temporary total disability, an award of continuing compensation and an order for future medical and surgical treatment of the employee were made by the Industrial Accident Commission, the respondent herein; that approximately twenty months thereafter, on the ground that the disability of the employee had become permanent, the employer (petitioner herein) filed an application with respondent commission for the termination of the continuing award to the employee, together with a request that the percentage of such permanent disability be fixed and determined by said commission, which petition finally resulted in an order by said commission denying the employer's application that the award as theretofore made and then in force as to continuing compensation to said employee be terminated, at the same time ordering further medical and surgical treatment of the employee.

The findings made by the commission, together with its order last mentioned, were as follows:

"That the temporary total disability, resulting from the injury sustained by the employee on February 7, 1923, has not yet terminated.

"That further operative treatment as recommended in the report of Dr. George W. Pierce, dated April 21, 1926, should be furnished to the employee at the expense of the defendant county of Los Angeles. * * *

"It is ordered that the defendant's (petitioner's) said petition to terminate indemnity, be, and it hereby is, denied.

"It is further ordered that the said defendant shall furnish to the applicant, within a reasonable time, the further operative treatment recommended in the report of Dr. George W. Pierce dated April 21, 1926.

"It is further ordered that, should said defendant neglect or refuse to furnish such treatment within a reasonable time from date hereof, the applicant shall be entitled to secure such treatment from his own physician, and said defendant county of Los Angeles will be liable for the reasonable expense thereof, to be determined ed upon the filing of itemized bills, in duplicate, and the approval of the medical department of this commission."

[1] The first point presented by petitioner is that the commission acted in excess of its powers in making its finding in effect that total temporary disability of the employee had not terminated. The contention of petitioner is based upon its assertion that "not one shred of testimony" was introduced before the commission which showed total temporary disability. No claim is made on the part of respondent that the record discloses any direct evidence to the effect that total disability existed. Apparently it was conceded that the employee was unable to resume his regular employment. On the other hand, although the employee testified at the hearing that he was suffering from a weak back, nevertheless, before that time he had performed certain light work, to wit, farm chores, and that he was then able and willing to perform such work. The attending physician, who had performed various operations on the employee, testified at the hearing that, so far as he knew, the condition of the employee's disability was "nothing more" than that of a "man losing his eye." As shown by the following conversation which took place between the referee and counsel representing the employer, the ability of the employee to perform some sort of work was indicated, to wit:

"The Referee: Is the county of Los Angeles in a position to give this man work, light work, or otherwise?"

"Attorney Holbrook (representing the petitioner herein): I think it could be arranged, Mr. Crowell; I am not certain as to that. I was talking to Mr. Nelson (the employee) informally, and I think possibly some such thing may be arranged."

It therefore is manifest that the ability of the employee to perform manual labor, if not that of the average man who had lost an eye, was limited by the fact only that he had a weak back, and that in any event he was able and willing to perform "light work"—for which service he would be entitled to receive compensation, however small. This court is therefore of the opinion that a conclusion on the part of the commission to the effect that the condition of the employee would entirely bar him from obtaining such light work as doing chores, or some employment of a similar character, was not justified by the evidence. It follows that, so far as the finding in question is concerned, the contention that it was in excess of the power of the respondent commission must be sustained.

The next finding and order of the commission to which petitioner directs attention is that wherein in effect it was found and ordered that the employer furnish to the employee "the further operative treatment recommended in the report of Dr. George W.

Pierce"; furthermore that, should the employer neglect or refuse to furnish such treatment within a reasonable time after the date of the order, at the expense of the employer, the employee should be entitled to secure such treatment from his own physician.

At the time the report of Dr. Pierce was made, it appears therefrom that the condition of the employee was as follows:

"Present condition: Numerous scars over the entire right cheek; lower border of orbit sunken, apparently fracture. There is a paresia of the upper lid. The palpebral fissure is one-half inch lower than on other side. There is some voluntary contraction in the orbicularis palpebrarum. The upper lid overlaps the lower at the outer canthus and is distorted at this point by adhesions. There is some loss of tissue of the lower lid with irregularity.

"Examination of the mouth shows sinus opening above the right upper first molar, apparently from antrum. No sulcus behind the lower lid to hold artificial eye. There is a purulent discharge from the orbit. There is also a continuous purulent discharge into the mouth. There is some loss of periorbital fat."

The operative treatment recommended by Dr. Pierce, to which reference was made in the order by the commission, was indicated in the following language:

"There are two different stages of repair necessary in this case. First is the deepening of the socket, which could be done in one operation by the method of epithelial inlay, and which would not require over one week to ten days, and then the lower lid would require some plastic operation to complete the borders, while the upper lid could be freed and raised up. These operations would not require any great length of time. The second stage would be the cleaning out of the antrum and closure of the sinus. I cannot state just how long this would take. By plastic operation, however, the appearance of the patient could be markedly improved, and he would wear an artificial eye."

It is the contention of petitioner that the proposed operations and treatment recommended by Dr. Pierce were for cosmetic effect only, and that the commission was without jurisdiction to make the order of which complaint is made. But an inspection of the report discloses the fact that in part at least the purpose of the recommended treatment was to relieve the patient from the condition arising primarily from the two "purulent discharges" referred to in the report, together with the added feature of "cleaning out the antrum and closure of the sinus." To that extent, therefore, it is clear that the commission was acting within its statutory powers. The principal attack of petitioner, however, is directed toward that part of the recommendation with reference to the other steps leading to the conclusion that "the appearance of the patient could be markedly improved and he would wear an artificial eye."

[2] To put the position assumed by petitioner perhaps more plainly, it is that petitioner objects to any operation, the expense of which must be borne by it, for the ultimate purpose of so building up the tissues and bony structure surrounding the orbital cavity that the employee may be provided with and wear an artificial eye.

Section 9 (a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831, as variously amended), provides that:

"Where liability for compensation under this act exists, such compensation shall be furnished or paid by the employer and be as provided in the following schedule:

"(a) Such medical, surgical and hospital treatment, including nursing, medicines, medical and surgical supplies, crutches and apparatus, including artificial members, as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury. * * *

Respondent directs particular attention to the words, "as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury." The photographs of the employee, presented at the time of the hearing before the referee, together with the report made by Dr. Pierce (hereinbefore set forth), regarding the condition of the employee shortly preceding the time of the hearing, indicate a deplorable situation so far as the probability of the employee being able to secure employment was concerned.

On the part of the employer, the purpose of any surgical attempt in connection with an injury received by an employee is to restore him to as nearly a natural and normal condition as may be possible or practicable, to the end that his earning power by reason of his injury may be diminished to the least possible extent. To illustrate: If by accident arising from his employment the foot of a day laborer should be so crushed that by no known surgical skill could it be made useful as a member of his body, the probable medical course and practice would indicate the amputation of the foot. In due course thereafter it is clear that an artificial foot would greatly aid the employee in bringing about a restoration to a considerable extent of his earning power. Could it be doubted that the language of the statute which requires the furnishing by the employer of such surgical treatment, "including artificial members," as may be required to "cure and relieve from the effects of the injury," would be applicable? In the instant case, that the present appearance of the employee would be a decided handicap to his obtaining employment "in an open labor market" is obvious. The evident purpose of some of the proposed surgical operations on the employee is to give him a more presentable personal appearance. In his present condition, by reason of his limitations and the natural competition in securing employment, it might, and in all probability would, be extremely difficult for the employee to secure even such work as he is capable of doing. If successful, the result of the proposed surgical operations would place the employee, not only in a position where he could secure better and more remunerative employment than at this time he may command, but his improved personal appearance would assist in enabling him to retain such position. The probabilities are that the morale of the employee would be bettered, and his self-respect and appreciation of his good workmanship qualities be increased—all tending toward a rehabilitation and restoration of the earning powers of the employee as of the date of the injury which he sustained. The principle of the question here under consideration is treated to some extent in the case of New York Central R. Co. v. Blanc, 250 U. S. 596, 40 S. Ct. 44, 63 L. Ed. 1161, where, among other things, it is said:

"Even were impairment of earning power the sole justification for imposing compulsory payment of workmen's compensation upon the employer in such cases, it would be sufficient answer to the present contention to say that a serious disfigurement of the face or head reasonably may be regarded as having a direct relation to the injured person's earning power, irrespective of its affect upon his mere capacity for work. Under ordinary conditions of life, a serious and unnatural disfigurement of the face or head very probably may have a harmful effect upon the ability of the injured person to obtain or retain employment. Laying aside exceptional cases, which we must assume will be fairly dealt with in the proper and equitable administration of the act, such a disfigurement may render one repulsive or offensive to the sight, displeasing, or at least less pleasing, to employer, to fellow employees, and to patrons or customers. See Ball v. William Hunt & Sons, A. C. 496, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 782, 106 L. T. N. S. 911, 28 Times L. R. 428, 56 Sol. Jo. 550, 5 B. W. C. C. 459."

This court is therefore led to the conclusion that, even though conceding that the major object of the proposed surgical operations on the employee may be for "cosmetic purposes" only, the respondent commission, in making its order therefore, was not acting in excess of its statutory powers.

[3, 4] It is also objected by petitioner that—

"The Industrial Accident Commission acted without, or in excess of, its powers in ordering petitioner to pay bills covering operative treatment rendered Philip Nelson by private parties prior to a finding upon notice as provided in section 10 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, that petitioner's approved hospital was inadequate."

From an examination of the order by the commission (hereinbefore set forth) relating to petitioner's objection, it will be noted, not that the commission has arbitrarily ordered the employer to pay bills covering operative treatment rendered to the employee prior to a finding that the hospital of petitioner was inadequate, but that, in fact, the order was to the effect that the employer furnish the proposed operative treatment within a reasonable time, or on its neglect or refusal so to do the employee "be entitled to secure such treatment from his own physician" at the expense of the employer. The point made by petitioner, therefore, is without application to the facts herein. It may, however, be said that the record herein clearly discloses the fact that, after twenty-two surgical operations on the employee, the employer admitted its inability to further relieve the employee from the effect of his injuries. Dr. Pierce, the evidence of whose surgical skill was admitted, promised the desired relief. In such circumstances, assuming the successful outcome of the proposed surgical operations, the case of Union Iron Works v. Industrial Accident Commission, 190 Cal. 33, 210 P. 410, is authority for the principle that the employer may be made liable for the necessary expense connected therewith.

[5] Finally, it is urged by petitioner that the respondent commission acted in excess of its powers in refusing to furnish petitioner with a transcript of the hearing before the commission. Without deciding whether in ordinary circumstances, upon payment by the petitioner of the fees prescribed by statute therefor, it becomes the duty of the commission to furnish such transcript, this court is of the opinion that the relief sought is one that cannot be considered in a petition for writ of review.

It is ordered that that portion of the order of the commission based upon the finding of total disability of the employee be and it is annulled. In all other respects the award is affirmed.

McKEEVER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR SAN MATEO COUNTY, et al. (Civ. 5890.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 12, 1927.

1. Divorce ⚡165(4)—Court had inherent power to set aside interlocutory decree of divorce, obtained by fraud more than six months after entry (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Court of general jurisdiction held to have inherent power to set aside an interlocutory decree of divorce more than six months after entry where it was obtained through fraud upon the court, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that application to set aside a judgment obtained through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect could in no case be made more than six months after such judgment.

2. Judgment ⚡386(2)—Whether motion to set aside decree for fraud is made within reasonable time is matter within court's discretion.

Whether a motion to set aside a decree for fraud is made within a reasonable time after its entry is a matter within the sound legal discretion of the court in which the motion is made.

3. Divorce ⚡165(3)—Trial court held warranted in setting aside divorce decree alleged to have been obtained by both intrinsic and extrinsic fraud.

Trial court was warranted in setting aside divorce decree where it was alleged that it had been obtained through intrinsic fraud in giving false testimony, and through extrinsic fraud whereby defendant was kept away from court upon a false promise which prevented fair hearing of the case.

4. Certiorari ⚡41—Certiorari held not to lie to review order vacating interlocutory divorce decree, where petitioner, without appealing, delayed 19 months after order was made.

Certiorari held not to lie to review an order setting aside a divorce decree, where the petitioner took no appeal from the order and delayed 19 months after the order was made and after she had acquiesced in it by filing pleadings.

Application for writ of certiorari by Mabel Lillian McKeever against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of San Mateo, and others, to review an order setting aside and vacating an interlocutory decree of divorce. Writ denied.

William Schreider, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Entenza & Gramer, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an order setting aside and vacating an interlocutory decree of divorce. So much of the facts as is necessary for a discussion of the case shows, in substance, that petitioner herein filed an action for divorce in San Mateo county against Myron L. McKeever, charging him with cruelty and praying that the community property be awarded to her. Defendant was personally served with summons, but failed to plead, and an interlocutory decree of divorce was granted plaintiff, the decree being entered October 3, 1924. Among other things, the decree awarded plaintiff all of the property owned by defendant, consisting in part of equities in two houses in Redwood City and certain valuable oil-producing land in Orange county, Cal. Thereafter, on September 22, 1925, defendant moved to vacate and set aside the decree, charging that it had been obtained through the fraud and conspiracy of the plaintiff and one Charles L. Muney. The several affidavits in support of the motion alleged the practice of both intrinsic and extrinsic fraud on the part of plaintiff and Munev. They recited that defendant was never legally married to the plaintiff; that she and one Charles L. Munev, with whom she was carrying on illicit relations, knew this to be true, and for the purpose of obtaining defendant's property they conspired to institute the divorce suit, and during defendant's absence to obtain a decree awarding Mabel McKeever his property, by representing to the court that the parties were legally married and that said property was community in character, which scheme they successfully carried out in the procurement of the divorce. Further recitals were to effect that when plaintiff became aware of the divorce action he discussed the matter with both plaintiff and Munev and accused them of knowing that there was no existing marriage between himself and plaintiff; he also informed them that the suit had jeopardized his property in Orange county, to which place he would have to immediately repair to refinance a loan which existed against it.

His affidavit further recites that both Munev and the plaintiff then told him to return to Orange county and attend to his affairs, and that no steps would be taken in the action by them until after his return. That, relying upon this agreement, he left to attend to his business and shortly after his departure the case was brought to trial and plaintiff and Munev, as her corroborating witness, testified that plaintiff and defendant were legally married; that all of the property owned by defendant was community property, which was of little or no value; that upon this false evidence they procured and caused to be entered the decree complained of. Upon the showing made by defendant, the court, on November 12, 1925, vacated and set aside the decree. Thereafter certain proceedings were had in the case. An answer and cross-complaint were filed by defendant, and a demurrer was interposed by plaintiff to the cross-complaint, and hearings were had on certain applications, but the action itself was never set for trial. No steps were ever taken by plaintiff to appeal from the order setting aside the decree, made and entered on November 12, 1925, nor was any attempt ever made by her to review such action until some nineteen months thereafter, when, on June 6, 1927, the present proceeding was instituted. Under these circumstances, it is the claim of respondent that plaintiff acquiesced in the order setting aside the decree and therefore impliedly waived her right to have the order reviewed by the appellate courts. It is also claimed that plaintiff should have appealed from the order if she was dissatisfied with the same, failing in which, she has lost her right to have the action of the lower court reviewed by certiorari, citing Postal Telegraph Co. v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. App. 774, 136 P. 538, and Snyder v. Plummer, 174 Cal. 204, 162 P. 1040.

Petitioner contends that by reason of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, the court was without jurisdiction to interfere with the decree after six months from its entry. There is no merit in this contention.

[1, 2] A court of general jurisdiction has inherent power to set aside a judgment obtained through a fraud upon the court, and its right to do so is not derived from section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the same may be exercised after the lapse of the statutory time, which limits the entertainment of applications based upon surprise, inadvertence, etc., provided that such motions are made within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time is a matter of sound legal discretion in the court in which the motion is made. McGuinness v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 222, 237 P. 42, 40 A. L. R. 1110, where the cases upon the subject are reviewed and exhaustively discussed. See, also, Estate of Seamen, 51 Cal. App. 411, 196 P. 928.

[3, 4] Here not only intrinsic but extrinsic fraud was charged, whereby defendant was kept away from court upon a false promise, which prevented a real contest on the trial or hearing of the case, and the trial court was warranted in setting aside the decree. Moreover, plaintiff is guilty of laches. The present application was filed some nineteen months after the order was made, and after petitioner had acquiesced in it as above indicated and no appeal was ever taken by her from the order. Under such circumstances certiorari will not lie. Snyder v. Plummer, 174 Cal. 204, 162 P. 1040.

The writ is denied.

Action by Hilda Hudson against C. C. Von Hamm. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James Walter Scott, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. B. Dunne, Dunne, Dunne & Cook, and Dunne, Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer to a fourth amended complaint, without leave to amend. The action was brought in California against a father for injuries resulting from an alleged tort of his minor child, which occurred at the residence of the father in the territory of Hawaii.

The complaint was filed April 26, 1924, and alleges that plaintiff "is, and * * * has been a resident of the state of California," and that the defendant is a resident of the territory of Hawaii, and is the father of two minor children named Constance and Rosalie Von Hamm, aged 14 and 10 years, respectively; that in October, 1919, defendant employed plaintiff as a governess to train, educate, and discipline said children; that, pursuant to said employment, she went to defendant's home in Honolulu and entered upon the performance of her duties; that the said Rosalie was an active, strong, healthy child, disposed to climb about the furniture, all of which was known and unrestrained by the defendant; that on January 5, 1920, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, the child Rosalie entered the bedroom of plaintiff and "carelessly and negligently in violation of repeated prior warnings * * * climbed upon a rocking-chair * * * behind the back of plaintiff, and * * * fell therefrom, striking plaintiff upon her right shoulder with great force and violence," causing serious injuries, impairing her earning ability, and that she has never recovered from said injuries. Damages aggregating the sum of $30,212 are claimed by plaintiff as a result of said injuries.

The plaintiff pleads the provisions of section 2375 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii in the following language:

"In section 2375 of the 'Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915,' it is provided as follows, to wit: 'Sec. 2375, Torts, Who May Sue, and for What.—Except as otherwise provided, all persons residing or being in this territory shall be personally responsible in damages for trespass or injury, whether direct or consequential, to the person or property of others, or to their wives, children under majority, or wards, by such offending party, or his wife, or his child under majority, or by his command, or by his animals domital or feræ naturæ; and the party aggrieved may prosecute therefor in the proper courts.' C. C. 1859, § 1125; Cp. L. § 1125; C. L. § 1241; R. L. § 1742."

Two questions are presented on this appeal: (1) Can this action for the tort of a minor child which was committed in the jurisdiction of a foreign territory be maintained in California against the father of the child while the law of the respective jurisdictions, as to the subject-matter, is in absolute conflict? (2) Has the Hawaiian statute which is relied upon by appellant been sufficiently pleaded to show the existence and validity of the statute at the time of the commission of the tort?

[1-3] The statutes of a foreign state must be pleaded and proved as any other fact relied upon. Ryan v. North Alaska Salmon Co., 153 Cal. 438, 95 P. 862; 23 Cal. Jur. 665, § 58; 5 Cal. Jur. 427, § 9; 25 R. C. L. 949, § 202; 24 Standard Ency. of Proc. 97. Upon failure to plead such foreign statutes, it will be presumed they are the same as the statute of California on the particular subject involved. 5 Cal. Jur. 484, § 52; Ryan v. North Alaska Salmon Co., supra; Norris v. Harris, 15 Cal. 226; 5 Cal. Jur. 427, § 9, 12. The states and territories of the American Union are foreign to each other within the meaning of the rule which requires foreign statutes to be pleaded and proved. 20 Ency. of Pl. and Proc. 600; Hempstead v. Reed, 6 Conn. 490; Brackett v. Norton, 4 Conn. 517, 10 Am. Dec. 179.

With respect to the liability of a father for the torts of his minor children, where the father is entirely free from participation in the wrong, the statutes (Civ. Code, § 3520) and the general policy of the law in California are in absolute conflict with the statute of Hawaii. California follows the common law in that respect, which has been the rule in England since 1302 (Y. B. 30, 31, Edw. I., 203, Rolls Ed.; 7 Harvard Law Rev. 384), while, upon the contrary, the territory of Hawaii follows the civil law, which is totally at variance with the common law (Day v. Day, 8 Haw. 715; Rathburn v. Kaio, 23 Haw. 541).

The application of these conflicting rules is well expressed by the able author of Ruling Case Law in volume 20, at page 627, where it is said:

"Parents are not liable for torts committed by thier minor children without participation in the fault by the parent." Hagerty v. Powers, 66 Cal. 369, 5 P. 622, 56 Am. Rep. 101; Figone v. Guisti, 43 Cal. App. 606, 611, 185 P. 694; Perry v. Simeone, 197 Cal. 132, 239 P. 1056; Paul v. Hummel, 43 Mo. 119, 122, 97 Am. Dec. 381; Sherman and Redfield on Neg. (6th Ed.) § 144. "There are several jurisdictions in which the common law has been changed by statutes based on the civil law, which makes the parent liable for all torts committed by his minor children under his control. * * * It is not enough to make the father liable that he knew his child was heedless or vicious. But the father is liable if he was himself guilty of negligence, as by allowing a young child to have a loaded gun or pistol, etc. He is liable, however, only for his own fault, and not for that of the child."

[4] The action in the instant case, which is based upon an extraterritorial tort, is transitory in its nature, and if the statutes, or established law of California and Hawaii, concurred in holding a father liable for the torts of his minor child, or in the absence of established law in California conflicting with that of the foreign territory, under proper pleadings, our state courts would assume jurisdiction, and try the cause. 5 Cal. Jur. 483, § 52; Ryan v. North Alaska Salmon Co., supra; McManus v. Red Salmon Canning Co., 37 Cal. App. 133, 173 P. 1112. But where the statute of the foreign state or territory is in absolute conflict with the statute or the policy of the law of the forum, there is no violation of the doctrine of comity in refusing to accept jurisdiction to try the cause at the lex fori.

[5-8] The fact that the defendant is a resident of a foreign territory will not preclude the assumption of jurisdiction by the courts of the forum, nor will the fact that both litigants are nonresidents prevent the application of the doctrine of comity. Strictly construed, the complaint fails to allege that the plaintiff was a resident of California at the time her injuries were received. Since she was injured in the performance of her employment at the residence of her employer in Honolulu, it may be assumed that she was then a resident of Hawaii and not a resident of California. The defendant was also a resident of Hawaii. In the state of New York it is said:

"The courts have repeatedly refused in their discretion to entertain jurisdiction over causes of action arising out of a tort committed in a foreign state, where both the plaintiff and the defendant were nonresidents." Gregonis v. Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., 235 N. Y. 160, 139 N. E. 226, 32 A. L. R. 1.

But probably the weight of authority is not in accord with the New York rule in this respect. In 2 Wharton on Conflict of Laws, 1093, § 478, it is said:

"In the United States it is generally conceded that such suits lie, even though the parties be foreigners, and the tort complained of was committed in the land to which they in common belong, * * * and the prevalent rule is that, to sustain an action for a tort committed abroad, the lex fori and the lex loci delicti must concur in holding that the act complained of is the subject of legal redress."

The mere fact that litigants are nonresidents should not suffice to deny them access to the courts of the forum, for valuable property rights might thus be lost.

[9, 10] There is no violation of the inhibition of the federal Constitution against special privileges and immunities in refusing to accept jurisdiction where the law of the forum is in direct conflict with the foreign law relied upon. Article 4, § 2, of the United States Constitution provides that:

"The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states."

Pursuant to this federal guaranty, a citizen of any foreign state or country may maintain an action at the forum, where under similar circumstances a citizen of its own jurisdiction could maintain such an action. In the case of Chambers v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 207 U. S. 142, 28 S. Ct. 34, 52 L. Ed. 143, Mr. Justice Moody says:

"The state may determine the limits of the jurisdiction of its courts, and the character of the controversies which shall be heard in them. The state policy decides whether and to what extent the state will entertain in its courts transitory actions, where the causes of action have arisen in other jurisdictions. Different states may have different policies, and the same state may have different policies at different times. But any policy the state may choose to adopt must operate in the same way on its own citizens and those of other states. The privileges which it affords to one class it must afford to the other. Any law by which privileges to begin actions in the courts are given to its own citizens and withheld from the citizens of other states is void, because in conflict with the supreme law of the land."

And in the famous Slaughter House Cases reported in 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. Ed. 394, Mr. Justice Miller said:

"Its sole purpose [of this constitutional provision] was to declare to the several states that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify, or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other states within your jurisdiction."

But there is no California law in conflict with the foregoing federal constitutional provision. A nonresident is denied no privilege which is conferred upon a citizen or resident of the forum. Upon the contrary, it is asserted that, because it is the settled policy of the law of California that a parent is exempt from liability for the torts of his minor children where he does not participate in the wrong, therefore, a nonresident may not maintain such an action at the forum, even though a foreign statute may authorize it, for the reason that the policies of the law of the respective jurisdictions are in irreconcilable conflict. In 5 Ruling Case Law, 911, § 5, it is said:

"In the recognition and enforcement of foreign laws the courts are slow to overrule the positive law of the forum, and they will never give effect to a foreign law when to do so would prejudice the state's own rights or the rights of its citizens, or when the enforcement of the foreign law would contravene the positive policy of the law of the forum whether that policy be refuted in statutory enactments or not."

Of course, "the existence of a statute of the forum substantially like the foreign statute under which the cause of action arises is the best and most conclusive indication that it is not contrary to the policy of the forum to entertain the action." 1 Wharton on Conflict of Laws, 280b.

[11] But the policy of the forum may be indicated by its current decisions, as well as by its statutory or constitutional law. 5 R. C. L. 499, § 301, Id. 1039; 12 C. J. 439, § 16; Spead v. Tomlinson, 73 N. H. 46, 59 A. 376, 68 L. R. A. 433; Zeigler v. Ill. T. & S. Bank, 245 Ill. 180, 91 N. E. 1041, 1045, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1112, 19 Ann. Cas. 127; Glover v. Baker, 76 N. H. 393, 83 A. 916, 932. It is the rule in a majority of the states that, when the cause of action depends upon a foreign statute, as it does in the instant case, there must be a statute in the forum similar to the one relied upon, in order to confer jurisdiction upon the courts of the forum. 5 R. C. L. 1040, § 131. In 12 C. J. 438, § 14, the author says:

"The doctrine of comity must yield to the positive law of the land. Hence the foreign law must give way when in conflict with the statutes of the forum, or the settled current of its judicial decisions."

Likewise in Studebaker v. Mau, 14 Wyo. 68, 82 P. 2, the court says:

"Comity will not intervene to enforce the laws of a foreign state or country, if such enforcement would contravene the well-settled policy of the forum, or be prejudicial to the interest of its citizens, or when it comes in conflict with a positive law. Comity will only be adopted by courts of justice in the silence of a particular rule affirming, denying, or restraining the operation of foreign laws."

So, also, in 2 Wharton on Conflict of Laws, § 478a, it is asserted that:

"The question of assuming jurisdiction is a matter of comity; that is, the courts, paying due deference to the precedents at the forum, may decline jurisdiction upon the ground that it is contrary to the public policy of the forum to entertain the action. * * * The court will undoubtedly decline the jurisdiction if there is a fundamental difference of policy between the laws of the two states or countries, but a slight variance of views with respect to common-law principles does not defeat the jurisdiction." 5 R. C. L. p. 915, § 9, page 1040, § 131; Walsh v. N. Y. & N. E. R. Co., 160 Mass. 571, 36 N. E. 584, 39 Am. St. Rep. 514; Eingartner v. Ill. Steel Co., 94 Wis. 70, 68 N. W. 664, 34 L. R. A. 503, 59 Am. St. Rep. 859.

With relation to the application of the doctrine of comity, Mr. Joseph Story, in his Conflict of Laws, § 38, declared that:

"It is inadmissible when it is contrary to its (the forum's) known policy, or prejudicial to its interests. In the silence of any positive rule affirming, denying, or restraining the operation of the foreign laws, courts of justice presume the tacit adoption of them, * * * unless they are repugnant to its policy, or prejudicial to its interests."

There is good reason for declining to accept jurisdiction of a cause which would require the enforcement of foreign laws in conflict with the avowed policy of the law of the forum, for otherwise the forum might be called upon to enforce principles of law inimical to the welfare of its citizens, and subversive of plain justice. The law of the land is deemed to be a declaration of principles best adapted to the peace, order, and welfare of its subjects, and it would be abhorrent to justice to require the enforcement of principles in conflict with the established law of the forum.

The English rule is aptly stated in Carr v. Francis, A. C. 176, 182, 71 L. J. K. B. (N. S.) 361, 85 L. T. (N. S.) 144, 50 Week. Rep. 257, to the effect that there are two concurring conditions essential in order to confer jurisdiction of an extraterritorial tort upon a local court: (1) The wrong must be of such a character that it would have been actionable if committed in the forum; (2) the act must not have been justifiable by the law of the place where it was committed. Dicey on Conflict of Laws, 697. However, this well-established English rule appears to have been limited in its application to American court. In Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 13 S. Ct. 224, 36 L. Ed. 1129, Mr. Justice Gray says:

"Some courts have held that the wrong must be one which would be actionable by the law of the place where the redress is sought, as well as by the law of the place where the wrong was done. * * * But such is not the law of this court. By our law, a private action may be maintained in one state, if not contrary to its own policy, for such a wrong done in another and actionable there, although a like wrong would not be actionable in the state where the suit was brought." Loucks v. Standard Oil Co., 224 N. Y. 99, 120 N. E. 198.

It must be conceded that the doctrine of comity has been applied in this country and jurisdiction assumed, even in the absence of a statute of the forum corresponding to the statute of the lex loci which is relied upon. Dickinson Farm Mortgage Co. v. Harry, 273 U. S. 119, 47 S. Ct. 308, 71 L. Ed. 569. This case involved an action brought in the state of Illinois for damages for fraud committed in Texas, in violation of its statute. But the court there said:

"The Texas statute as applied in this case does not add any extraordinary feature to the common-law liability for fraudulent representations."

It therefore appears that the enforcement of the Texas statute did not conflict with the policy of the law of Illinois, but, upon the contrary, was in consonance with it.

While there may appear to be some confusion of authorities due to a natural difficulty in construing laws or statutes, and in applying the doctrine of the law of comity, the decisions of the courts of America seem to be in harmony to the effect that, when the positive law of the forum, represented by its Constitution, statutes or current decisions, is in substantial conflict with the law of the foreign state, country, or territory, upon the subject-matter in controversy, the courts of the forum will decline to accept jurisdiction without violation of the doctrine of the comity of nations.

[12] It is contended that the language of the complaint to the effect that in "section 2375 of 'Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915,' it is provided," etc., is not a sufficient affirmative statement that the particular act of the Hawaiian Legislature was actually in force January 5, 1920, when the tort complained of was committed. Respondent suggests that the compilation of laws termed "Revised Laws of Hawaii" may have contained the specific statute referred to in the year 1915, as alleged, but that the act might have been actually repealed after that date and prior to the date upon which the tort is alleged to have occurred; in other words, that there is no definite allegation of the existence of a statute in Hawaii on January 5, 1920, holding a parent liable for the torts of his minor children independent of participation in the wrong, on the part of the parent. But in view of the fact that the policy of the law in California is in direct conflict with such a statute, even if it were properly alleged to have existed, it becomes unnecessary to determine this matter.

We are of the opinion that the demurrer to the fourth amended complaint was properly sustained on account of the conflict of law which exists between the forum and the foreign territory.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

McFARLAND v. BRYSON.

(L. A. 9523.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1927.

1. Wills ⌘206—Deceased's letter describing property and directing payment of funeral expenses with words, "My will to S. McFarland and family," held subject to probate.

Deceased's letter describing property with direction for funeral and payment of expenses of illness with the words, "My will to S. McFarland and family," held to indicate a testamentary intent, though most informal, and subject to probate.

2. Executors and administrators ⌘14—Executor need not be designated by that particular name.

No particular form of appointing an executor is prescribed, nor is it necessary that one be designated by that particular name.

3. Executors and administrators ⌘14—Person shown by terms of will to have been intended by testator to commit execution thereof held entitled to letters (Civ. Code, § 1371).

Under Civ. Code, § 1371, where it appears by terms of will that it was intention of testator to commit execution thereof and administration of his estate to any person as executor, such person, though not named executor, is entitled to letters testamentary as though named therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Petition by S. B. McFarland for the probate of a document as the last will and testament of Robert S. Parker, deceased, and by Frank Bryson, as Public Administrator of the County of Los Angeles, for the probate of the same document, and application for letters of administration by Frank Bryson, Public Administrator of the County of Los Angeles, of the estate of Robert S. Parker, deceased. From an order denying the probate, and an order appointing Frank Bryson as administrator of said estate, S. B. McFarland appeals. Reversed.

Walter F. Keen and Alfred T. Hutchins, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, W. Sumner Holbrook, Jr., Deputy County Counsel, and Frank Bryson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. The appellant, S. B. McFarland, filed a petition in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles for the probate of a document which he alleged to be the last will and testament of Robert S. Parker, deceased. The petition alleged that the value of the estate was approximately $3,900;

that testator left no heirs at law; that at the time the document in question was executed testator was of the age of 76 years and in every respect competent to make a will; that the document is entirely in the handwriting of testator and dated and signed by him, and reads as follows:

"Los Angeles Feb 4 1922

624 W 49 Pl

"To S. B. McFarland and Family

"There is 2200 In Bonds In A Larje Envelop They Belong to R. F. Frazie I Loned Him 1500 Fifteen Hundred Dollars on Them now Sam All I want is To Be Put away Decent Not Expensive and if I Should Be Sick and Eny Bills I wished you would Pay them Thare is 500 In Bonds Them are mine Gold and Paper I Will Tell you all When I see you

"my Will To S. McFarland and Family

"I Remain your Friend

"Robert S. Parker."

Petitioner asked to have the foregoing document admitted to probate as the last will of decedent, and that petitioner be appointed executor according to the tenor of said will, or administrator with the will annexed, as the court should see fit. While this petition was pending and undetermined, the respondent, as public administrator, petitioned for the probate of the same document as the last will of decedent, and asked that he be appointed administrator with the will annexed, upon the theory that no appointment was made in the will of an executor.

The trial court, however, refused the petition of both parties to admit the said document to probate as the last will of decedent, and, later, the public administrator filed his petition for letters of administration, alleging that the document in question is an ambiguous writing. This petition was granted, and from the order denying probate to the document and refusing to appoint appellant executor thereof, and from the order appointing respondent as administrator of said estate, an appeal has been taken.

[1] The only question presented upon the appeal is the sufficiency of the said document as a testamentary disposition of property. In determining this matter, we must read the document in the light of the circumstances under which it was written. Counsel states that, unfortunately, no stenographic record was made of the evidence introduced at the hearing. However, some pertinent facts appear from the record presented in the clerk's transcript, first, that decedent was a man of the age of 76 years; that he was illiterate and wrote the will himself, evidently with no legal assistance; that he had no heirs at law; that he regarded himself as a friend of S. B. McFarland and family. With these facts in mind, it seems that the document in question, although it is most informal, indicates a testamentary intent. The property of the testator is described, a direction is given that moderate funeral expenses be incurred and paid and that expenses of illness be paid, and there is a clear implication that the residue of the estate should go to S. B. McFarland and family.

The words, "My will to S. McFarland and Family," is a characteristic expression of persons of little education and no familiarity with technical legal phraseology. Any one who has heard many such persons discuss a matter of this kind has heard expressions such as "I made my will to my mother," etc. Respondent contends that the words "My will to S. McFarland and Family" should be interpreted as though they read "My good will to S. McFarland and Family," a general courteous expression in closing the communication. Such a formal intention is inconsistent with the general informality of the document and the language used therein. No addition seems necessary to the language used. "My will to S. McFarland and Family" seems to us a precise expression of the testator's intent. He was "making his will" to S. McFarland, and by that he understood that he was leaving all his property to him. Common human experience seems to support such an interpretation, and the entire document, considered in connection with the surrounding circumstances, leads to the conclusion that the testator had testamentary intent in making the writing offered for probate. Indeed, it so impressed the respondent in the first instance, for he, too, petitioned for the probate of the same as a will.

We think no useful purpose would be served by a discussion of the cases cited upon both sides in which writings have been held to be or not to be wills. Each case is a law unto itself, for there are no two of the documents presented for our consideration, which bear sufficient resemblance to be comparable.

[2, 3] The only other question to be decided is whether or not appellant is appointed executor by said writing. The document impliedly directs McFarland to collect the debt owing to testator and expressly directs him to pay bills of decedent and to "put (testator) away decent not expensive," and then leaves one with the thought that any balance is to go to McFarland and family. No particular form of appointing an executor is prescribed, nor is it necessary that one be designated by that particular name. It is sufficient if the will uses expressions pointing at the essential functions of an executor, functions which exist in consistent combination. Schouler on Wills (6th Ed.) § 1509. Where it appears by the terms of a will that it was the intention of the testator to commit the execution thereof and the administration of his estate to any person as executor, such person, although not named executor, is entitled to letters testamentary in like manner as if he had been named executor. Section 1371, Civ. Code.

The judgment and orders appealed from are reversed.

1. Appeal and error §1008(1)—Trial court's decision on issue of fraud is final.

Evidence held to sustain trial court's finding on issue of fraud in sale of oriental rugs.

3. Sales §121—Buyer of oriental rugs held not to have waived right to rescind for fraud of seller.

Buyer of oriental rugs, by using them after discovery that they were not as represented and after notice of his election to rescind sale, held not to have waived right to rescind in view of facts.

4. Sales §397—Buyer of oriental rugs held to have rescinded promptly on discovery of falsity of seller's representations (Civ. Code, § 1691).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ralph H. Clock, Judge.

Action by G. E. Noll against Nich G. Baida to recover purchase price of oriental rugs. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding former opinion in 254 P. 623.

U. T. Clotfelter, Richard Hartley, and Charles Cassat Davis, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Neil S. McCarthy, Earl L. Banta, and McCarthy, Nolan & Freston, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted to recover the purchase price of eight oriental rugs purchased by plaintiff of defendant. The ground upon which said recovery is sought is that defendant falsely and fraudulently represented the quality and character of said rugs at the time of their purchase. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of said purchase price. The defendant has appealed from said judgment, and the matter is now before us upon a record prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court found as true the allegations of the complaint that the statements and representations made by the defendant at the time of and immediately prior to said purchase were false and fraudulent. The appellant contends that the evidence was not sufficient to justify this finding. Appellant admits that the evidence as to the falsity of these representations was conflicting, but claims that as the allegations of the complaint charged that appellant was guilty of fraud such allegations must not only be proven by a preponderance of evidence, but that an appellate court is authorized to weigh such evidence for the purpose of determining whether it meets this requirement. Appellant's position is stated in his brief as follows:

"The mere fact that there may be some conflict in the testimony does not preclude this court from passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence in the record on the subject of fraud, including that for and against the allegations of the complaint."

Among the cases cited by appellant in support of this contention are Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 581, 53 P. 26; Abrams v. Daugherty, 60 Cal. App. 297, 212 P. 942; Everett v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 332, 338, 187 P. 996. These cases hold, quoting from Abrams v. Daugherty, supra:

"The presumption is always against fraud. This presumption approximates in strength that of innocence of crime. Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 581, 588, 53 P. 26. One who seeks relief from fraud must allege it and prove it by clear and satisfactory evidence. A mere suspicion of fraud is not sufficient. Everett v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 332, 338, 187 P. 996, 998."

[1] It may be conceded that the presumption against fraud approximates that of innocence of crime, yet in criminal cases where the defendant must be proven guilty to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, the sole right to weigh the evidence is in the jury, and after the jury has exercised this right, the appellate court is without authority to set aside the findings of the jury if there is any substantial evidence to support it. The appellate court may upon appeal from a judgment of conviction in reviewing the evidence be of the opinion that the evidence against the defendant is weak, and that it preponderates in his favor, yet the verdict must stand because it is the exclusive right of the jury to weigh the evidence and its determination as to the weight to be given such evidence is final. So in civil cases tried without a jury where fraud is an issue, it is for the trial court to determine the weight of the evidence, and, while it cannot find fraud upon a mere suspicion, yet if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove fraud, it is for the trial court to determine whether such evidence outweighs or preponderates over that adduced in opposition thereto, and when the trial court has found that such evidence does so preponderate, its decision thereon is final, and an appellate court has no right or authority to disturb such a finding, even though the appellate court may be of a contrary opinion as to the weight of such evidence. Tucker v. Beneke, 180 Cal. 588, 182 P. 299; Mead v. Mead, 41 Cal. App. 280, 182 P. 761. The appellant also cites Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 799, 158 P. 753, and quotes the following from the decision:

"For if there be two inferences equally reasonable and equally susceptible of being drawn from the proved facts, the one favoring fair dealing and the other favoring corrupt practice, it is the express duty of court or jury to draw the inference favorable to fair dealing. Levy v. Scott, 115 Cal. 41, 46 P. 892; Thomas v. Visalia Electric Co., 169 Cal. 658, 147 P. 972; Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 664, 59 P. 264; note to Burch v. Smith (Tex.) 65 Am. Dec. 154. For fraud must always be proved, so that when the plaintiff's case goes no further than to establish a state of facts from which the inference of fraud may or may not be reasonably drawn, he has failed to establish his charge by a preponderance of the evidence, and it becomes the duty of court or jury, as has been said, to find in favor of innocence and uprightness."

Had appellant quoted the balance of the paragraph in which the foregoing excerpt is found, we think he would have found an answer to his argument. The balance of said paragraph reads as follows:

"This does not, of course, mean that the fraud must be proved by direct evidence. This is not always nor even often possible, but it does mean that the indirect evidence and the inference to be drawn from the proved facts must be so convincing as to satisfy trial court or trial jury that fraud was designed and accomplished. If, therefore, we should accept appellant's statement as above quoted, that the sole proposition is whether fraud can be inferred from the admitted facts, the complete answer is that, conceding that fraud might be inferred, the trial court upon substantial evidence has declined to infer it, and its action in so doing is not here open to question."

The question of inference to be drawn from proven or admitted facts is not involved in the present inquiry. But the question raised by the present contention of appellant is whether we shall sustain the finding of fact by the trial court, or whether we shall in view of all the evidence in the case set it aside for the reason that in our opinion the preponderance of the evidence is against said finding. Appellant states in his brief his position as follows:

"The testimony offered by respondent in support of the fraud charged was given by two witnesses, neither one of which had made any special study of the subject to which their testimony related, and particularly of dyes, dye processes, or the methods used in coloring oriental rugs. Neither had made any study of the processes of the manufacture of such rugs. On the other hand the evidence offered by the defendant to refute the fraud charged in the amended complaint consists of the testimony of seven witnesses, one of whom had taken a special university course upon the subject of dyes and dye processes; and most, if not all, of these witnesses were thoroughly familiar with the processes and manufacture and treatment of such rugs."

[2] Yet the trial court accepted the testimony of respondent's two witnesses, with all its alleged infirmities, and discarded that of appellant's seven witnesses. This determination of the trial court upon the evidence before it was final and conclusive, and this court is without the power to disturb it.

[3] The evidence shows that the rugs were purchased in June and July, 1921. Some time in the latter part of that year or in the first part of the following year the respondent noticed that the rugs were fading, and he called in an expert, who informed him that the rugs were not what they were represented to be by the appellant. Thereupon respondent went to appellant and told him that the rugs were fading or getting lighter. Appellant offered to take the rugs back, but assured respondent that he was mistaken in his belief that they were of inferior quality and further assured him that the rugs were as represented. As a result of this conversation the respondent testified that he was "reconvinced" of appellant's honesty, and nothing was done in regard to rescinding the sale at that time, respondent stating, "I will let it go, but if I find they are wrong, then I will call on you again, for I believe that I am right about the rugs fading." Thereafter respondent called in another expert, who examined the rugs and reported to respondent the following June, which would be in June, 1922, that the rugs were not as represented by appellant. Thereupon respondent immediately notified appellant of the result of his investigations and demanded that he take back the rugs and return to respondent the purchase money. The rugs were purchased to be used by respondent in his home, and upon their purchase they were delivered to the home of respondent and there laid upon the floors of said home by appellant. They remained there from this time up to the time of respondent's demand that appellant take them back and refund the purchase money. Appellant refused to take the rugs back and they continued to remain where they were placed by appellant upon the floor of respondent's home up to about April, 1923, shortly before the trial of said action. It is contended by appellant that respondent waived his right to rescind by thus using the rugs after his discovery that they were not as represented by appellant, and after his notice of election to rescind said sale. He cites as authorities supporting this contention the following cases: Hogan v. Anthony, 52 Cal. App. 158, 198 P. 47; United Motor S. F. Co. v. Callendar, 30 Cal. App. 41, 157 P. 561; and Knight v. Bentel, 39 Cal. App. 502, 179 P. 406. These cases all involved the right of a purchaser of an automobile to rescind a purchase thereof, and in each case the claim was made that the purchaser had, after the discovery of the defects in the automobile, upon which he based his right to rescind, used the automobile to such an extent and in such a manner that he waived any right to rescind he may have originally had on account of such defects. In Hogan v. Anthony, supra, the court said:

"If, after the discovery of the misrepresentation, he conducts himself with reference to the transaction as though it still were subsisting and binding, he will not thereafter be permitted to impeach the validity of the contract by seeking to rescind it or to escape performance of his covenants."

The claim that respondent has waived his right to rescind the sale by reason of his use of the rugs was not raised at the trial, and there is authority for holding that it cannot be raised for the first time on appeal. Bell v. Anderson, 74 Wis. 638, 43 N. W. 666. It was further held in that case, where it was sought to rescind a sale of a piano on account of the false and fraudulent representations made by the vendor at the time of the sale, and where it was shown that the piano had been taken by the vendor to the home of purchaser, and that after notice of rescission the vendor had left the piano in the home of the purchaser, and that the latter and members of her family had used said piano, but not to such an extent as to injure it, that such use was not inconsistent with the rescission of the contract. Further, the court said:

"But the most that can be successfully claimed by the defendant is that it was for the jury, under proper instructions, to say whether the use was such an assertion of ownership by the plaintiff as would render nugatory the offer to return the instrument."

In this connection the following language from the case of White v. Miller, 43 Pa. Super. Ct. 572, is apposite:

"It is practically conceded that the place of delivery was the defendant's residence, and it would follow that that would be the place of rejection. The defendant was not bound to return them to any other place, and if his contention be the correct one, as soon as proper notice was received by the plaintiff of the rescission of the contract, it was then his duty to remove the goods."

In the present action it is not claimed that respondent used the rugs, or in any manner exercised ownership over them, except to leave them where they were placed by appellant, and where appellant permitted them to remain after respondent had served upon him the notice of rescission of the sale. Neither can it be claimed that the rugs were materially damaged by said use after the discovery by respondent of the false representations of the appellant. The evidence shows that the life of oriental rugs under ordinary use is many years, some witnesses testifying that they last 100 years or more. In the case of machinery or an automobile it is different. Practically all use of such articles tends to cause the same to wear out or deteriorate. At best their life is but for a few years. In the cases relied upon by appellant it also appears that the purchasers, after the discovery of the false representations, did not permit the property purchased to remain where it was at the time of its delivery to them by the vendor, but removed the same and used it in their business or pleasure, thus exercising dominion of it, inconsistent with their claim that they had rejected it by rescission of the sales. Under these circumstances we do not think these cases can be regarded as authorities conclusive of the rights of the parties in the present action. On the other hand, we regard the question whether respondent, by the use of the rugs subsequent to his discovery of the falsity of appellant's representations, waived his right to rescind, one properly for the determination of the trial court from the evidence before it. There was no express finding upon this question for the reason possibly that it was not made an issue by defendant in his answer. The findings as a whole, being in favor of the respondent, are at least impliedly against any waiver of this right to rescind. Taking into consideration the character of the property and the manner and extent of its use by respondent, the fact that no material damage was occasioned by such use, and that in using it respondent only permitted it to remain at the place where it was delivered and left by appellant after notice of rescission, we are of the opinion that such acts by respondent were not inconsistent with his claim that he had rejected the rugs and rescinded the sale thereof.

[4] The court found "that promptly upon the discovery of the falsity of said representations which, as aforesaid had induced plaintiff to make the purchase of said eight oriental rugs, plaintiff rescinded said contract of purchase of said eight rugs, and on or about June 23, 1922, notified the defendant that plaintiff had rescinded the same." It is contended by appellant that the evidence is not sufficient to support this finding. Appellant's version of the evidence is that respondent, in November, 1921, was informed by an expert of his own choosing that the rugs were not as represented by appellant, and that he took no action to rescind the sale until June 23, 1922, seven months thereafter. If this were all of the evidence in the case there might be no question of the soundness of this contention of appellant. But appellant leaves out of consideration entirely the undisputed evidence that respondent, immediately on having his fears that the rugs were fading confirmed by an expert, reported to appellant the information he had received and asked appellant to take back the rugs and return to him his money; that appellant agreed to do so, but, to use respondent's words, "He cajoled me along until he got me believing he was honest about it," and "reconvinced me of his honesty." This conversation took place some time between the first part of November, 1921, and the first part of March, 1922. Respondent was not certain as to its date, but said it was either the last of the year 1921 or the first part of the year 1922, and that "It might have been January, February or March, I am not sure—it was early in the year." It is true respondent stated that Mr. Baida would know the date, as it was at the time when they were negotiating an exchange of rugs. Mr. Baida on being called fixed the date as around the first part of November, 1921. The trial court, of course, could have rejected Mr. Baida's evidence and accepted the statement of respondent. After this conversation respondent consulted another expert, who examined the rugs, and about the 1st of June, 1923, reported to respondent that they were not as represented by appellant. Immediately thereafter respondent served notice of rescission and a demand for a return of the money paid by him for the rugs. The trial court in finding that respondent had promptly upon the discovery of the fraud rescinded the sale, evidently placed some reliance upon the evidence of respondent of this conversation between the parties, in which the respondent was "reconvinced" of appellant's honesty and therefore did not press at that time a rescission of the sale. It might be stated here that the evidence shows that respondent had no experience with oriental rugs, and that his knowledge regarding them was extremely limited. He so informed appellant at the time he was negotiating for the purchase of the rugs he subsequently bought, and that he would have to rely upon the advice of some one familiar with rugs of that character, before he would purchase any. On the other hand, appellant was a dealer in oriental rugs and informed respondent that he had been in business in the same spot in the same town for 30 years. When, therefore, respondent reported to appellant his suspicions that the rugs were not as they had been represented to him and that these suspicions had been confirmed by the opinion of an expert, and demanded that appellant take back the rugs and return the purchase price, he no doubt would have enforced this demand by proper action in order to make the same effective had it not been for the assurance of the appellant which caused respondent to allay his suspicions and to make further investigation before taking definite action. That appellant under such circumstances should not be permitted to take advantage of the delay caused by his fraudulent and false statements, we think is both obvious and just. To suffer him to do so would be to permit him to reap an advantage from his own wrong. The dictates of common honesty are opposed to any such untoward transaction. It would seem unnecessary to cite any authority in support of a proposition so fair and just. A case with facts in some respects similar is the case of Wegenaar v. Dechow, 33 App. Div. 12, 53 N. Y. S. 240, where the court said:

"It is true that there is no claim that the vendor in this case was guilty of actual fraud, but the learned referee has found, upon evidence which is quite convincing, that he did induce the defendant to defer action by representations which turned out to be false in fact; and, even if such representations were made in good faith, the defendant was lulled into inaction by them; and this circumstance, we think, brings the case within the operation of the familiar rule that a party is relieved from the consequences of a failure to perform any obligation where such nonperformance is caused or induced by the acts of the other party. Stewart v. Keteltas, 36 N. Y. 388; Leslie v. Insurance Co., 63 N. Y. 27; Winch v. Insurance Co., 86 N. Y. 618. The plaintiff, it seems, was a dealer in, and manufacturer of, tombstones. Presumably he had had considerable experience in constructing them out of Quincy granite, and knew something of the peculiarities of that species of stone; while, upon the other hand, the defendant had little or no knowledge upon the subject. When, therefore, the plaintiff assured the defendant that the spots he discovered were not rust, and that they would disappear with proper treatment, or as soon as subjected to the influence of a heavy rain, the defendant had a right to believe him, and if, in reliance upon this assurance, he did not act as promptly as he otherwise would have done, and if, in the belief that the rain would have the effect claimed for it, he made a payment or did some other act which in different circumstances would be regarded as a waiver of his right to reject, we think that, within the principle of the cases cited, the plaintiff is estopped from invoking the same rigid rule as would be applied if the defendant had been uninfluenced in his actions by the plaintiff's declarations. * * *

In that case it appears that the statements of the plaintiff therein, which caused the defendant to delay rescission, were found by the court not to have been fraudulently made.

Nevertheless, the court held that plaintiff was estopped from invoking the rigid rule usually applicable in such cases. The present case is much stronger, as the evidence shows that the statements made by appellant which caused respondent to delay action were false and fraudulent. After this conversation, in which respondent says that he was reassured of appellant's honesty, respondent consulted another rug expert. Whether he did so at once or whether he waited until the following June is not clear from the evidence. From respondent's evidence it appears that he did so immediately after his conversation with appellant. But whenever it was that respondent consulted this last-named expert the evidence is uncontradicted that the expert did not report to respondent his opinion regarding the rugs until the month of June, and that immediately upon receipt of said report respondent served upon appellant notice of rescission of said sale, and a demand for the return of the purchase prices of the rugs. Under these circumstances we are unable to hold that the trial court was not warranted in finding that respondent rescinded the sale promptly. As to whether the rugs were as represented by appellant was not a question easy of determination, and it was not one that could be determined definitely at any precise time. The process of fading was an exceedingly slow one, and it took time to determine whether the rugs were really fading or not. The art of manufacturing oriental rugs is one more or less shrouded in mystery, and whether those purchased by respondent were the kind and character which appellant represented them to be at the time of their purchase was a question upon which, it seems, even those who are supposed to be familiar with such articles are not agreed. While the witnesses for respondent testified that the rugs in question were not as represented, the seven witnesses for appellant gave contrary testimony. In the light of these facts, therefore, to have required the respondent to fix a definite date when he could say that he had positive knowledge of the fraud practiced upon him, and to require that this date be fixed at the earliest point of time when he began to suspect that the rugs were defective, but without any real knowledge that they were so, would be an unreasonable requirement and would not be justified by any rule of law or principle of justice. The trial court refused to adopt such a course, and in doing so we think acted in accordance with the law governing the matter. The trial court might have held that respondent, after suspecting that the rugs were fading and after consulting the first expert and receiving his report, thereby acquired knowledge of the falsity of appellant's representations, or knowledge of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the truth of such representations, notwithstanding the positive statements made to respondent by appellant, who was himself an expert, that the rugs were not fading and that they were as represented by appellant. On the other hand, the trial court, as it evidently did, may not have considered such evidence sufficient to require respondent to rescind at that time, but that he was entitled to make further investigations as to the quality of the rugs before taking any definite action. Such matters are peculiarly and solely in the province of the trial judge to decide and one not reviewable by an appellate court. "Section 1691 of the Civil Code requires the party entitled to rescind, 'to rescind promptly, upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind.' Whether or not the defrauded party has rescinded 'promptly' will depend upon all the circumstances of the particular case, and is, of course, a question primarily for the trial court." French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 589, 217 P. 515, 519.

From the foregoing it is our opinion that there was sufficient evidence to justify the finding that respondent promptly upon the discovery of the false representations regarding the rugs rescinded the sale thereof and demanded a return of their purchase price.

The other questions raised by appellant in his brief are without merit. The judgment is affirmed.

IN RE KELLEHER'S ESTATE.

WALSH v. POMEROY et al.

(S. F. 12279.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 13, 1927.

1. Wills $\S$ 184(2)—Substitution of devisee or legatee may be accomplished by holographic instrument, testamentary in character, but in nature of letter (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1343).

Substitution of devisee or legatee in accordance with Civ. Code, $\S$ 1343, may be accomplished by a holographic instrument, testamentary in character, but in nature of a letter, and its scope and effect is governed by showing of testator's intention as ascertained from consideration of language of writing, interpreted in light of circumstances attending execution.

2. Wills $\S$ 186—Testator's letter to devisee relative to intention to give what he had promised held not to affect substitution of devisees (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1343).

Letter of deceased to devisee relative to assisting him and his intention to give what he promised held insufficient to accomplish substitution, within meaning of Civ. Code, § 1343, of devisee capable of taking by reason of former devisee's death before testator, in that such writing did not declare a testamentary disposition of property and, at most, was ambiguous.

3. Wills ⚡488—Court is not authorized to create new will, though extrinsic evidence is admissible to explain uncertain or ambiguous terms.

While extrinsic evidence is admissible to explain uncertain or ambiguous terms, yet the court, even if certain that the wish of the testator would have been to adopt its interpretation, is not authorized to create a new and valid will.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Application by Helen H. Walsh for admission to probate of an alleged codicil to the will of Mathew Kelleher, deceased, opposed by Richard T. Pomeroy, executor, and others. From an order granting the executor's motion for nonsuit and denying the probate of the alleged codicil, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Stoker and McNair & Stoker, all of San Francisco, for respondent Pomeroy individually and as executor.

Livingston & Livingston and John C. Quinlan, all of San Francisco, for respondents Heirs at Law.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal from an order granting motion of respondents for nonsuit and denying the petition of appellant for admission to probate of an alleged codicil to the will of Mathew Kelleher, deceased.

Decedent, on February 9, 1914, while visiting in Ireland, made a will in which he named respondent Richard T. Pomeroy as one of the executors and Daniel Kelleher of Boston, his cousin, as one of the legatees. The legacy to Daniel, in the sum of 6,000 pounds sterling, about $30,000, was conditioned upon the legatee surviving the testator. The legatee died March 6, 1921, and the testator June 18, 1921, some three months later. At the time of his death the testator was a resident of the city and county of San Francisco and left an estate therein valued at about $90,000. On September 26, 1921, his will was duly admitted to probate in the superior court for said city and county, and said Richard T. Pomeroy was appointed by the court as executor thereof.

On July 2, 1925, almost four years later, appellant Helen H. Walsh, a niece of Daniel's wife, petitioned the court to admit to probate as a holographic codicil to said will, the letter partially quoted below, claiming that by said letter, and especially by the clause in italics, decedent intended to and did substitute her as legatee in place of said Daniel Kelleher:

"2020 Howard St., San Francisco, Feb. 5, 1920. Dear Daniel & Helan: * * * Now I thought I would write to you about a remark you made concerning a miseral hand reach I sent you and you in return want to pay me back. No sir if you want any more assistance write to me and don't be bashful because it had been my intention to give you what I promised when I say you I accept Helan as is your wish she shall have that when I shall straighten out for the long journey and I think the public administrator won't get a cent out of it either. * * * [Signed] Mathew Kelleher. * * *

The other portions of the letter, which is lengthy, are devoted entirely to gossip and news of a general character.

Appellant offered in evidence another long letter from Mathew to Daniel, undated, but inclosed in an envelope postmarked December 18, 1919, the relevant part of which is as follows:

"Dear Daniel: * * * Now about your niece will send me her name and if there is any change in conditions let me know because what I promised the other girl Helan she is going to get. * * * Now I want you to have a Christmas dinner. $100 [Signed] Mathew Kelleher. * * *

It is conceded that both letters are wholly written and signed in the handwriting of decedent.

Endeavoring to throw light upon the intent of the decedent and the surrounding circumstances, appellant testified that she was intimately acquainted with Daniel Kelleher during her entire lifetime and kept house for him for the last 28 years of his life; that his wife was her aunt, being her mother's sister, and he was second cousin to her father; that her sister Anna Walsh died December 21, 1918; that Daniel wrote Mathew Kelleher acquainting him that she had passed away; that Mathew and Daniel had corresponded for many years; that in the spring of 1918 Daniel received a letter from Mathew stating that inasmuch as he, Mathew, had named Daniel as a substantial beneficiary of his estate, he thought it would be advisable for Daniel to suggest to him the name of the one nearest and dearest to him, to be his, Daniel's, substitute and to take the place of Daniel as beneficiary, whereupon on March 29, 1918, Daniel replied suggesting appellant's name as his substitute, mentioned that he had already made provision for her sister, Anna Walsh, who was then fatally ill.

Respondents objected to the admission in evidence of the foregoing letters and testimony and moved for a nonsuit on the ground, first, that the bequest was uncertain and the evidence offered did not supply the deficiency; and, second, that the letter was not testamentary in character, nor did the evidence offered tend to prove that it was intended as a codicil to defendant's will. These objections were sustained and motion for nonsuit granted. The purpose of this appeal is to determine the correctness of such ruling.

[1] Section 1343 of the Civil Code provides:

"If a devisee or legatee dies during the lifetime of the testator, the testamentary disposition to him fails, unless an intention appears to substitute some other in his place. * * *

Such a substitution could be accomplished by a holographic instrument, testamentary in character, but in the nature of a letter, and its scope and effect would be governed by the showing as to the testator's intention as ascertained from a consideration of the language of the writing, interpreted in the light of the circumstances which attended its execution. Clarke v. Ransom, 50 Cal. 595; Estate of Spitzer, 196 Cal. 301, 237 P. 739; 26 Cal. Jur. § 258, pp. 954, 955; section 190, p. 873.

[2] However, in this case, even if we assume that the writing is testamentary in character, is it possible to ascertain from it the intention of the testator in view of the patent uncertainty of the language? We think that it is not. The clause, "No sir if you want any more assistance write to me and don't be bashful because it had been my intention to give you what I promised when I say you I accept Helan as is your wish she shall have that when I shall straighten out, * * *," might mean that decedent, upon his death, wished Helen to have the amount which he had bequeathed to Daniel or it might as well mean that he wished her to have some other or different amount or thing which had been suggested to him by Daniel. The other portions of the letter do not assist us in interpreting this language, and a consideration of the letter postmarked December 18, 1919, only serves to complicate the situation, for it is there said, not that Helen is to get what the decedent promised Daniel, but " * * * what I promised the other girl Helan she is going to get." Even assuming in the light of appellant's testimony that the "other girl" refers to Anna Walsh, her sister, who was fatally ill and for whom Daniel had already made provision, and that decedent had first planned to provide for Anna in place of Daniel and later intended to substitute Helen for Anna, still the writing utterly fails to identify the property promised as the 6,000 pounds sterling bequeathed to Daniel by the will of 1914.

[3] While extrinsic evidence is admissible to explain uncertain or ambiguous terms, yet the court, even if certain that the wish of the testator would have been to adopt its interpretation, is not authorized to create a new and valid will. As said in Estate of Lynch, 142 Cal. 373, 376, 75 P. 1086, 1088:

"But where * * * the will is absolutely devoid of any general description * * * the court cannot insert words in the will to express that intention and thereby make the will certain. The will must be wholly in writing, and the written words, with the aid of the extrinsic facts to which they may be held to apply, must be sufficient to identify the property. * * *

To the same effect see Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 337, 342, 55 P. 1011.

Furthermore, under the authorities hereinafter set forth, it is our opinion that the writing in question does not declare a testamentary disposition of property, but rather implies that it was the intention of the writer, after further consideration, to make provision in the future for both Daniel and Helen as he had promised. It will be noted that the first sentence of the paragraph refers back to the gift of $100 sent in the previous letter and that the next clause offers future assistance, "because it had been my intention to give you what I promised when I say you I accept Helan as is your wish. * * *

In the case of In re Richardson, 94 Cal. 63, 29 P. 484, 15 L. R. A. 635, a letter from a brother to his sister, containing the following clause, was offered as a will:

"My health is probably ruined, and I want to anticipate possibilities. You and your children get everything."

The court held that the document was not testamentary in character, saying:

"There is nothing in the circumstances and surroundings of the writer which unmistakably evince that it was his intention that the letter in question should be a testamentary disposition of his estate to his sister Nina and her children. It may be that he wished to be informed of some fact or facts before he made a will; for in this letter he shows a desire to hear from his sister at once. * * * He was not in extremis, nor is there anything to show that he contemplated immediate or very proximate dissolution, which might necessitate a final disposition of his estate. * * * It is not for courts to declare that to be a testamentary disposition of his estate when it does not clearly appear that such was the intention of the individual executing it."

The above language is directly applicable to the facts of the instant case. Estate of Spitzer, supra, cited by appellant, is not in point, as there the testator was in extremis and the letter addressed to his brother, a lawyer, indicated plainly his desire to make testamentary disposition of the property listed therein.

In Estate of Branick, 172 Cal. 482, 157 P. 238, the alleged will consisted of a letter, one of a series of about 30 written by decedent to his brother, which closed with the following expression:

"Of course these both propertys goes to you and Charley if I should pass in before yous do only I wish Mary would be taken care of. * * *

Two months afterwards decedent undertook to make a holographic will, but it was invalid. In affirming the order refusing to admit said letter to probate, the court said:

"It is quite clear that the testator understood the nature and requirements of a will. It was a fair inference from all the evidence that he fully understood the character of the document that he should execute as a will. The letter in question as a whole does not disclose any purpose or intent to dispose of his estate. The remarks claimed to be testamentary were apparently casual statements intended as information merely. Under the decisions in Estate of Richardson, 94 Cal. 63, 29 P. 484, 15 L. R. A. 635, and Estate of Meade, 118 Cal. 428, 50 P. 541, 62 Am. St. Rep. 244, we think he had no testamentary intent in writing this letter to his brother."

Likewise decedent in the instant case was thoroughly familiar with the formalities of a will.

See, also, Estate of Anthony, 21 Cal. App. 157, 131 P. 96, where, citing with approval In re Richardson, supra, it is said:

"The rule of law that favors testacy as against intestacy only operates where the existence of the testamentary intent is ascertained and the subject-matter of the doubt is one of construction. Where there is a doubt as to the existence of the animus testandi the rule in favor of testacy is not applicable. [Citing Estate of Meade, 118 Cal. 428, 50 P. 541, 62 Am. St. Rep. 244.] * * * Carrying this idea a little further we find this language in the case of McBride v. McBride, 26 Grat. [67 Va.] 476: 'It must satisfactorily appear that he intended the very paper to be his will. Unless it so appear the paper must be rejected.' * * * With these principles of law in mind can it be said that the deceased, at the time of writing the Lavin letter entertained the slightest suggestion that he was writing a will? The very idea, as it appears to us, is inconsistent with anything contained in the letter, and certainly inconsistent with the previous conduct and acts of the deceased. * * *"

Judgment affirmed.

In re EDWARDS' ESTATE. (L. A. 9231.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 13, 1927.

1. Descent and distribution — 14—Statute relating to inheritance by kindred of half blood held inapplicable, where childless widow died possessing property inherited from deceased husband and leaving surviving brothers and sisters and children of deceased half-brother (Civ. Code, § 1394, and § 1386, subds. 3, 8).

Where widow without children died possessed of property inherited from her deceased husband and left surviving her brothers and sisters and children of deceased brother and children of deceased half-brother, held Civ. Code, § 1394, relating to right of kindred of the half blood to inherit where inheritance comes to intestate by descent, was inapplicable, distribution under section 1386, subds. 3 or 8, being proper, dependent on whether property involved was common property of spouses or separate property of predeceased husband.

2. Descent and distribution — 14—Under statute, heirs of half blood are excluded from taking only when full blood heirs are also of blood of intestate's ancestor from which inheritance came (Civ. Code, § 1394).

Under Civ. Code, § 1394, providing that kindred of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood, unless the inheritance comes to intestate by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his ancestors, in which case all those not of the blood of such ancestors must be excluded from such inheritance, heirs of the half blood are to be excluded when and only when those of the full blood are also of the blood of the ancestors.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Anna Edwards, deceased. From a decree directing partial distribution, certain kindred of the half blood appeal. Reversed.

J. W. Havens, of Oakland, for appellants.
L. N. Turrentine and Turrentine & Wright, all of San Diego, for respondent.

Hamilton & Lindley, of San Diego, for Reed.

PER CURIAM. [1] This is an appeal from a decree of partial distribution entered by the superior court in and for the county of San Diego. The decedent, Anna Edwards, died intestate, leaving as her estate property which she had inherited from her deceased husband. From the record it appears that the decedent left surviving her certain brothers and sisters, and also certain children of a deceased brother, who were related to her in full blood. She also left surviving her certain children of a deceased half-brother, who were kindred of the half blood. The trial court found, after hearing upon the petition for partial distribution, that the kindred of the half blood were not entitled to inherit any part of the property or estate of the decedent. Thereupon the decree of partial distribution appealed from was entered distributing to the heirs of the full blood certain property belonging to the decedent's estate. The conclusion of the trial court was based upon its interpretation of section 1394 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"Kindred of the half blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree, unless the inheritance come to the intestate by descent, devise or gift of some one of his ancestors, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestors must be excluded from such inheritance."

Upon this appeal the appellants contend that the term "ancestors" as used in that section means one who is related by blood to an heir, and that since ordinarily a wife is not related by blood to her husband, her deceased husband does not come within the meaning of the term "ancestors" as used in said section of the Code. This being so, the appellants urge that the exception provided for in section 1394 of the Civil Code is without application to the instant case, and that they are therefore entitled to share equally with the heirs of the whole blood. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that, "as used in the statutes of descent and succession in California, an 'ancestor' is the person from whom property is inherited, and that if a wife inherits property from her husband, as is admitted in this case, the husband is her statutory ancestor, and that upon the death of the wife the half blood not related to the ancestor is wholly excluded from inheriting any part of the estate by the express terms of Civil Code, § 1394."

[2] We have concluded that it is of little moment herein whether or not a deceased husband is, or may be, under our statutes of descent and succession, the "ancestor" of his surviving wife. In other words, the question as to whether a deceased husband may be the "ancestor" of his surviving wife need not here be decided, for, in our opinion, the provisions of section 1394 of the Civil Code are inapplicable to the facts as shown by the record before us. The language of the exception found in said section 1394 is such as to plainly indicate that heirs of the half blood are to be excluded in favor of heirs of the whole blood when, and only when, those of the whole blood are also of the blood of the "ancestor." Estate of Smith, 131 Cal. 433, 436, 63 P. 729, 82 Am. St. Rep. 358; Estate of Belshaw, 190 Cal. 278, 284, 212 P. 13. Section 1394 of the Civil Code is therefore without application to this case for the very obvious reason that none of the parties hereto is of the blood of the decedent's predeceased husband.

As stated at the commencement of this opinion, the decedent at the time of her death was a widow and without issue. Under these circumstances, subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code is pertinent, and the provisions thereof offer a solution to the problem herein presented. That section reads:

"If the deceased is a widow, or widower, and leaves no issue, and the estate, or any portion thereof, was common property of such decedent and his or her deceased spouse, while such spouse was living, such property goes in equal shares to the children of such deceased spouse and to the descendants of such children by right of representation, and if none, then one-half of such common property goes to the father and mother of such decedent in equal shares, or to the survivor of them if either be dead, or if both be dead, then in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of such decedent and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation, and the other half goes to the father and mother of such deceased spouse in equal shares, or to the survivor of them if either be dead, or if both be dead, then in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of such deceased spouse and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation.

"If the estate, or any portion thereof, was separate property of such deceased spouse, while living, and came to such decedent from such spouse by descent, devise, or bequest, such property goes in equal shares to the children of such spouse and to the descendants of any deceased child by right of representation, and if none, then to the father and mother of such spouse, in equal shares, or to the survivor of them if either be dead, or if both be dead, then in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of such spouse and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation."

The decree of partial distribution appealed from indicates that the decedent inherited the property and estate here in dispute as the "heir" of her deceased husband. This declaration of the trial court leaves us in doubt as to whether the estate and property involved herein was, during the joint lives of the spouses, common property or the separate property of the predeceased husband. If, upon a further hearing, the trial court should determine that said estate and property was during his lifetime the separate property of the decedent's predeceased husband, it would devolve in entirety upon his heirs in the manner provided for in the second paragraph of subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code. This would, of necessity, operate to the complete exclusion of all the parties herein named. However, should the trial court find upon such further hearing that the estate and property now in dispute had been the common property of the decedent and her deceased spouse during their joint lives, then, and only in such event, would the heirs of the decedent be in a position to advance and support any claim thereto or interest therein. Under the express language of the first paragraph of subdivision 8 of section 1386, such interest of the decedent's heirs would be as to one-half thereof only. If the trial court should find that the estate and property here involved had been the common property of the decedent and her deceased spouse, so as to entitle the decedent's heirs to inherit one-half thereof, then the question would be squarely presented as to the respective rights of those of the whole blood and those of the half blood. In view of the fact that we have held herein that the exception found in section 1394 of the Civil Code may not be availed of in favor of the respondents for the reason that they are not of the blood of the decedent's predeceased spouse, the appellants, decedent's heirs of the half blood, would share said one-half interest equally with the respondents, decedent's heirs of the whole blood, under the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 1386 of the Civil Code. Estate of Lynch, 132 Cal. 214, 216, 217, 64 P. 284.

For the foregoing reasons, the decree of partial distribution appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE v. WATTERS. (Cr. 2955.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 22, 1927.

1. Homicide ☞253(1)—Conviction of murder in first degree held sustained by evidence.

In a prosecution for murder in the first degree, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Homicide ☞228(1)—"Corpus delicti" means not body of deceased, but essential elements of crime.

Term "corpus delicti" does not mean body of the deceased, but rather the body, the substance, the essential elements of the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Corpus Delicti.]

3. Homicide ☞228(1)—Testimony of eyewitness to murder was sufficient proof of corpus delicti.

Proof of the corpus delicti in a murder case does not require production of the body of deceased, and testimony to murder by an eyewitness was sufficient.

4. Criminal law ☞680(1)—Order of proof rests in discretion of trial court.

In a criminal case, the order of proof is a matter within the discretion of the trial court.

5. Criminal law ☞680(2)—Permitting introduction of evidence of defendant's admissions before corpus delicti was established held not reversible error, in absence of clear proof of abuse of discretion.

Order of proof in criminal case rests in discretion of trial court, and fact that court permitted state to introduce evidence of admissions of defendant before corpus delicti was sufficiently established held not reversible error, in absence of clear proof of abuse of discretion.

6. Criminal law ☞1037(1)—Prosecuting attorney's frequent insistence during counsel's argument that he was misstating evidence held not prejudicial error, in absence of assignment of misconduct at the time.

Alleged misconduct of prosecuting attorney arising out of rather frequent interruptions of defendant's counsel while latter was making his argument to the jury, consisting in insistence that counsel was misstating the evidence and resulting in a series of heated controversies, held not prejudicial error, in view of absence of assignment of misconduct at the time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

George Watters was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant upon the charge of murder and from the order denying the defendant a new trial. The homicide, if committed as charged in the information, occurred on the 27th day of January, 1926, in the city of Sacramento, where at the time the defendant resided with his wife and their three minor children, the eldest of which was a girl at that time of the age of 10 years, who was the main witness for the prosecution, and the only witness who testified to the direct act of killing. Immediately after the date of the alleged homicide the defendant, taking his three children, removed to San Diego, where some four months later he was arrested and charged with the murder of his wife, upon information imparted to the arresting officers by his said daughter. He was brought to trial in Sacramento, where his daughter testified to the direct fact of having witnessed him shoot her mother and also to certain other facts having to do with his disposition of her body. The prosecution also produced at the trial a considerable amount of circumstantial evidence strongly pointing to the defendant's commission of the crime. The defendant did not take the witness stand in his own behalf, but rested his defense upon a statement given by him to the arresting officers shortly after his detention, in which he asserted his innocence of the crime. The jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree without recommendation. The defendant moved for a new trial upon several of the statutory grounds, which motion was upon the hearing thereon denied.

The appellant's first contention is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict of conviction, and in support thereof he presents certain criticisms of the testimony of the 10-year old daughter of the defendant, who was the only direct witness to the homicide, and which he insists would render her evidence unworthy of credence. He insists, for example, that the fact that this child, who, according to her testimony, had seen her mother murdered, did not reveal her dreadful secret until about four months after the date of its occurrence, and then only after she had witnessed a serious quarrel between her father and her still older sister, who at the time of the homicide was living in San Diego, renders most improbable the truth of the story which she then told her sister and later repeated upon the witness stand. The evidence, however, of the child discloses that the defendant, her father, directly after he had committed the crime had warned her not to tell of it or he would cut her throat. This, if believed by the jury, would supply an ample excuse for her silence, at least while living daily with her father and up to the time when the terrified child first saw a ray of hope through the rift occasioned by the quarrel between the murderer and her elder sister. The story which the child told of the homicide and of the actions and conduct of the defendant in disposing of his wife's dead body was consistent in its every detail, and coupled, as it was, with the other circumstances educed by the prosecution at the trial and which showed the sudden and entirely unexplained disappearance of the defendant's wife on the very night of the alleged crime, and taken in connection with the defendant's several lying statements regarding the whereabouts of his wife, supplies ample evidence justifying the verdict of conviction.

[2] The appellant further, and in this same connection, contends that there was not sufficient evidence of the corpus delicti. There seems to be an impression on the part of some that the term "corpus delicti" means "the body of the deceased," which it is insisted must be found and produced before a conviction of murder can be had. The rightful meaning of this term is "the body, the substance, the essential elements of the crime." People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 346, 347, 40 P. 440; 3 Rice on Evidence, 465-467.

[3] While it is true that the production and identification of the body of the deceased person, especially with the marks upon it indicating death by violence or by other unlawful means, would furnish a most direct and convincing form of evidence of the corpus delicti, it is not by any means an indispensable one, since, were it otherwise, the murderer by destroying or successfully concealing the body of his victim would render difficult, if not impossible, his conviction of the crime. Hence it is that proof of the corpus delicti is not confined to the production of the body of the alleged victim of the crime, but may consist in the direct evidence of eyewitnesses of the homicide, or even of circumstantial evidence sufficiently compelling to fix upon the defendant his complicity in the crime of murder. 3 Rice on Evidence, supra; Wharton on Homicide, § 637. The rule is well stated by the last author above cited wherein he relates instances of the human body being disposed of by fire, or boiled in potash or dissolved by acids, rendering it impossible that it should ever be produced, and concludes, "It is clear that in such cases the corpus delicti may be proved circumstantially or inferentially." If this be true, it follows that it may be proved by a direct eyewitness to the homicide; and this the prosecution in this case produced in the quite convincing testimony of the defendant's own child.

[4, 5] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court committed reversible error in relation to the order of proof, in that it permitted the introduction in evidence of certain alleged admissions of the defendant before the corpus delicti had been sufficiently established by other proof. This objection goes only, however, to the order of proof, and it has been a long established rule of criminal procedure in this state that the order of proof is a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and that its rulings thereon will not be disturbed except upon clear proof of an abuse of that discretion. People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 567; People v. Daniels, 105 Cal. 262, 38 P. 720; People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 P. 698; People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 240, 253, 63 P. 351; People v. Donnolly, 143 Cal. 398, 77 P. 177.

[6] The next contention of the appellant is that the district attorney was guilty of willful misconduct during the argument of the case, and that such misconduct constituted prejudicial error. An examination of the record discloses that these alleged acts of misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer arose out of the latter's quite frequent interruptions of the defendant's counsel while the latter was engaged in making his argument before the jury, and consisted in the insistence of the former that the latter was misstating the evidence, resulting in a series of heated controversies between counsel as to the state of the evidence, wherein the forensic victory lay now on the one side and again on the other, during which the court had frequent occasion to remind counsel to confine their discussions to the facts of the case. During the entire course of this rather unseemly controversy between counsel, no assignment of misconduct was made, and it is clear that under such a state of the record prejudicial error cannot be predicated upon the conduct of either counsel in the premises. Each must console himself with whatever his victories were in the verbal encounter.

The final contention of the appellant consists in his assertion, unsupported by either argument or authority, that the trial court committed reversible error in the giving of certain specified instructions. We are not directed, however, to the particular respect wherein it is claimed these instructions are erroneous, nor are we advised as to whether, even if so, they have not been corrected or rendered harmless by the other instructions given by the trial court. We do not discover any manifest error in these instructions. The instructions as given appear in each instance, save one, to be based upon a decision of this court or a section of the Penal Code supporting its correctness as a matter of law, and upon an examination of these we are satisfied that no prejudicial error was committed by the court in giving them and each of them to the jury. Upon the entire record herein it sufficiently appears that the defendant was guilty of the foul and brutal and unprovoked murder of his wife and of a most fiendish and apparently successful effort to destroy and dispose of her body. This being so, the verdict of the jury in this cause meets with the full approval of this court.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; SHENK, J.; SEAWELL, J.; CURTIS, J.; PRESTON, J.; LANGDON, J.

FALL RIVER VALLEY IRR. DIST. v. MT. SHASTA POWER CORPORATION.
(Sac. 3846.)★

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1927.

Rehearing Denied with Modification Oct. 1, 1927.

1. Waters and water courses ☞42—"Riparian right" entitles owner, subject to rights of other riparian owners, to use entire natural flow of stream, undiminished save by upper riparians or others having superior claim.

The "riparian right" is a vested property right entitled to same protection as any other right, and inhering in and a part and parcel of abutting lands, rather than gained by use or lost by disuse, and entitles the owner, subject to the correlative rights of other riparian owners, to use the entire ordinary and natural flow of the stream for all lawful riparian uses and to have the natural flow come to the land undiminished save by lawful uses of upper riparian owners or others who have obtained a superior claim to the water.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Riparian Right.]

2. Common law ☞11—Legislature can modify or abrogate rule of common law.

It is within the power of the Legislature to modify or abrogate a rule of common law.

3. Constitutional law ☞92—Legislature may not take vested property right from one person and invest it in another (Const. Cal. art. 1, §§ 13, 14; Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

Legislature may not take any portion of a vested property right from one person and invest it in another, in view of Const. Cal. art. 1, §§ 13, 14, and Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

4. Constitutional law ☞81—Particular use of private property cannot be prohibited under police power unless use reasonably threatens public health, safety, comfort, or welfare.

The police power will not justify the prohibition of a particular use of private property unless such use reasonably endangers or threatens the public health, safety, comfort, or welfare.

5. Constitutional law ☞93(1)—Waters and water courses ☞128—Statute authorizing appropriation of waters held invalid as concerns vested rights (Water Commission Act, § 11).

Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012) § 11, declaring that all waters flowing in any natural channel excepting so far as they are used or may be reasonably needed for useful and beneficial purposes on land riparian thereto or otherwise appropriated are public waters and subject to appropriation, held invalid as concerns riparian rights vested before enactment of Act of April 8, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 821), amending Civ. Code, § 1410.

6. Waters and water courses ☞130—Statute authorizing appropriation of waters held not to authorize permits to appropriate waters, where there was no surplus (Water Commission Act, § 11).

Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012) § 11, providing that all waters flowing in any natural channel excepting so far as they are used or may be reasonably needed, for useful or beneficial purposes on lands riparian thereto or otherwise appropriated are public waters subject to appropriation, held not to authorize permits to appropriate waters, where the court failed to find that the waters were not needed for power purposes and in fact found that there was no surplus of water.

7. Waters and water courses ☞139—Until mere appropriator obtains title by prescription, he is trespasser as against riparian owner.

As against a riparian owner, a mere appropriator of water is a trespasser until he obtains title by prescription.

8. Waters and water courses ☞80—Power company diverting stream through conduit over nonriparian land and through hydroelectric plant and returning water at lower point held within riparian rights.

Electric power corporation owning riparian land and rights which diverted the entire stream through a conduit through nonriparian lands to its hydroelectric plant and there used the water in the operation of the plant, and thereafter returned it to the stream at a lower point, held to be making a legitimate riparian use of the stream.

9. Eminent domain ☞317(1)—Condemnation of landowners' riparian rights was equivalent to consent to diversion of water at point above land conveyance through nonriparian land and return at point below land.

Where riparian rights of two landowners had been obliterated by condemnation, there was the equivalent of consent on their part to the diversion of water at a point above their lands through a conduit through nonriparian land to a hydroelectric plant and return to the stream at a point below their lands.

10. Waters and water courses ☞78—That power company by diverting stream through conduit to hydroelectric plant and returning it at lower point on stream could develop much electric power did not invalidate use.

Mere fact that riparian owner by diverting water from stream through conduit to hydroelectric plant and there using water in operation of plant and returning water to stream at lower point secured a 450-foot head of water and was enabled to develop a large amount of electric power held not to invalidate the use.

11. Waters and water courses ⚡78—Riparian owners might not prevent taking of water from stream above their land for use in hydroelectric plant and return below their land, where process had ripened into public use.

Where diversion of water through conduit to hydroelectric plant and use of water there and its return to the stream at a lower point had ripened into public use, riparian owners below the point of diversion and above the point of return might not enjoin or otherwise prevent the process.

12. Waters and water courses ⚡139—Intending appropriator of water might not attack right of lower riparian to use water for hydroelectric plant on grounds affecting still lower riparians.

Where plaintiff claimed as an upper intending appropriator of water, he might not attack right of lower riparian to divert water from the stream through a hydroelectric plant and return it at a lower point on objections which affected riparian owners below the point of diversion and above the point of return.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; C. J. Luttrell, Judge.

Action to determine water rights, brought by John F. Sheehan, Jr., for whom was substituted the Fall River Valley Irrigation District, against the Mount Shasta Power Corporation. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. Tillotson, of Redding (Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, and Barry S. Ulrich, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Wm. B. Bosley and Thos. J. Straub, both of San Francisco, and Chenoweth & Leininger, of Redding, for respondent.

Samuel C. Wiel, of San Francisco, amicus curiae.

PRESTON, J. The purpose of this action is to settle and determine the respective claims of plaintiff and defendant to the waters of Fall river in Shasta county. By its second amended and supplemental complaint plaintiff claims a right to the first continuous flow of said stream as against defendant to the extent of 240 cubic feet per second, basing said claim upon the provisions of two permits issued by the division of water rights of the state department of public works and hereinafter more fully described. Defendant by its amended answer denied the validity of both said permits; denied that on the 27th day of September, 1919, or thereafter, there was any water subject to appropriation flowing in said stream; and alleged its ownership of riparian rights and lands riparian to Fall river and Pit river below the points of diversion specified in said permits, its construction, ownership and operation of a hydroelectric power plant located upon said riparian lands, and its ownership of the right, qualified only by the correlative rights of other riparian owners, to divert and use, for the operation of its said power plant, all water naturally flowing in said Fall river.

The following is a brief outline of the facts, which are virtually undisputed, as found by the court:

Fall river, a nonnavigable natural stream or water course, whose sources are in the northwesterly part of Fall river valley in Shasta county, Cal., flows in a general southeasterly direction to its junction with Pit river at the village of Fall River Mills. Its natural flow is nearly constant, varying but little throughout the year, the average flow being approximately 1,400 cubic feet per second and the maximum flow approximately 1,800 cubic feet per second. No evidence was offered tending to show it has ever overflowed its banks. Its principal tributary is Tule river, whose main sources are in the northerly part of Fall river valley. Pit river rises in the northeasterly part of the state and flows in a general southwesterly direction past defendant's power plant to its junction with the Sacramento river.

On the said 27th day of September, 1919, Guy T. Wayman applied to the state water commission of the state of California for a permit to divert water from said Fall river at a point on the southerly or right bank thereof for the purpose of irrigating 4,320 acres of nonriparian agricultural land situated in Fall river valley. On the 19th day of June, 1920, he applied for a similar permit to divert water at a point on the easterly or left bank of said river for the purpose of irrigating 15,680 acres of nonriparian agricultural land situated in said valley.

On August 10, 1921, two permits, numbered 898 and 899, respectively, granting said applications, "subject to vested rights," were issued to him "as trustee for an irrigation district, mutual water company, or other legal entity authorized by law to carry on the work of diversion and distribution of water, such legal entity to be composed of the owners of land to be served under this permit as issued or as modified hereafter * * * said trustee to transfer and assign all rights under this permit to said legal entity as soon as possible after its organization." Said permits provided that actual construction work should begin on or before November 1, 1921; that it should be completed on or before November 1, 1923, and complete application of the water to the proposed use should be made on or before July 1, 1924. The said permits were thereafter duly recorded. The times specified therein within which to commence construction work and apply said waters to the beneficial use of irrigating said lands were extended by the division of water rights from time to time up to the 1st day of January, 1926.

On November 29, 1921, said Guy T. Wayman duly assigned all his right, title, and interest in and to said permits to John F. Sheehan, Jr., the original plaintiff in this action. Complaint was filed by him on June 21, 1922. On July 10, 1922, the Fall River Valley irrigation district was duly organized under the laws of the state of California as an irrigation district. On August 9, 1922, said John F. Sheehan, Jr., duly assigned all his right, title and interest in and to said permits to said Fall River Valley irrigation district, and said district was duly substituted as plaintiff herein on October 20, 1922.

The court found that the said Fall River Valley irrigation district was formed by the owners of the lands for whose benefit said permits were issued, and in order to carry out the conditions set forth therein; that it had acquired by grant from Scott McArthur, in October, 1922, and was at all times thereafter the owner of the right to use said lands at the points on said Fall river specified in the aforesaid permits for purposes of appropriation, and also for construction, maintenance and operation of diversion works; that said district consisted of two separate divisions or parcels of land totaling in area 13,000 acres, all of which were susceptible of reasonable and economical irrigation; that 130 cubic feet of water per second flowing continuously was the maximum amount of water reasonably required for such irrigation; that said lands were of no value except for agricultural purposes; that neither said district nor either of its predecessors, Wayman and Sheehan, had ever commenced or caused to be commenced actual construction work for the purpose of diverting or appropriating any part of the waters of said Fall river under the authority of either of the aforesaid permits or otherwise.

The court further found that all lands upon which the points of diversion specified in said permits were located and practically all lands riparian to Fall river, from a place several miles above the uppermost point of diversion to the junction of Fall and Pit rivers, also, all lands riparian to Pit river from its junction with Fall river down to a point below defendant's power house, were held in private ownership and were not public lands of the state or the United States; that plaintiff had never owned any part of the lands riparian to Fall or Tule rivers and did not own any riparian right to the waters of Fall river.

On the contrary, the court found defendant to be the owner and in possession of the bed and banks of Fall river and of all lands riparian thereto between a point some distance above its diversion dam hereinafter mentioned and the junction of Fall river with Pit river, and also to be the owner of the bed and banks of Pit river and all lands riparian thereto between a point some distance above the junction of said river with Fall river and a point some distance below defendant's power plant, with the exception of two tracts, from the owners of which defendant had acquired by condemnation proceedings their riparian rights to the use of the waters of said Fall river.

It further found that defendant, being the owner of the riparian lands and riparian rights aforesaid, had constructed a diversion dam and all necessary works in the bed and banks of said Fall river on said riparian lands for the purpose of diverting into an aqueduct all of the water naturally flowing in said river; that it had also constructed said aqueduct, extending from said dam to and through its power house and thence to the channel of Pit river; also, that it had constructed said power house, by means of which substantially all of the water naturally flowing in Fall river is used for the generation of electric power; that the greater part of said aqueduct is on lands of respondent which are not riparian to either Fall river or Pit river, but said power house is on lands riparian to Pit river; that the construction of said plant was commenced about June 1, 1920, completed in September, 1922, and has been in operation continuously since November 1, 1922, using substantially all of the water naturally flowing in Fall river at the site of its said dam and discharging all of said water so used into Pit river before it leaves defendant's land.

The court found that defendant acquired part of its aforesaid riparian lands and riparian rights prior to September 27, 1919, and the remainder between that date and November 1, 1922, said lands having previously been owned in severalty by approximately 40 different proprietors; that at no time either before or after September 27, 1919, had any of the water of said Fall river been appropriated, diverted, or used by any persons except owners of lands riparian thereto, but that it had been diverted and used by such riparian owners, a small hydroelectric power plant having been in operation near the junction of Pit and Fall rivers prior to the above date, which plant was acquired by defendant on June 30, 1920.

The court also found that no appropriations had ever been made, under sections 1410 to 1422 of the Civil Code, or under the Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012), of any of the waters of said stream. The court also found that:

"For a long time prior to and on the 27th day of September, 1919, and at all times thereafter until on or about the 30th day of September, 1922, when the defendant herein began its diversion of water from said Fall river for the operation of its said power plant, the water flowing in Fall river, at each of the points of diversion specified in the aforesaid applications and permits and thence in the channel of said Fall river to its junction with Pit river and thence in the channel of Pit river to and beyond the place where the tailrace of defendant's said power plant discharges into said Pit river, exceeded by more than 240 cubic feet per second, not only all amounts then being actually diverted or used by riparian owners and appropriators for beneficial purposes, but also the total amount of water reasonably required by all riparian owners and appropriators for irrigation, watering live stock, and domestic use upon all lands riparian either to said Fall river or to said Pit river between the upper of the two points of diversion specified in the aforesaid applications and permits and the place where defendant's tailrace discharges into said Pit river."

Lastly, it found that all of the waters naturally flowing in Fall river and its tributaries were and had been since January 1, 1919, reasonably needed for useful and beneficial purposes upon lands riparian thereto, and more particularly upon the aforesaid lands owned by defendant riparian to Fall and Pit rivers; that after commencement of operation of defendant's said power plant in 1922 substantially all of such waters were actually used for a useful and beneficial purpose, to wit, generation of electric power.

From its findings the court concluded that said permits were not void because issued to a trustee for an irrigation district thereafter to be organized, or because plaintiff and its predecessors failed to commence construction work within the time specified therein, but that they were both void and of no force or effect by reason of the fact that no part of the water naturally flowing in Fall river below a point several miles upstream from the upper point of diversion specified in said permits or of the water naturally flowing in Pit river between its junction with Fall river and a point below the outlet of defendant's said aqueduct was or at any time since January 1, 1919, had been public water of the state of California subject to appropriation under the provisions of the "Water Commission Act"; that plaintiff did not own any vested or inchoate right to take or divert water from Fall river, but that defendant was the owner and in possession of the vested right, qualified only by correlative rights of other riparian owners to use all water naturally flowing in said Fall river upon its lands riparian thereto and to Pit river for all lawful purposes, including the production of electric energy by means of its said hydroelectric plant.

With findings such as appear above and the act of June 16, 1913, to apply thereto, appellant claims to have secured from the natural flow of Fall river a definite and integral portion thereof to the extent of 130 cubic feet per second. The consequence of the doctrine thus contended for would, in our opinion, be a limitation upon the riparian right by fixing a definite amount of the natural and usual flow of the river which may be sequestered therefrom and given to non-riparian proprietors under a system of permits operated under state authority. The quality of the riparian right would thus be changed by taking from it elasticity and relativity and substituting therefor an inflexible limitation beyond which the right may not extend. Variable factors, such as yield of the stream, variation in the relative and correlative needs of the proprietors, would no longer be controlling. After a definite amount of water has been taken, the right to regain it would be lost to the riparian owner. The title in the appropriator or permittee would be good and valid, subject only to forfeiture by failure for a given period to use the water, as is now the case of any other prescriptive right. No errors as to needs or potential needs of the riparian proprietor may be corrected under this system. This change it is claimed may be legally effected by defining the riparian right to be a mere rule of property and not a vested estate.

It is only fair to counsel to say that since the filing of the briefs in this action we have given the subject of riparian rights our serious consideration in the case of Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Co. et al. (Cal. Sup.) 252 P. 607. In fact, at varying intervals during the past 77 years in the history of this state, the doctrine of riparian rights, as we conceive it to be, has withstood determined assaults, similar to if not identical with the one here made. At no time has there been any uncertainty as to the ingredients, quality, or strength of the right. On the faith of the doctrine practically all valuable land titles in this state have passed into private ownership. In Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Co. et al., supra, we re-examined the question and pronounced the riparian right a vested one.

The facts presented in the case at bar give perhaps as clear a picture as could possibly be found of the exterior limitations of the right. Fall river is a constant stream. It is but little influenced by either rainfall or melting snows. It has an underground source, which is practically constant. There is no overflow of its banks during any period of the year. There are, therefore, no "storm," "fresnet," "flood," "vagrant," or "enemy" waters in it, and hence no waters in which the riparian right does not inhere.

Appellant in this case has neither the right of a riparian proprietor nor that of an appropriator of the stream. It claims merely an inchoate right derived from permits issued by the state of California to appropriate waters of the stream "subject to vested rights." It has so far reduced no water or water right to its possession.

As against this claim, we have respondent, a large power company, espousing the cause of the riparian owner. It claims no more for itself than it concedes to the smallest and humblest proprietor on the stream. Within less than 10 years after the passage of said statute, it has constructed a hydroelectric plant upon its riparian lands, and since November 1, 1922, it has actually used the entire yield of the stream by passing it through its said generating plant and producing thereby electric energy which has been and is now being consumed in various portions of the state by the public generally. No effort has been made by it to reservoir or otherwise unreasonably or illegally detain the waters nor to divert them to nonriparian land or to otherwise use them for nonriparian purposes. Here, indeed, there is no question as to the relative rights to the underflow or overflow of the stream. No complaint can be made that the riparian owner is greedy or selfish in wanting the entire hydraulic effect of the stream to "boost" to its own lands the small amount of water required for irrigation or domestic purposes. In short, respondent has upon its own riparian land put the whole of said stream to a recognized beneficial use. Upon what logical basis can we defend our position should we declare the right to take away the whole or any part of this riparian right, or, if our power to do so be conceded, where shall we begin and to what extent may we go?

[1] To curtail the right by a fixation of rigid and inelastic boundaries is to destroy the right altogether, for in such case it would become a mere right of priority, or, in other words, it would be tantamount to the substitution of the doctrine of appropriation for the doctrine of riparian rights. A re-examination of the nature of the riparian right in the light of the facts of this case leaves us entirely satisfied with our previous pronouncements upon this subject. We therefore here reassert the riparian right to be a vested property right inhering in and a part and parcel of the abutting lands—a right not gained by use or lost by disuse—a right (qualified only by the correlative rights of other riparian proprietors) to use the entire ordinary and natural flow of the stream for all lawful riparian uses and also to have all such flow come down to the land undiminished other than by the lawful uses by upper riparian proprietors or by the rights of those who have otherwise obtained a superior claim to the use of a portion of the stream. This right to use the water of the stream we hold to be entitled to the same respect and protection at the hands of the law as any other vested property right.

Admittedly there has been a persistent policy on the part of the legislative department of this state to curtail in some way this riparian right in favor of nonriparian proprietors. In fact, an extra session of the Legislature of the state was called in the summer of 1886, following the decision in Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 P. 919, 10 P. 674, on April 26, 1886. The object of this extra session was to consider what should be done in the promotion of the common weal to offset the declarations of this court made in said case, upholding the doctrine of riparian rights in practically the same form as we now have it. Nothing resulted from the deliberations of the Legislature on that occasion. Agitation of the same character was unsuccessfully urged upon the court in 1909, when this court, in Miller & Lux v. Madera Canal & Irrigation Co., 155 Cal. 59, 65, 99 P. 502, 512, met the contention that the riparian right was but a mere rule of policy by saying:

"But the riparian owners have a right to have the stream flow past their land in its usual course, and this right, so far as it is of regular occurrence and beneficial to their land is, as we have frequently said, a right of property, 'a parcel of the land itself.' Neither a court nor the Legislature has the right to say that because such water may be more beneficially used by others it may be freely taken by them. Public policy is at best a vague and uncertain guide, and no consideration of policy can justify the taking of private property without compensation. If the higher interests of the public should be thought to require that the water usually flowing in streams of this state should be subject to appropriation in ways that will deprive the riparian proprietor of its benefit, the change sought must be accomplished by the use of the power of eminent domain."

An assault equally vigorous was made upon said doctrine in the case of Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Company, supra, and, as above stated, we again re-examined the question and gave the response above noted.

We have no means of ascertaining which of the two systems, appropriation or riparian rights, would have been the wiser for California to have adopted in the beginning. Certainly, a comparison of the progress of this state with the progress of other western states, which have applied the doctrine of appropriation, does not furnish proof of a lack of wisdom on the part of the first Legislature of California which, after the closest and most earnest investigation, adopted the rule of the American common law in this state, which had as one of its tenets the riparian right essentially as we now declare it to be (Appendix, 1 Cal. pp. 588-604).

It must here be observed that all the riparian lands between respondent's point of diversion and point of return passed into private ownership prior to April 8, 1911. This statement is also true as to the riparian lands between appellant's uppermost point of intended diversion and the diversion dam of respondent, except one 40-acre tract. The riparian right of respondent vested, therefore, before any of the legislation beginning with the amendment of April 8, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 821) to section 1410 of the Civil Code and ending with the Act of June 16, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1012), which act was held up by referendum and did not go into effect until December, 1914. Section 11 of said act, in so far as here involved, reads:

"* * * And all waters flowing in any river, stream, canyon, ravine or other natural channel, excepting so far as such waters have been or are being applied to useful and beneficial purpose upon, or in so far as such waters are or may be reasonably needed for useful and beneficial purposes upon lands riparian thereto, or otherwise appropriated, is and are hereby declared to be public waters of the state of California and subject to appropriation in accordance with the provisions of this act. If any portion of the waters of any stream shall not be put to a useful or beneficial purpose to or upon lands riparian to such stream for any continuous period of ten consecutive years after the passage of this act, such nonapplication shall be deemed to be conclusive presumption that the use of such portions of the waters of such stream is not needed upon said riparian lands for any useful or beneficial purpose; and such portion of the waters of any stream so nonapplied, unless otherwise appropriated for a useful and beneficial purpose, is hereby declared to be in the use of the state and subject to appropriation in accordance with the provisions of this act."

[2, 3] As an exercise of the police power of the state it is claimed that this act may operate upon the riparian rights of proprietors on Fall river so as to transfer to appellant at least 130 cubic feet per second constant flow from the usual and natural flow of the stream. The total invalidity of this provision of the statute as such is really not contended for by respondent. It is a misconception of the case of Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Company, supra, to say that it was there held that said provision was in complete conflict with the state or federal Constitutions in any particular. The holding was that under the facts of that case the stream carried during the season in question no waters in which the riparian right did not inhere and also that respondents were making a beneficial use of the entire ordinary and natural flow of said stream as it flowed along, across and over their said lands. No question can arise as to the power of the Legislature to modify or abrogate a rule of the common law. The question is: Can any such change affect the previously vested rights of property owners? We need here only say that the legislative department of the state may not take any portion of a vested property right from one person and invest another with it and be justified in so doing in view of the provisions of sections 13 and 14 of article I of the state Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

[4] In Stone v. Kendall (Tex. Civ. App.) 268 S. W. 759, the court said:

"Since the right of a citizen to use his property as he chooses, so long as he harms nobody, is an inherent and constitutional right, the police power cannot be invoked to prohibit a particular use of private property, unless such use reasonably endangers or threatens the public health, safety, comfort, or welfare."

In the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 154 U. S. 362, 399, 14 S. Ct. 1047, 1055 (38 L. Ed. 1031), the court said:

"In every Constitution is the guarantee against the taking of private property for public purposes without just compensation. The equal protection of the laws which, by the Fourteenth Amendment, no state can deny to the individual, forbids legislation, in whatever form it may be enacted, by which the property of one individual is, without compensation, wrested from him for the benefit of another, or of the public. This, as has been often observed, is a government of law, and not a government of men, and it must never be forgotten that under such a government, with its constitutional limitations and guarantees, the forms of law and the machinery of government, with all their reach and power, must in their actual workings stop on the hither side of the unnecessary and uncompensated taking or destruction of any private property, legally acquired and legally held."

To the same effect, see Coal & Coke Ry. Co. v. Conley and Avis, 67 W. Va. 129, 188, 67 S. E. 613; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31, 5 S. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U. S. 540, 559, 22 S. Ct. 431, 46 L. Ed. 679; and Cotting v. Kansas City Stockyards Co., 183 U. S. 79, 87, 22 S. Ct. 30, 46 L. Ed. 92, in which latter case the above quotation is cited with approval. This was our view when considering section 1410 of the Civil Code, as amended, which section is much akin to section 11 of the Act of June 16, 1913. See Palmer v. Railroad Commission of California, 167 Cal. 163, 175, 138 P. 997, and City of San Bernardino v. City of Riverside, 186 Cal. 7, 198 P. 784.

[5] We are by no means intending to say that riparian rights may not under proper circumstances yield to the police power in the interest of public health, safety, comfort, or welfare, but the Act of June 16, 1913, does not purport to be an exercise of such power for any purpose nor do the facts in the present case give rise to a situation where the police power may operate. See Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Company, supra, where we said:

"If the state were here essaying to uphold an effort on its part to work out impartially, unselfishly and in the interests of the whole people some general plan or system for the equitable adjustment of rights and uses in its flowing streams with a view to the conservation, development, and distribution of the dynamic forces and generative and fertilizing fructibilities of their waters, it might well be argued that public policy, public interest, and a most liberal interpretation of the police powers of the state might rightfully be invoked in support of such an effort. But can the same be properly said or claimed in a case wherein one or many privately owned and operated institutions, organized primarily for personal and private gain, and only incidentally and secondarily assuming to act in the public interest and welfare, are engaged in controversies in the courts with other private individuals or associations over the asserted and disputed property rights and interests of each of the respective parties to such controversies? We do not feel called upon in this case to so declare."

See, also, dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Burnett in the case of In re Hood River, 119 Or. 312, 227 P. 1065.

[6] We, therefore, hold the said provision of the Act of June 16, 1913, to be inoperative to the aid of appellant or the injury of respondent. Moreover, assuming the said statute, and every portion thereof, to be valid and at the same time to be applicable to water rights which vested prior to its passage, it does not and cannot avail appellant to infuse life into the permits here under consideration in view of the particular facts found by the court in this case. For it must be carefully noted that the court here did not find the existence of surplus water to any extent in this stream. It found only that the amount used and the amount reasonably required by all riparian owners and appropriators "for irrigation, watering live stock, and domestic use" was less than the product of the stream by more than 240 cubic feet per second. This finding, it will be noted, ignores absolutely the use of the ordinary flow of the stream for power purposes, an ancient and well-known riparian use. This use is declared in Mentone Irr. Co. v. Redlands Electric Light & Power Co., 155 Cal. 323, 327, 100 P. 1082, 1083, as follows:

"The use of the water in its passage through his land to operate a power plant thereon is as clearly within his rights as is his right to operate a mill thereon with which to grind grain or to operate any other machinery, than which there is no more ancient or well-established feature of riparian rights."

Indeed, the court not only did not find a general surplus of water in said stream, but specifically found that:

"All of the waters naturally flowing in said Fall river and in the tributaries thereof are, and ever since January 1, 1919, have been, reasonably needed for useful and beneficial purposes upon lands riparian thereto, and, more particularly, upon the aforesaid lands owned by the defendant as aforesaid, which are riparian to said Fall river and to said Pit river; and, ever since the construction and completion of defendant's said dam, aqueduct and power plant and the commencement of the operation thereof by the defendant in the autumn of 1922, substantially all of such waters, except only such parts thereof as have actually been diverted or used by the owners of lands riparian to said Fall river and its said tributaries above or upstream from the site of defendant's aforesaid dam, have actually been used by the defendant for a useful and beneficial purpose, to wit, the generation of electric power, as hereinbefore stated."

[7] We have proceeded thus far upon the assumption that respondent was making a lawful riparian use of the stream. We have not overlooked the contention of appellant that such is not the case. We have thus ignored the claim because respondent is admittedly the owner of large areas of riparian land below the places of intended diversion by appellant under its permits for appropriation. Conceding to respondent no greater rights than could be enjoyed by the smallest riparian proprietor on the stream, we have reached the conclusion announced above for it is possible that any number of riparian owners upon said stream could and might want to use the normal flow of said stream for mill power or other purposes. Then, too, we must give effect to our own decisions pronouncing that a mere appropriator, until he obtains title by prescription, is, as against the right of a riparian owner, a trespasser. The case of Pabst v. Finmand, 190 Cal. 124, 132, 211 P. 11, 14, involved a controversy over an alleged claim by appropriation as against a claim by virtue of ownership of riparian lands situated below the point of diversion. The court said:

"As to a nonriparian owner the riparian owner is under no duty to share the waters of the creek and the slightest use by such nonriparian owner diminishes to some extent the flow of the stream."

In the case of Duckworth v. Watsonville Water & Light Co., 150 Cal. 520, 89 P. 338, we held that every owner of land upon a stream had the right to insist that the water as it passed his land should not be "diminished from use by other riparian owners above so as to deprive him of his just portion, and perhaps, as to other than riparian owners, the right to prevent any substantial diminution of the amount of water which would naturally flow to his land."

In the case of Anaheim Union Water Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 327, 88 P. 978, plaintiffs, as riparian owners, sued to enjoin defendants from diverting water from the Santa Ana river at a point above their riparian lands. The court said:

"Here the defendants were not, with respect to the land irrigated, riparian owners, but were trespassers on plaintiffs' property rights from the beginning. * * *"

In the case of Huffner v. Sawday, 153 Cal. 86, 91, 94 P. 424, 426, the court said:

"Even if these plaintiffs [riparian landowners] had never made any use of the water flowing past their land, they had the right to have it continue in its customary flow, subject to such diminution as might result from reasonable use by other riparian proprietors. This is a right of property, a 'part and parcel' of the land itself [citing the Duckworth Case, supra].
* * *

In the case of Davis v. Martin, 157 Cal. 657, 108 P. 866, 867, it was held that "the riparian rights attaching to said lands by reason of this contiguity were paramount to the rights of any appropriator," and in Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Miller & Lux, Inc., 183 Cal. 71, 85, 190 P. 433, 439, that the "right of each riparian proprietor as against appropriators, extends to the entire stream."

[8] But under the doctrine of the cases of Turner v. James Canal Co., 155 Cal. 82, 99 P. 520, and Mentone Irr. Co. v. Redlands Electric Light & Power Co., supra, it must be held that respondent is making a legitimate riparian use of the stream by the construction and operation of its hydroelectric plant in the manner set forth in the findings herein, and the fact that the tunnel or conduits may be through or across nonriparian lands is immaterial. In Turner v. James Canal Co., supra, defendant, as a riparian owner of lands on Fresno slough, claimed the right to take for irrigation of said lands a reasonable quantity of the water of San Joaquin river at the head of its canal on the river, and to carry said water through the canal over the intervening nonriparian land to the land on the slough. The court said:

"The fact that it must carry the water from the river over intervening nonriparian lands, belonging to other persons, is of no consequence. The person over whose land it is carried could object, of course, but other riparian owners have no privy with such third person, and cannot avail themselves of his rights. So long as the riparian owner takes no more than his reasonable share and uses it upon his riparian land, without unreasonable waste, other riparian owners below have no right to inquire, how, or by what means, or at what place, he manages to divert his share from the stream, whether at a point on his land, or at some point far above, where the elevation of the stream will be sufficient to carry it by gravity to the surface of his land, or whether by a dam and headgate, or by pumps and buckets. This principle was practically decided in Charnock v. Higuerra, 111 Cal. 479, 44 P. 171, 32 L. R. A. 190; 52 Am. St. Rep. 195, and Rose v. Mesmer, 142 Cal. 329, 75 P. 905."

In Mentone Irr. Co. v. Redlands Electric Light & Power Co., supra, the court held:

"The power company, being the owner of the riparian land, has the full right to use the water in its natural course on its land for that purpose. It has also the right, if it is more convenient and effective so to do, to turn it out of its natural channel at the upper end of its possessions, carry it in an artificial channel over the land, use it for generating power thereon, and turn it back into the stream within its lands below, provided such interference with natural conditions does not unduly injure others who have rights in the water. Gould on Waters, § 213; Farnham on Waters, § 495, p. 1645."

[9-11] The fact that the riparian rights of the two landowners intervening between the point of diversion and point of return have been obliterated by condemnation is certainly the equivalent of consent within the meaning of the doctrine in Turner v. James Canal Co., supra, and the case is as though all landowners below had consented to the upper diversion. The fact that thereby the respondent has secured a 450-foot head and been enabled to develop a large amount of electric energy in no way detracts from the legality of the process. Then, too, as against all riparian owners between the point of diversion and point of return of the waters to the stream, a public use has intervened and a cause of action would not lie in them to enjoin or prevent respondent from making the use it now makes of the stream. See Miller & Lux v. Enterprise Canal & Land Co., 169 Cal. 415, 147 P. 567, and other cases.

[12] It is hard to conceive, therefore, that appellant, claiming as an upper intending appropriator, can have any standing to urge the objections which have not been made and, indeed, which have been lost by the riparian owners, if any there be, who are affected by this diversion above them. We therefore hold that appellant is without legal standing to urge a claim as to the use of these waters on the part of respondent.

These views compel affirmation of the judgment, and it is so ordered.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LANGDON, J.

SHENK, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment for the reason that the evidence showed and the court found (1) that all of the waters naturally flowing in Fall river and its tributaries are and ever since January 1, 1919 (a point of time antedating the applications of the plaintiff's predecessors in interest), have been reasonably needed for useful and beneficial purposes upon the lands riparian thereto, and more particularly upon the lands owned by the defendant which constitute all of the riparian lands between the defendant's point of diversion and its power plant and which riparian lands or rights the defendant had acquired by purchase or condemnation; and (2) that substantially all of said waters, except only such parts thereof as have been diverted or used by the owners of lands riparian to Fall river above the defendant's diversion dam, have, since the autumn of 1922, actually been put to a reasonably useful and beneficial purpose. The court was therefore justified in concluding that no portions of such waters were "public waters of the state of California" at the time the applications for said permits were made. No question of the validity of section 11 of the Water Commission Act may properly arise in this case for the obvious reason that under the express provisions of that section, waters flowing in any river or stream which "are or may be reasonably needed for useful and beneficiary purposes upon lands riparian thereto," are excepted from the waters which are declared by the act to be "public waters of the state" and subject to appropriation under provisions of the act. Nor had the ten-year period after the effective date of the act, also prescribed by section 11, expired when the defendant commenced the construction of its works.

It is apparently conceded in the main opinion that the riparian right may yield to the proper exercise of the police power in the interests of the people of the state, but it is asserted that the Water Commission Act does not purport to be an exercise of such power for any purpose. To this assertion I cannot accede. It was the obvious purpose of section 11 of the act to subject the exercise of the riparian right to the reasonable use of the waters of the stream and to declare in the interests of the people of the state that the use of all waters shall be restricted to that which is reasonable and useful for a beneficial purpose, whether the user be a riparian owner or an appropriator. The right of the riparian owner to the full use of the waters of the stream in so far as the same may be put to a reasonably useful and beneficial purpose, may not be abridged. The result of the main opinion, however, is to further entrench such owner in what may be entirely unreasonable demands—a result which the Water Commission Act was plainly and properly designed to avoid.

A situation is presented in this case which was not intended to be affected or disturbed by the Water Commission Act in the exercise of the police power. Such being the fact, it would seem to require no argument or citation of authority to support the right of the defendant as riparian owner to the full enjoyment of the reasonably beneficial use to which the waters of the stream are put. The said permits were in fact issued "subject to vested rights." All discussion in the main opinion in defense of riparian rights and as to the scope of the police power applicable to the exercise of such rights, is, therefore, under present law, in my opinion, entirely outside of the issues necessary to be determined in this case on the record presented and is uncalled for except, perhaps, in justification of the opinion of a majority of the court in the Herminghaus Case, concerning which I have had occasion to express my views.

MECHLER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5943.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 7, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 6, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 2, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨106—Trial court's determination as to jury trial is appealable.

Determination of trial court as to whether or not the parties to an action are entitled to a trial by jury can be reviewed on direct appeal from the judgment.

2. Mandamus ⇨4(3)—Mandamus will not lie to require court to allow jury trial, remedy being by appeal.

Whether or not parties are entitled to a jury trial is a question within the jurisdiction of the trial court, for error in the determination of which there is a remedy by appeal, and a writ of mandate will not be issued to compel trial court to grant a jury trial.

3. Jury ⇨28(10)—Party does not waive right to jury trial by going to trial without one after objection.

A party does not waive a right to a trial by jury by going to trial without one after objection, since the matter can be reviewed upon a direct appeal from the judgment.

Application for writ of mandate by Berneita Mechler, a minor, by Nora Mechler, her guardian ad litem, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Alameda, and Hon. Warren V. Tryon, Acting and Presiding Judge of Department 2 thereof, to require respondents to proceed with the trial of a certain cause. Writ denied.

Dunn, White & Aiken, Henry C. Reynolds, and W. M. Nold, all of Oakland, for petitioner.

J. E. Reardon and Benj. F. Curtaz, both of San Francisco, and Enid Childs, of Berkeley, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Application for peremptory writ of mandate, directing respondent court and the honorable judge thereof to proceed with the hearing and determination of a certain cause. The petition is filed on behalf of Berneita Mechler, a minor, by Nora Mechler, her guardian ad litem, and it recites in substance that on or about the 30th day of March, 1927, the said minor, through her guardian, instituted an action against one Grace R. Luther and others seeking to recover alleged damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff through the alleged negligent operation by defendant Grace R. Luther of a certain automobile in the city of Oakland, on or about October 16, 1926. Upon issue being joined, notice of motion to set the cause for trial was duly made, served, and filed. The parties appeared in court by counsel when the case called to be set, at which time, according to the answer here filed on behalf of respondents, plaintiff's counsel waived a jury trial, and defendant, both orally and in writing, demanded one. Thereupon, on the same day, the court hearing the motion made an order transferring the case to the jury department of said court for trial where it was placed upon the calendar. Thereafter, the attorneys for defendant filed a written waiver of jury trial and subsequently served notice of this fact upon plaintiff.

The case having been reached upon the jury calendar, plaintiff appeared and demanded that trial proceed before a jury. The court, being of the opinion that plaintiff had, by his acts, waived a jury trial, denied the application and retransferred the cause to the nonjury department. Petitioner thereupon filed the present application in this court which is one for a writ of mandate directing the respondent superior court and the judge thereof to set aside the order retransferring the cause from the jury department to the nonjury department, and to proceed to trial before a jury. We are of the opinion that mandate is not the appropriate remedy to test plaintiff's alleged right.

[1-3] The question as to whether or not the parties to an action are entitled to a trial jury is a question of law which the trial court has jurisdiction to hear and determine, for error in the determination of which the party aggrieved has a sufficient remedy by appeal, and a writ of mandate will not be issued to compel the trial court to grant a jury trial. Donohue v. Superior Court, 93 Cal. 252, 28 P. 1043; Widney v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 258 P. 416. A party does not waive a right to a trial by jury by going to trial without one after objection, as the question can be reviewed upon a direct appeal from the judgment. In re Robinson, 106 Cal. 493, 39 P. 862.

The petition is denied.

KEEFER v. KEEFER. (Civ. 5812.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 8, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 7, 1927.

1. Divorce ⚡68—Whether separation was desertion was immaterial, since barred as ground for divorce by statute of limitations (Civ. Code, §§ 98, 124).

On cross-complaint for divorce in support and maintenance proceeding, whether a separation 12 years before was a desertion within Civ. Code, § 98, was immaterial, since the lapse of time had barred it as a cause of divorce, under section 124.

2. Appeal and error ⚡837(4)—Plaintiff's request that court note scope of denials and admissions of pleadings should be made in trial court, not in reviewing court.

Where, in a wife's support and maintenance action, she requested the reviewing court to note carefully the scope of denials and the admissions of pleadings, held, that such request should have been made in the trial court, not in the reviewing court.

3. Divorce ⚡127(3)—Statute does not require each specification of extreme cruelty to be corroborated.

On the hearing of defendant's cross-complaint for divorce on ground of extreme cruelty, held, that the statute does not require each specification of cruelty to be corroborated.

4. Divorce ⚡184(12)—Finding for defendant on cross-complaint for divorce for cruelty, makes immaterial court's finding in his favor on other ground barred by statute of limitations.

Where defendant in his cross-complaint for divorce, in wife's suit for separate maintenance, pleaded a cause of action based on cruelty, and findings were made in his favor, held immaterial that findings also were made in his favor on a cause of action for desertion which had become barred by the statute of limitations.

5. Divorce ⚡152—In wife's action for support, determination of property rights in interlocutory decree did not render decree void.

In wife's action for support and maintenance wherein husband cross-complained for divorce, the fact that the court determined the property rights of the parties in the interlocutory decree did not render the decree void.

6. Divorce ⚡184(12)—In support and maintenance action by wife, trial court's determination of property rights in interlocutory decree was not ground for reversal, not being prejudicial.

In action by a wife for support and maintenance wherein husband cross-complained for divorce, the fact that the trial court in its interlocutory decree determined property rights of parties was not ground for reversal, not being prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Katherine Keefer against Adolph C. Keefer for support and maintenance, in which defendant interposed a cross-complaint for divorce. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel H. Jones, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to obtain a decree for permanent support and maintenance. She pleaded in the first cause of action the extreme cruelty of the defendant. In the second cause of action she pleaded his desertion of her on the 15th day of May, 1922. Thereupon she prayed for a division of the community property and for $150 per month for her permanent maintenance. The defendant appeared and filed an answer, in which he denied the charges of the plaintiff, and, in addition to his answer, he interposed a cross-complaint for divorce based on (1) the extreme cruelty of the plaintiff, and (2) her desertion of him in the year 1908. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint and a trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the defendant and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

From evidence introduced and not controverted it appears that the plaintiff and defendant intermarried in 1897; that there was born as the issue of the marriage a daughter who is now an adult of the age of 26 years or more. The husband and wife quarreled from time to time. The husband's business was that of a furrier and as such he was employed by different employers in the East. It was his contention that his wife was jealous of him and his attentions to the ladies who patronized the stores in which he was employed and that she so conducted herself that he lost his employment or was compelled to change his employment from time to time until the year 1910, when he was about to engage in business for himself. At that time the plaintiff stated to her husband's business associates that, if the business arrangement were made, she would cause the business to be disrupted. Fearing that result the associates withdrew from the proposed business arrangement and when the facts were brought to the attention of the defendant he separated from the plaintiff and came to California. That separation was so hostile that thereafter they never communicated with each other except through their daughter or the attorneys of the respective parties. When he arrived in California he took employment under Louis Gassner, a furrier doing business in San Francisco. From time to time he made remittances to his wife and daughter, who remained in the East. Such remittances continued until 1921, when the plaintiff came to California. She arrived here July 19, 1921, without previously notifying the defendant that she was coming. The next day the daughter called on the defendant and some time during the same day the defendant and the plaintiff met as strangers in the lobby of one of the hotels in San Francisco. The details of that meeting are not in evidence. That the meeting was in no sense agreeable would appear from the fact that on the 25th of August, 1921, the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to obtain a decree of separate maintenance. The defendant continued to make certain payments for the support of his wife and daughter, but they continued to live separate and apart. Conversations were held between their respective representatives looking toward a property settlement between the husband and wife. Those conversations led to no results. Finally, on the 9th day of July, 1923, this action was commenced.

[1] From the foregoing facts it is clear that the second cause of action pleaded in the plaintiff's complaint and in which she alleged desertion on the part of the defendant on the 15th day of May, 1922, has no particle of evidence to support it, but desertion, if it occurred at all, took place as early as the year 1910. The defendant, among other things, contends that the separation in the East showed a desertion on the part of the plaintiff as desertion is defined in section 98 of the Civil Code. However, the defendant admits that as a ground for divorce the act of the plaintiff is barred by the statute of limitations. Civ. Code, § 124.

[2] The first count pleaded in the plaintiff's complaint alleged cruelty on the part of the defendant and contained four specifications. On the trial of the case the plaintiff introduced some evidence to support each one of the specifications. The trial court made findings in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff on each one of the specifications. It will serve no purpose to quote the specifications as the evidence was distinctly conflicting on all of the material averments and there was support for each finding so made by the trial court. The plaintiff asks us to note carefully the scope of the denials and the admissions of the pleadings. That request should have been made in the trial court instead of to this court. However, in the trial court, both parties treated the pleadings as presenting the purported charges by the one party and a complete denial thereof by the other party.

[3, 4] In his cross-complaint the defendant alleged the extreme cruelty of the plaintiff and inserted five specifications. Later, by a supplemental pleading, he added two other specifications. In its findings the trial court found against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant on all of those specifications. As to some of them it may be claimed that the evidence was conflicting. However, it must be conceded that as to some of them there was no conflict in the evidence. The plaintiff earnestly contends that there was no corroboration. In making this claim we understand her to assert that each one of the specifications was not corroborated. Our statute does not require that each one be corroborated. Some of the specifications as to which the evidence was not seriously conflicting and which were corroborated by written documents were of such a nature that it is difficult to understand why the plaintiff even contends that the proof of the defendant was insufficient. As the defendant pleaded a cause of action based on cruelty, sustained it by proof, and the trial court made findings in his favor thereon, it is immaterial that findings were also made in his favor on a cause of action for desertion which had become barred by the statute of limitations.

[5, 6] At the time of the trial the pleadings of both parties put their property rights in issue. Among other things the plaintiff testified that the object of her litigation was to obtain her property rights. The trial court heard the evidence regarding those property rights and made an award thereof. On this appeal neither party contends that the award so made by the trial court was otherwise than just and fair to both parties. However, the plaintiff does contend that the trial court should not have made a determination, in an interlocutory decree, of the issues concerning the property rights. She cites Remley v. Remley, 49 Cal. App. 489, 193 P. 604. In making this contention we do not understand her to claim that the decree in the instant case was, for the reason assigned, a void decree. Most certainly we are not inclined to hold that it is a void decree. Grannis v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 245, 79 P. 891, 106 Am. St. Rep. 23. From the facts which we have recited above it is perfectly clear that the plaintiff was not in any respect prejudiced by those portions of the decree which settled the property rights.

During the pendency of the litigation the plaintiff has frequently changed attorneys. There have been eight or nine substitutions. It is not surprising, therefore, that the record on appeal, and in particular the briefing on appeal has been compiled irregularly. However, the earnestness of the litigants is patent. We have therefore read the record from beginning to end for the purpose of ascertaining if either party has, in any respect, been deprived of any right or rights, but we find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 14, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations ☞706(5)—Prima facie case held made against auto driver upon undisputed evidence that automobile went upon sidewalk and struck down lamp post, injuring plaintiff.

Prima facie case of negligence against an automobile driver held made, where in personal injury action evidence that the truck driven by him went upon the sidewalk and struck down a lamp post, injuring plaintiff, was undisputed.

2. Evidence ☞595—That automobile injuring plaintiff had been struck and forced upon sidewalk held not inferable from evidence of dent in car.

That an automobile going upon sidewalk and injuring plaintiff had been struck by another automobile and forced onto the walk held not inferable from evidence of a dent in the rear of the car injuring plaintiff.

3. Trial ☞296(3)—Instruction implying one of defendants in personal injury action was responsible as principal for automobile driver's negligence held not misleading, in view of other instructions.

In automobile personal injury action, instruction implying that one of two defendants was responsible as principal for the driver's negligence resulting in plaintiff's injury held not misleading, in view of other instructions given.

4. Municipal corporations ☞706(8)—Refusal of instruction upon presumption of responsibility arising from automobile ownership, where automobile driven by garage employee injured plaintiff, held not error.

Where plaintiff was injured by an automobile driven by a garage employee who was returning it to the owner after repairing it, refusal of the court to instruct upon the presumption of responsibility arising from the ownership of the automobile held proper.

5. Appeal and error ☞1170(9)—Instruction in automobile personal injury action relative to one's refusal to produce evidence to overcome that adduced by his adversary held not reversible error (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, relative to setting aside judgments or granting new trials, instruction in an automobile personal injury action relative to party's refusal to produce evidence, if in his power, to overcome the evidence adduced by his adversary held not reversible error.

6. Municipal corporations ☞122(1)—In automobile personal injury action, held not error to admit ordinance, though not pleaded, relative to driving upon walks.

In action for injuries when automobile went upon sidewalk and struck down lamp post, injuring plaintiff, court held not to have erred in receiving in evidence a city ordinance prohibiting driving upon sidewalks, even though the ordinance was not pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Jack Goss, a minor, by Fred Goss, his guardian ad litem, against the Pacific Motor Company, Perry T. Fujii, and others. From the judgment, defendant Perry T. Fujii and others appeal. Affirmed.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Barry J. Colding and Theodore Hale, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, caused by the negligent operation of a truck driven by the defendant Kadowaki. The truck ran into a large iron post standing embedded in the sidewalk at a street corner in San Francisco. The iron post broke off and fell upon the plaintiff, injuring him. The defendant operating the truck at the time was an apprentice mechanic in the employ of the defendant and appellant Pacific Motor Company, which conducted a general garage and repair shop. The other defendant, Murai, was the owner of the truck. He had left it at the garage to be repaired. Judgment was against the driver of the truck, defendant Kadowaki, and also against the defendants operating the garage under the name of Pacific Motor Company. No judgment was given against the other defendant, Murai, the owner of the truck. The garage owners, Pacific Motor Company, are the only appellants.

[1, 2] The trial was by a jury, and the assignments of error relate in the main to the instructions given, and these in turn relate to the nature and effect of the testimony given at the trial. At the conclusion of the testimony offered by plaintiff, appellant's motion for a nonsuit was denied. Defendants offered no testimony in their own behalf. There was no direct testimony to show the cause or excuse for the truck running into the post on the sidewalk. The driver was not a witness at the trial. He had returned to Japan on account of the Tokyo earthquake. The testimony related to the conditions existing immediately after the collision. The witness Colen testified that one wheel of the truck rested on the remaining stump of the lamp post of the sidewalk. Witness Fujimori testified that the truck was facing against the sidewalk, but not on it. But there was no dispute that the truck came onto the sidewalk and struck down the lamp post against the plaintiff. This made a prima facie case against Kadowaki. Berry on Automobiles (4th Ed.) § 405; Huddy on Automobiles (7th Ed.) 512. Appellants point to testimony that a dent found on the rear of the truck indicated that it had been struck by another automobile immediately before this accident, but this testimony was not sufficient to infer that such an occurrence, if it happened, had anything to do with this accident. There was, therefore, no other inference for the jury to draw except that Kadowaki's negligence caused plaintiff's injuries.

In view of the testimony, it was not error for the court to say, in instruction 15:

"So far as the question of negligence is concerned, I instruct you that the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case of negligence against the defendant Kadowaki for which he is liable, and the questions, therefore, remaining for your determination are which of the other defendants, viz., the copartnership sued here as Pacific Motor Company and K. Murai, doing business under the name of Sako Fish Company, is responsible with defendant Kadowaki for the injury suffered by plaintiff, and the amount of damages to be awarded him."

This instruction is also attacked in that it tells the jury to determine which of the other two defendants is responsible with defendant Kadowaki, thereby implying (1) that at least one must be responsible, and (2) that only one, but not both, could be responsible, in addition to implying that in any event (3) Kadowaki must be held liable.

Theoretically, the driver could be acting for both the other defendants and both of these defendants could be liable, but not so under the testimony. Either Kadowaki was delivering the truck for the owner or for his employer, but not for both.

[3] In the expression "Which of the other defendants is responsible," there is grammatically an assumption that at least one is responsible, but the instruction is general and introductory in its nature, and this implied or indirect assumption of fact is overcome by other direct and circumstantial instructions following it. Instructions Nos. 16 to 22, inclusive, defined the relation of employee and employer in general and instructions Nos. 23 to 28, inclusive, specified in detail the circumstances under which alone a verdict could be returned against each one of the defendants, respectively. Read together, the instructions could not mislead the jury into thinking that they must find against at least one of these defendants as claimed by appellant.

It is claimed that the evidence shows defendant Kadowaki was delivering the truck to its owner for his own convenience in that it was parked in the garage in such a way as to block or help block, together with other cars, the exit of his own car in which he wished to go to lunch, it being the lunch hour. His employer, one of the defendants, testified:

"He asked me if he could take the truck out of the shop to the Fish Company and I said he could do so if he pleased."

The testimony established that the service performed for the owner of the truck in returning it, was performed by the garage, and not by its employee, Kadowaki, as a private matter of his own. Obviously it was not necessary for Kadowaki to move the car a number of city blocks in order to clear the entrance to the garage.

The use of the word "permitted," in instruction No. 28, did not have the effect of stating that appellants were responsible for the negligence of Kadowaki if they permitted him to use the truck for his own private purposes. The expression can fairly mean only that, if his employers permitted him to perform this service for them, they would be liable for his negligent performance of that service. Whether the Pacific Motor Company undertook voluntarily to return the truck to the owner, or did so at the owner's request, would not, under the facts of this case, affect the liability of the Pacific Motor Company, for, if this company undertook to drive the truck to any place, it was bound to do so without negligence. The instruction is therefore not misleading in this respect. Other instructions deal specifically and properly with the issue of whether Kadowaki, in driving the truck, was the agent and employee of the truck owner defendant or of the garage defendants in so doing.

Instruction No. 26 does not have the effect of stating that Kadowaki was in any event the servant of the Pacific Motor Company, in stating:

"If you find * * * said Pacific Motor Company * * * undertook * * * to deliver * * * the said motor truck, * * * and if you further find that the servant and employee of said Pacific Motor Company was guilty of negligence, * * * etc."

[4] It was proper for the court to refuse to instruct upon the presumption of responsibility arising from the ownership of the truck. The evidence was undisputed that the truck owner had left it in charge of the garage for repairs, and the only issue as to the owner's liability was whether he had expressly engaged the employee of the garage, Kadowaki, as and for his own agent and employee to bring back his truck.

[5] Appellant assigns as error the giving of instruction No. 5, which reads as follows:

"It is a well-settled rule that when the evidence tends to prove a material fact which imposes a liability on a party, and he has it in his power to produce evidence which from its very nature must overthrow the case made against him, if it is not founded on fact, and he refuses to produce such evidence, the presumption arises that the evidence, if produced, would operate to his prejudice and support the case of his adversary."

This instruction is copied from a quotation of law found in Bone v. Hayes, 154 Cal. 759, 99 P. 172, which gives, among other citations, Code of Civil Procedure, § 2061, subdivision 7, as supporting authority, but the language is not approved as an instruction to a jury.

Appellants do not indicate in what way this instruction was injurious to them but simply cite Estate of Moore, 180 Cal. 570, 182 P. 285. There it was held that an instruction upon the presumption arising from the willful suppression of evidence, based on Code of Civil Procedure, § 1963, subd. 5, was error, because there was no evidence to indicate that any such suppression had occurred. The instruction here does not intimate the willful suppression of evidence, but refers to the refusal of a party to produce evidence, if in his power, to overcome the evidence adduced by his adversary. The instruction may be based upon the failure of all of the three groups of defendants to offer testimony in their own behalf, although the instruction was offered by the defendant Mural and not by the plaintiff. What evidence any of these defendants had the power to produce is not apparent from the record. The real issue before the jury, however, was whether either the defendant Mural or Pacific Motor Company was responsible for the negligence of Kadowaki. If the instruction intimates the willful suppression of evidence, it is equally inapplicable to each of these defendants, and for that reason it is not at all probable that its effect was to prejudice the rights of either against the claims of his codefendant. We hold, therefore, that the giving of this instruction was not reversible error, under the provisions of article 6, § 4½, of the state Constitution.

[6] The court did not err in receiving into evidence the city ordinance prohibiting driving upon the sidewalk, even though the ordinance was not pleaded. Szopieray v. West Berkeley, etc., Co., 194 Cal. 106, 227 P. 720. The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte ALPINE. (Cr. 1530.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 3, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Sept. 30, 1927.

Criminal law §576(3)—Without showing district attorney knew appeal had terminated, defendant held not entitled to release because not tried within 60 days after remittitur (Const. art. 1, § 13; Pen. Code, § 1382).

Defendant convicted of murder who had obtained reversal on appeal held not entitled to release on habeas corpus proceeding on the grounds that he had not been retried within 60 days after the remittitur was filed, Const. art. 1, § 13, and Pen. Code, § 1382, being inapplicable where it was not shown that the district attorney had knowledge or notice that the cause had been returned to the superior court.

Houser, J., dissenting.

Application by Harry Alpine for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure the release of petitioner awaiting second trial for murder, on the ground that he had not been brought to trial within the statutory period. Petitioner remanded.

Morris Abraham and Charles I. Rosin, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On petition filed, the writ was issued, to which return has been duly made. It appears that after trial and conviction of the defendant on a charge of murder, he appealed from the judgment, which appeal resulted in a reversal. The remittitur from the District Court of Appeal was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court on the 26th day of April, 1927. Thereafter, on June 30, 1927, the cause was set down to be tried on August 3, 1927. The defendant objected to the order of June 30, 1927, and moved to dismiss the action on the ground that he had not been brought to trial within 60 days after filing the remittitur, as required by section 1382 of the Penal Code, and that he had been denied a speedy trial as guaranteed to him by the Constitution of the state of California (article 1, § 13). This motion to dismiss was denied upon the ground that said section 1382 has no application to the facts of this case, it appearing by the record that the defendant had been brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information.

It is provided by section 1382 as follows:

"The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: * * *

"2. If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after * * * filing of the information."

In the earlier cases, under section 1382, Penal Code, it was held that failure to bring a criminal action to trial within 60 days after the filing of a remittitur following upon a successful appeal did not present a case within the terms of said section. People v. Glesea, 63 Cal. 345; People v. Lundin, 120 Cal. 308, 52 P. 807. On the other hand, in later cases, it seems to have been held that the filing of the remittitur marks the beginning of a new period of 60 days within which a case must be brought to trial, and that section 1382 applies where that limited period has elapsed. In re Begerow, 133 Cal. 349, 65 P. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178; People v. Walker, 76 Cal. App. 195, 244 P. 94.

Assuming for the purposes of this decision that section 1382 of the Penal Code, and the 60-day rule therein stated, applies to a criminal prosecution after the decision of an appeal which has terminated by the filing of the remittitur in the superior court, it should be observed first that this application has been so made by judicial decision, bringing the stated case within the principle of that section, although literally it is not there. The effect of the clause, "unless good cause to the contrary is shown," should not be ignored.

We may concede that upon a showing of notice to the district attorney, or of actual knowledge by him, that the remittitur has been filed, it becomes his duty to see that the case is brought to trial within the statutory period of 60 days. We may further concede that where a defendant has brought to the attention of the district attorney or of the court the fact of the successful termination of his appeal (a proceeding in which he was the actor), and there has been a neglect or refusal of the prosecution to bring the case to trial, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the rule that under such circumstances the prosecution should be dismissed. But in the absence of such notice to the district attorney or knowledge on his part that the appeal has been terminated, it would be unreasonable to permit a defendant to take advantage of mere inadvertence and so escape prosecution on a criminal charge. In the case at bar so far as appears, the failure to bring the action before the court to be set for trial until 3 days later than the expiration of 60 days from the filing of the remittitur may have been nothing more than the result of inadvertence in not immediately discovering that the remittitur had been filed.

We think that, there being no direct statutory provision to the contrary, the absence of any showing of knowledge by the district attorney, or notice to him, that the cause has been returned to the superior court should in and of itself be held to constitute good cause for refusal to dismiss the action. Upon this ground we hold that petitioner was not entitled to the dismissal demanded by him.

The prisoner is remanded to custody.

PEOPLE v. LITLE. (Cr. 1505.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 13, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Criminal law ☞369(1)—In prosecution for selling narcotics, admitting evidence of sales other than those charged held error (Poison Act).

In prosecution for selling morphine and cocaine, admitting evidence of sales other than those charged in the information held error; there being nothing in the Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124, as amended) permitting such evidence.

2. Criminal law ☞1169(11)—Error in prosecution for selling narcotics in admitting evidence of other sales held prejudicial, where evidence of sales charged was not conclusive and prosecuting attorney discussed other sales in argument (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Error in prosecution for selling narcotics in admitting evidence of other sales than those charged, where evidence of sales charged in the information was not conclusive, and the jury may have doubted the veracity of the prosecuting witness who was a morphine addict, and the other sales were mentioned several times by the prosecuting attorney in argument, held not to come within the terms of Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that there should be no reversal where error was not prejudicial.

3. Criminal law —757(3)—Instruction that evidence of informers, narcotic users, should be received with caution, held improper, trenching on jury's province.

Instruction that the evidence of narcotic users, when used as informers, should always be received with a large degree of caution and distrust, and that their testimony was of little reliability unless corroborated, held improper, since determining the weight of such evidence was for the jury.

4. Criminal law —757(3)—Instruction that testimony of those employed to cause others to commit offenses must be weighed with greater care held improper; weight being for jury.

Instruction that the testimony of those employed to hunt up evidence and to cause others to commit offenses must be weighed with greater care than that of disinterested witnesses held improper, since it would trench upon jury's province.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Elmer W. Litle was convicted of illegal sale of narcotics, and he appeals. Reversed.

Frank S. Hutton and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG. J. The defendant was charged by an information containing two counts with the commission of two felonies. In the first count it was alleged that he illegally gave and furnished to one Madge Serber a preparation of cocaine on September 22, 1926, and the second count charged that he illegally sold a preparation of morphine to the same person on September 26, 1926. At the trial he was convicted upon both counts, and appeals from the judgment pronounced by the court, and from its order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The prosecution, over the objections of counsel for the defendant, introduced evidence tending to show that the defendant had committed a number of other acts similar to those named in the information. The prosecuting witness, in response to questions of counsel for the people, related that she had purchased cocaine from the defendant upon a number of occasions other than September 22, 1926. To permit this was error. No rule of evidence is more fully recognized than that, upon a trial under an indictment or information charging the commission of one offense, proof that the defendant has committed another crime is irrelevant and inadmissible. People v. Avila (Cal. App.) 248 P. 693, People v. Smith, 64 Cal. App. 344, 221 P. 405, People v. Morales, 45 Cal. App. 553, 188 P. 58, People v. Amort, 60 Cal. App. 29, 212 P. 50, and People v. Clark, 28 Cal. App. 670, 153 P. 719, are among the decisions which might be cited to this effect. The general rule was adhered to in People v. Santagata, 130 App. Div. 225, 114 N. Y. S. 321, where the charge was unlawful sale of cocaine.

[2] While there are well-defined exceptions to this rule, there is nothing in the nature of the charge of a violation of the Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124, as amended) which brings it within any of them. Because of this error the judgment must be reversed. Considering the record presented for our review, it cannot be said that the defendant's substantial rights were not prejudiced. He denied having at any time sold drugs to the prosecuting witness. There was no direct evidence corroborating her testimony. The only evidence tending to do so was circumstantial, and not at all conclusive in its character. Two officers testified that they found a marked $20 bill in possession of the defendant; this, they said, had been given to the prosecuting witness shortly before she went to the defendant's office. These witnesses also testified to having received a bottle of cocaine and a bottle of morphine from her immediately after her return. But taking into account her apparent poor memory and the low order of the prosecuting witness, she having admitted that she had been a morphine addict for many years, from which fact the jury may have doubted her veracity, we cannot conclude that the conviction in the instant case is one where the saving grace of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution will warrant an affirmance, in spite of the error previously pointed out.

The prejudice was doubtless exaggerated by the fact that during the argument to the jury the prosecuting attorney several times referred to and discussed the evidence of sales other than those charged in the information.

[3, 4] In view of the fact that the case may be tried again, it is necessary that we pass upon one other alleged error. The defendant requested the court to give the following instruction:

"The evidence of narcotic users, when used as informers in matters relating to their addiction, should always be received with a large degree of caution and distrust. From the nature of their addiction and the business in which such informers are engaged and the associations which such addicts usually seek, they and their testimony are rendered of little reliability unless corroborated.

"The testimony of those employed to hunt up evidence and to create situations causing or tending to cause others to commit offenses must be weighed with greater care than that given by disinterested witnesses."

No authority is cited requiring that such an instruction be given in any case. It would clearly touch upon the province of the jury, who alone are charged with the duty and are given the right of weighing evidence.

No other point need be mentioned.
The judgment is reversed.

SIMON NEWMAN CO. v. WOODS et ux.
(Civ. 3296.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 7, 1927.

1. Trial ⚡374(2)—Jury's verdict in equity case is advisory only.

Where a case is in the verdict of the jury is merely advisory to the court.

2. Chattel mortgages ⚡282—Jury's verdict held merely advisory in proceeding for foreclosing chattel mortgage.

The foreclosure of a chattel mortgage being an equity proceeding, jury's verdict held merely advisory.

3. Appeal and error ⚡1014—Trial court's findings in equity case will not be disturbed, where supported by substantial evidence, notwithstanding contrary advisory verdict of jury.

In an equity case the verdict of the jury being merely advisory, the appellate court will not disturb the contrary findings of the trial court, if there is substantial evidence supporting them.

4. Trial ⚡374(2)—Equity court cannot arbitrarily set aside jury's verdict.

Notwithstanding that the verdict of a jury in an equity case is advisory merely, the court cannot arbitrarily set it aside.

5. Chattel mortgages ⚡289—Contention that court abused discretionary power in setting aside jury's verdict in chattel mortgage foreclosure case held equivalent to statement that evidence did not support findings.

The action of an equity court in disregarding a jury's verdict is not arbitrary, if the findings are substantially supported by the evidence, and hence the appellant's contention in an appeal from a chattel mortgage foreclosure judgment that the court abused its discretion in setting aside the jury's verdict was merely tantamount to a contention that the findings were not supported by the evidence.

6. Appeal and error ⚡1009(3)—In equity case trial court determines facts on conflicting evidence.

In an equity case it is the province of the trial court in the exercise of a sound discretion to determine the facts where a conflict in the evidence exists.

7. Evidence ⚡589—Trial court was not bound to accept defendant's testimony merely because it was not directly contradicted, but could consider its verity in light of all other evidence.

Trial court, in chattel mortgage foreclosure proceeding, was not bound to accept defendant's testimony as true merely because it was not directly contradicted by other witnesses, but the court had a right, and it was its duty, to examine and consider the verity of the evidence in the light of all the facts and circumstances of the case.

8. Bills and notes ⚡104—Chattel mortgages ⚡72, 73—Contracts ⚡128(1)—Mortgages ⚡79, 81—Note or mortgage given on promise to refrain from prosecuting for felony or under threats of arrest or prosecution is void.

A note or mortgage given on a promise to refrain from the prosecution of a person for a felony or under threats of arrest or prosecution would be void, as against public policy.

9. Appeal and error ⚡1008(1)—Whether note or chattel mortgage was given on promise to refrain from prosecution or on threat of prosecution held question for trial court.

In an action to foreclose a chattel mortgage, whether a note and chattel mortgage was given on a promise to refrain from the prosecution of a person for a felony or under threats of arrest or prosecution held a question for the trial court to determine.

10. Chattel mortgages ⚡278—By introducing note and chattel mortgage in mortgage foreclosure action, plaintiff made out prima facie case (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 39).

By the introduction in evidence of a note and chattel mortgage, plaintiff made out prima facie case for foreclosure, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 39, to the effect that a good and sufficient consideration for a written contract will be presumed.

11. Chattel mortgages ⚡278—Burden of overcoming presumption of consideration for chattel mortgage held on defendant (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 39; Civ. Code, § 1615).

Under Civ. Code, § 1615, after the introduction in evidence of a note and chattel mortgage, the burden of overcoming the presumption of consideration which was thereby raised under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 39, held on defendant.

12. Appeal and error ⚡1008(1)—Where plaintiff raised presumption of consideration by introducing note and chattel mortgage, evidence by defendants to show no consideration merely raised fact issue for trial court (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1957, 1963, 2061, subd. 21).

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1957, 1963, 2061, subd. 2, where the plaintiff made a prima facie case and raised a presumption of consideration by introducing note and chattel mortgage, evidence by the defendants to show that there had been no valid consideration given merely raised an issue of fact for the trial court to determine.

13. Evidence — 87—Fact raised by presumption remains one for court or jury until presumption is dispelled.

Where the introduction of evidence raises a presumption, the fact remains one to be determined by the court or jury until the presumption has been clearly dispelled.

14. Bills and notes — 493(4)—Chattel mortgages — 32—Where evidence concerning consideration for note and chattel mortgage was capable of two interpretations, presumption of consideration held not dispelled.

Where evidence concerning consideration for a note and chattel mortgage was vague and uncertain, and capable of two interpretations, held, that it was not sufficiently definite and conclusive to dispel the presumption that valid consideration had been given for the note and mortgage.

15. Appeal and error — 1068(5)—Appellants cannot complain of refusal to charge, where jury's verdict favored them, notwithstanding verdict was disregarded by equity court.

Where the verdict of the jury favored appellants, though it was subsequently disregarded by the court and a contrary judgment entered, the appellants cannot complain of the action of the trial court in refusing an instruction.

16. Bills and notes — 520—Chattel mortgages — 79—Contracts — 141(3)—Trial court's findings that note and chattel mortgage were not given because of threats, or to prevent prosecution for felony, held supported by evidence.

In action to foreclose chattel mortgage, trial court's finding that the note and mortgage were given for valid consideration, and not because of threats to prosecute or arrest mortgagor's brother, or to prevent his prosecution for a felony, held supported by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action to foreclose a chattel mortgage by the Simon Newman Company against Frank P. Woods and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Thos. M. Anaya, of Modesto, for appellants.

C. W. Croop, of Merced, and Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

GLENN, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought to foreclose a chattel mortgage dated October 31, 1923, executed by defendants to plaintiff, and covering certain cattle, horses, and farming implements. The chattel mortgage was given to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date therewith, for the sum of $1,900, also executed by defendants. The answer of defendants admits the execution of the note and mortgage, as well as the fact that nothing has been paid thereon, either by way of principal or interest, but denies that there is due or owing or unpaid to plaintiff thereon the said sum of $1,900, or any other sum. This denial is based upon the alleged facts, pleaded as a special defense and also by way of cross-complaint, the substance of which is to the effect that one Tom Woods, brother of defendant Frank P. Woods, had been falsely accused by the plaintiff and its agents and employees of the crime of embezzlement, and that the note and mortgage were executed by defendants by reason of such threatened arrest and prosecution and on the understanding that he would not be so prosecuted, and that the whole transaction was therefore void as contrary to public policy.

Two questions were presented to the jury, called at the request of defendants, as follows: (1) Was there any consideration received by the defendants, or either of them, for the note and mortgage executed by defendants to plaintiff? (2) Was the consent of defendants, or either of them, to the execution of the note and mortgage to plaintiff obtained by threats to arrest, imprison, and prosecute Tom Woods, brother of Frank P. Woods, for embezzling or stealing goods belonging to the Simon Newman Company? The answer of the jury to each question was favorable to defendants; the first being answered in the negative and the second in the affirmative.

The court refused to adopt the verdict of the jury, but made its findings in favor of the plaintiff on all issues. Appellants present their contention as follows:

"There is just one issue in this case. Was there an abuse of trial court's conceded discretionary power of setting aside the verdict of the jury—this being a case in equity? We answer in the affirmative and in support thereof quote the following: In chronological order, we shall present the facts and testimony recorded at the trial which we deem sufficient to establish one thing, namely, that said note and mortgage were executed under extortion, duress, and undue influence and that the entire transaction is against public policy, and therefore the court did abuse its discretionary power in rejecting the verdict."

[1, 2] The rule, as conceded by appellants, is well settled that, where the case is in equity, the verdict of the jury is merely advisory to the court. Sweetzer v. Dobbins, 65 Cal. 529, 4 P. 540; Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 246, 13 P. 655, 1 Am. St. Rep. 51. The foreclosure of a mortgage is a proceeding in equity, and therefore the verdict of the jury was merely advisory. Downing v. Le Du, 82 Cal. 471, 23 P. 202; Van Valkenburg v. Oldham, 12 Cal. App. 572, 108 P. 42; Coghlin v. Quartararo, 15 Cal. App. 662, 115 P. 664.

[3-5] The verdict of the jury being advisory, this court will not disturb the findings of the trial court, if there is substantial evidence supporting the same. It is true, as stated by appellants, that the court cannot arbitrarily set aside the verdict of the jury; but the action of the court in disregarding the verdict cannot be characterized as "arbitrary," if its findings are substantially supported by the evidence. In its last analysis, therefore, the contention of appellants to the effect that the court abused its discretionary power in setting aside the verdict of the jury is merely tantamount to a statement that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

The main contention is that the note and mortgage were given as a result of threats of prosecution against Tom Woods, and we shall take up this proposition first, discussing later the subject of want of consideration, incidentally adverted to in appellants' closing brief.

The assertion that the trial court abused its discretionary power in disregarding the verdict of the jury is attempted to be substantiated by a reference to various parts of the testimony of witnesses called in defendants' behalf, but the testimony of witnesses called on the other side, contradicting and conflicting with that offered by the defense, is but slightly referred to.

[6] It is the province of the trial court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to determine the facts, where such conflict exists; hence we shall give in substance and effect an outline of some of the testimony which, doubtless, influenced the court in the conclusion it reached, treating them as established facts in the case, as we must in view of the findings being favorable to plaintiff.

The plaintiff conducted a mercantile business, and Tom Woods, brother of defendant Frank P. Woods, was, on the 31st day of October, 1923 (the date of the execution of the note and mortgage), and for approximately four years prior thereto had been, a clerk in one of the departments thereof. R. E. La Posea and his wife were employed by said plaintiff to conduct an investigation as to the running of the business of said firm and to "test" the honesty of the various employees thereof. With this in view, certain purchases were made by them from Tom Woods, in payment for which they had tendered him certain marked money. Although a cash register had been provided by the firm on which he was to "ring up" sales so made, he had not done so, but had placed the money in his pocket. When confronted the next day with these facts, he admitted he had taken the money tendered in payment for the goods and had been so doing for a period of several years. The marked money was voluntarily returned by him to the firm, and a written confession was freely signed by him to the effect that he had stolen from the firm at the rate of $4 per day for 600 days, making a total of $2,400. He admitted, at first, that the amount taken was $10 per day, and then stated it was $6 per day, but later said it would be impossible to raise the full amount he had taken, so, at his suggestion, the amount was lowered to $4 per day. After the confession had been signed and witnessed, Tom Woods, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. La Posea, went to the former's home, where he gathered up a quantity of merchandise which had been taken from the plaintiff corporation. This was likewise returned to the owner. After the confession was signed, Tom Woods stated that he did not desire to tell his wife about the matter, but upon being urged to do so he stated, "Well, I think I had better, because she has money, she has some diamonds, and I am sure that we can realize money on and pay this up," and, at his suggestion, his wife was sent for. When Mrs. Woods arrived, she was informed that her husband had been embezzling from the plaintiff. She stated that she thought she would be able to straighten the matter up, but, when her husband stated that she had her diamonds with which to make restitution, she said she did not think she could raise $2,400 on them, and then said:

"In a little place like this, if I start to ask about my diamonds, I don't know, they will certainly know something is wrong; I have no one to go to get this money."

Mrs. Woods then asked Mrs. La Posea if the latter knew of any one to whom she could take the diamonds, and was informed that, while she (Mrs. La Posea) knew of no one in Newman, she did know a business man in Modesto. After some conversation between these parties, the diamonds were given by Mrs. Woods to Mrs. La Posea to be taken to Modesto for appraisal. An appointment was then made for Mr. and Mrs. Tom Woods to go to Modesto on the following Sunday—the conversation above referred to having taken place on Friday—to ascertain the value of the diamonds and what amount they might be able to realize thereon. Although neither Mr. nor Mrs. La Posea had met the defendant Frank P. Woods, nor mentioned his name in the conversation on Friday, yet when Tom Woods and his wife called at the hotel in Modesto, pursuant to the previous understanding, they were accompanied by said defendant. When the parties met in Modesto, they were informed by Mrs. La Posea that the diamonds were worth $750 for a loan, and for a sale about $850. The jewelry was then returned to Mrs. Tom Woods. Frank P. Woods then spoke up and said:

"I am not going to have Tom in the store; it is not a man's business."

He also said:

"I am going to take him on the ranch; that is where he belongs. * * * I am going to settle all this trouble with a chattel mortgage on my stock."

Mrs. La Posea attempted to dissuade said defendant from mortgaging his stock. Neither Mr. La Posea nor his wife brought up the subject of Frank P. Woods's executing a note and mortgage to make good for the brother, nor made any threats of any kind; likewise nothing was said by either of those parties to the effect that, if the indebtedness due to the plaintiff was paid, Tom Woods would not be arrested or prosecuted. On the following Monday defendant Frank P. Woods called upon E. J. Morehead, manager of a branch bank at Gustine, and asked the latter for a loan of $1,900, and, in reply to a question from Mr. Morehead as to what use he desired the loan for, defendant replied that it was "to help his brother out of difficulties that he was having with the Simon Newman Company." He was counseled by Mr. Morehead to the effect that it was an unwise undertaking, but the defendant stated that "he had been helping his family for a good many years, and that he supposed he had it to do again this time." He was told that the matter of the loan would be submitted on Tuesday to the finance board of the bank. On the following Wednesday the said defendant again called on Mr. Morehead, for the purpose of ascertaining if the loan had been allowed, and was informed that it had not been allowed. Defendant Frank P. Woods then called upon C. P. Price, office manager of plaintiff. The visit was unsolicited, so far as the latter gentleman was concerned. Defendant inquired as to the probability of securing a loan from Mr. Wagenheim, general manager of plaintiff, and was informed by Mr. Price that the matter would be taken up with the general manager. It was understood that Mrs. Tom Woods was to come to the office of the plaintiff to ascertain for defendant Frank P. Woods the conclusion reached by Mr. Wagenheim. Upon calling at the office she was informed that the plaintiff would accept a mortgage for $1,900 and take Frank P. Woods' note to arrange the loan. In the afternoon of Wednesday, October 31st, Frank P. Woods appeared at the office, and the note and chattel were prepared and signed by him, and a notary public was called in, before whom the mortgage was acknowledged. No threats were made, either by Mr. Price, or in his presence, to either of the defendants, to the effect that, unless they signed the note and mortgage, Tom Woods would be arrested and prosecuted for embezzlement, by the Simon Newman Company.

After the defendant Frank P. Woods had executed the note and mortgage, he was told to have his wife call, for the purpose of executing the same. On the Saturday following, defendant Mrs. Woods called and signed the note and mortgage, acknowledging the mortgage before a notary.

Without detailing the testimony offered on behalf of defendant, it may be said, generally, that Tom Woods denied his guilt; claimed that the confession was secured by means of threats made to him; that his home was ransacked by Mr. and Mrs. La Posea, but that only articles belonging to him, and not to the firm, were found. Frank P. Woods testified that, while he had gone to Modesto at the request of his brother, he was told while there that unless the money was put up Tom would be prosecuted; that Mrs. Woods had asked the detectives (Mr. and Mrs. La Posea) if the money was put up if they would prosecute Tom, and that Mr. La Posea shouted out, "No." He testified also, in substance, that Mr. Morehead at the bank had told him that he was wanted at the Simon Newman store, and that he had no sooner arrived when Mr. Price was there to meet him, who told him that his brother, Tom, had stolen goods and money amounting to $2,400, and that in reply he had said to Mr. Price that, if that would save him from being prosecuted, he would sign a mortgage, and Price replied, "That is all right; that they would take it up." He further testified that at the time he had signed the mortgage Mr. Price asked him if he knew what he was signing the mortgage for, and he replied, "Yes, I was signing it to keep Tom from being prosecuted;" and he (Price) said, "It was right."

Testimony was also given on behalf of defendants as to certain conversations had between them at their home during the interval between the time the husband signed the note and mortgage and the time Mrs. Woods signed the same. To the effect that Frank P. Woods had informed his wife that, unless the note and mortgage were given, his brother would be prosecuted. No mention was made by Mrs. Woods of these purported conversations with her husband, either to the notary public at the time she acknowledged the mortgage, or to any person connected with, or in the employ of, the plaintiff corporation. While this line of testimony went in under objection, the findings being in favor of the plaintiff, the question as to the correctness of the ruling of the trial court thereon has not been presented on appeal, and no discussion thereof is deemed necessary.

[7] The trial court was not bound to accept as true this part of the testimony of defendants, merely for the reason that it was not directly contradicted by other witnesses; but the court had the right, and it was its duty, to examine and consider and determine its verity in the light of all the facts and circumstances in the case.

[8, 9] It is conceded that a note or mortgage given on promise to refrain from the prosecution of a person for a felony, or under threats of arrest or prosecution, would be void as against public policy; but whether or not the note and mortgage were so given was a question presented to the trial court for determination. The evidence on the subject was highly conflicting, and the court resolved the conflict in favor of the plaintiff. There is substantial evidence to support its findings in this regard, and hence it is not the province of this court to disturb the same.

The question of whether the findings of the court with reference to the consideration for the note and mortgage finds support in the evidence remains to be considered. In this connection, the court found that the note and mortgage were executed in order to liquidate the obligation of Tom Woods to plaintiff, and further found that there was a good and valuable consideration for the execution of said documents, to wit, the forbearance on the part of plaintiff to sue Tom Woods upon his indebtedness to plaintiff.

Plaintiff offered in evidence the note and mortgage, the execution of which were admitted, together with proof that nothing had been paid thereon, either for principal or interest, and rested.

The defense put in their case along the lines we have before stated, for the purpose of showing that the note and mortgage were given as a result of threats of prosecution directed towards Tom Woods and on the understanding that such threats would not be carried out. There was testimony by the defendants that they had received no consideration for the execution of note and mortgage.

The testimony for the witnesses for the plaintiff in rebuttal was along the lines already indicated, denying the threats and giving a different version of the transaction and of the various conversations attributed by the defense to them.

[10, 11] A good and sufficient consideration for a written contract will be presumed. Section 1963, subd. 39, Code Civ. Proc. Hence, by the introduction in evidence of the note and mortgage, plaintiff made out a prima facie case. Section 1615 of the Civil Code provides:

"The burden of showing the want of consideration sufficient to support an instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate or avoid it."

The burden was therefore cast upon the defense of overcoming the presumption of consideration.

[12] Under this state of the case, the testimony offered on the part of the defense merely raised an issue of fact which was for the tribunal trying the cause to determine. Sections 1957, 1963, 2061, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.; Mar Shee v. Maryland Assur. Corp., 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269; Keating v. Morrissey, 6 Cal. App. 163, 91 P. 677.

[13] The fact in dispute raised by the presumption still remains one to be determined by the court or jury trying the cause, until the presumption is dispelled. Mar Shee v. Maryland Assur. Corp., supra. Appellants' position seems to be that it was established or proved as a fact in the case by a witness called on the part of the plaintiff itself, that there was no valid consideration, and in this connection they rely upon an answer on cross-examination given by the witness Price, called in rebuttal by plaintiff. As some matters explanatory of the answer of the witness so relied upon do not appear in appellants' brief, we quote from the record:

"Q. Well, will you state to the jury, Mr. Price, what was the occasion by you, or the Simon Newman Company, of having this mortgage $1,900 and having $500 received from Mrs. Tom Woods?

"Mr. Goldman: I think that is about seven times that we have stipulated as to what consideration we claim was given, and we don't claim any other consideration.

"Mr. Anaya: He may have a new one.

"Mr. Goldman: We don't claim any other consideration, so why waste time on it.

"The Court: Well, you can state whether or not there was a consideration.

"The witness: May I ask your honor just what is meant by 'consideration'?

"Mr. Goldman: We will object to the question as calling for a conclusion.

"The Court: The consideration for the $1,900 note. The consideration moving to the Simon Newman Company. A. What is meant by consideration?

"The Court: Well, that is the issue in this case; what the court has to decide and what the jury has to decide; but the consideration for a note is usually money received by a person, or it might be property, or it might be anything.

"Mr. Anaya: Provided it is a legal, valid consideration.

"The Court: Well, he asked him if he knew of any other consideration; do you know of any other thing they received? A. I don't know of anything else."

Concerning the above, appellants state:

"Mr. Price, as manager of the plaintiff corporation, admits he knew of no consideration except that mentioned by the defendants, namely, to save 'Tom Woods' arrest and compound a felony."

The testimony relied upon is not susceptible of such an interpretation, as the witness had not referred to any fact or circumstance from which such an inference even might be drawn; in fact, his testimony, elsewhere given, was to the opposite effect. The answer of the witness, "I don't know of anything else," was in response to the question:

"Well he asked him if he knew of any other consideration; do you know of any other consideration they received?"

[14] The first sentence appears, by the use of the pronoun "he," to have reference to Mr. Goldman, counsel for plaintiff; the second sentence, which in fact composed the question, was addressed to the witness; but an analysis of the preceding discussion between court and counsel leads to the conclusion that the remark of the court was addressed to Mr. Anaya, counsel for defendants, the pronoun "he" being either a typographical error or having been used inadvertently and the question being framed to meet a suggestion made by him. As the witness was under cross-examination by Mr. Anaya, and as Mr. Goldman was asking no questions, it is apparent that the remark of the court did not refer to the latter. While the initial question asked by Mr. Anaya did not refer to, or mention directly, the subject of "consideration," seemingly it was so understood by Mr. Goldman, for, immediately following, a remark was interpolated by him to the effect that they had several times stipulated as to what consideration they claimed was given, and they did not claim any other consideration, to which Mr. Anaya replied: "He (the witness) may have a new one." This remark of Mr. Anaya, considered in connection with what immediately preceded it, carried the suggestion that the latter desired the witness to state the consideration other than the one referred to by Mr. Goldman. The reply of the witness is responsive to the question asked and seems to indicate that he had in mind some consideration, but knew of nothing "else." The form of the question presupposed the prior mention of a specific consideration, and he was asked, in fact, to state the consideration "other" than that previously mentioned; but as no specific consideration had been previously mentioned, and as the witness was not further interrogated on the subject, the meaning of his answer is left to conjecture. It may be well here to note that the record, notwithstanding the statement of Mr. Goldman to the contrary, as noted above, does not disclose any stipulation with reference to consideration, and neither counsel has so claimed. Under these facts we are left in the dark as to the specific consideration intended to be referred to by the witness, or by the court or counsel. The subject of forbearance of suit on the indebtedness of Tom Woods had not been mentioned to the witness, and it is doubtful if he had knowledge of the fact that such a detriment, suffered by plaintiff, in consideration of the execution of the note and mortgage by defendants, would furnish a sufficient consideration to support the same. The answer of the witness, as we have analyzed it, appears to be favorable to the respondent, but even if considered otherwise, it falls far short of establishing the fact of want of consideration as against the presumption of a valid consideration, for the rule is well settled that a presumption is not dispelled and does not disappear from the case by testimony of such vague and uncertain meaning.

In the case of Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corp., supra, the court, speaking to the point as to when a fact is "proved" contrary to a presumption, says:

"From the foregoing we deduce that a fact is proved as against a party when it is established by the uncontradicted testimony of the party himself or of his witnesses, under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence, and that, when the fact so proved is wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked, the latter is dispelled and disappears from the case."

The case of Keating v. Morrissey, supra, is analogous to the instant case, and many of the questions involved herein will be found fully discussed in that case.

[15] Appellants complain of the action of the trial court in refusing an instruction proposed by them; but as the verdict of the jury was favorable to them, although subsequently disregarded by the court, no useful purpose would be subserved by a discussion of the matter.

[16] The findings of the court are amply sustained by facts and circumstances of the case, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

Frank Titus was convicted of having in his possession intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and he appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Scott McReynolds, of Ventura, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendant was charged by information with the offense of having in his possession intoxicating liquor containing alcohol in excess of one-half of 1 per cent. by volume, for beverage purposes. The information further charged a prior conviction of the offense of possession on February 19, 1926, and a second prior conviction of the same offense on October 30, 1926. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of possession and a verdict that defendant had been previously convicted October 30, 1926, and also a verdict that he had previously been convicted on February 19, 1926, and the defendant was by judgment pronounced upon the verdicts ordered imprisoned in the county jail for two years and to pay a fine of $2,000. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

[1] In support of this appeal the appellant first attacks the conviction on February 19, 1926. It appears from the record that on February 18, 1926, a complaint was filed charging the defendant with the sale of intoxicating liquor. On the following day the defendant was brought before the justice of the peace as a magistrate, for arraignment, and, after the complaint was read to him, the defendant offered to plead guilty to the offense of possession, which offer was accepted. The docket contains this entry:

"Said defendant offers to plead guilty to the offense of possession of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and the court taking cognizance of the fact that this is a lesser offense and is a part of and is contained in the offense of sale of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, accepts the plea as offered, and there appearing no sufficient cause why judgment should not be pronounced, it is by the court ordered and adjudged. * * *

The appellant maintains that the judgment of conviction is void on its face. The defendant was not charged with possession, but with the sale of intoxicating liquors, an offense of which the justice court did not have jurisdiction, except for the purpose of a preliminary hearing. In re Dal Porte, 198 Cal. 216, 244 P. 355; People v. Swain, 5 Cal. App. 421, 90 P. 720.

[2, 3] Assuming, without deciding, that the offense of possession is a lesser offense necessarily included in the offense of sale of intoxicating liquor, yet the judgment is void on its face. It has been specifically determined in this state that the justice of the peace, sitting as a committing magistrate in a preliminary examination involving grand larceny, has no jurisdiction without the filing of a formal complaint as required by section 1426 of the Penal Code to try the defendant on a charge of petit larceny—an offense cognizable by him when jurisdiction is properly acquired. People v. Swain, supra. See, also, Ex parte Williams, 183 Cal. 11, 190 P. 163. But while the defendant may waive formalities established for his protection, he cannot waive that which "is of the essence of valid judgment." Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 124. And although it ill becomes the defendant to initiate the void proceeding, nevertheless we are under the compulsion of declaring that there was no valid judgment of conviction of the first offense.

A different situation is presented by appellant's attack upon the second conviction. The city recorder of the city of San Buenaventura was elected as city clerk on the second Monday in April, 1923. An ordinance of the city was passed to become effective on the third Monday in April, 1923, containing the following provision:

"Section 1. The following officers of said city are hereby united and consolidated as follows: (b) The city clerk shall be ex-officio recorder and assessor of said city."

[4, 5] The act setting forth a charter for cities of the fifth class (Gen. Laws of 1915, p. 1099), in section 751, provides that the government of the city shall be vested in certain officers including a recorder and then states:

"* * * Provided, that the board of trustees, may in its discretion, by an ordinance adopted, published and recorded as required for general ordinance, at least thirty days before a general city election, at which city officers are to be elected, unite and consolidate certain offices, by declaring: * * * 2. The city clerk elected shall be ex-officio recorder and assessor."

The appellant's contention is that, inasmuch as the ordinance did not become effective until after the election, there was no city recorder. The appellant was convicted by the recorder, so serving, on October 30, 1926, of the offense of possession. As we view the problem here presented it is not necessary for us to determine whether, as respondent contends, the language quoted from the General Laws be directory or mandatory, or whether during the interim between the going into effect of the ordinance and the next general city election thereafter the city clerk legally became the recorder. For the purposes of the present attack it is all-sufficient if he were a de facto recorder, for if he were, then the proceeding is not void on its face, and is not subject to collateral attack. Merced Bank v. Rosenthal, 99 Cal. 39, 31 P. 849, 33 P. 732; Carpentier v. City of Oakland, 30 Cal. 439, 446. In the leading American case upon the subject, State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409, cited with approval in Merced Bank v. Rosenthal, supra, after an exhaustive review of the English and American authorities, it is declared that:

"An officer de facto is one whose acts, though not those of a lawful officer, the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid so far as they involve the interests of the public and third persons, where the duties of the office were exercised, first, without a known appointment or election, but under such circumstances of reputation or acquiescence as were calculated to induce people, without inquiry, to submit to or invoke his action, supposing him to be the officer he assumed to be."

It is apparent that the officer here acted under the ordinance adopted by the board of trustees, whether that action was legal or not and the circumstances were sufficient to induce people without inquiry to submit to his action. Indicative of the general acquiescence to the assumption of office is the fact that the defendant here raised no objection at the time and took no appeal therefrom. The conviction therefore in this action is not open to attack.

[6, 7] The next point assigned by appellant is that at the time he pleaded to the information he was not asked how he pleaded to the charges of prior convictions. On January 11, 1926, he was arraigned on the information and at that time asked that January 14, 1926, be fixed as the time for his plea, and personally endeavored to secure the consent of the trial judge at that time to accept a plea of guilty of possession with one prior conviction only. The court declined to bargain with the defendant, but on the 14th, after the defendant had pleaded not guilty, neglected to ask him to plead to the charges of prior convictions. He was not asked how he pleaded to these charges until during the time the jury was being selected, at which time he stood mute and the court entered a plea of not guilty to the charges of prior conviction. The defendant maintains that he was asked to plead too late. The court was manifestly correct in entering the plea of not guilty when the defendant refused to plead, provided the plea was not called for too late. People v. Coleman, 145 Cal. 609, 79 P. 283; People v. Kirk, 32 Cal. App. 517, 163 P. 696. Again, the appellant fails to point out wherein he was prejudiced. Had he desired to enter a plea of guilty to the charges of prior conviction he could have prevented the jury from being informed thereof. He had the opportunity to so plead and to have the error, if one existed, corrected, but he did not take advantage of the occasion to cure the wrong, if indeed it were wrong. Had he pleaded not guilty in the first instance the testimony would have gone to the jury, just as it did here. We fail to discover where the defendant's rights were prejudiced.

[8] Four additional assignments are very abruptly stated by appellant without argument or authority to support them, and for that reason we decline to assume the burden of further research. Counsel cannot, with nonchalant air, declare without argument that error was committed and by so doing transfer the labor of research from his own shoulders to the appellate tribunal. People v. Zarate, 54 Cal. App. 372, 201 P. 955.

[9] Appellant also asserts that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. It would serve no useful purpose to recite the testimony at any length, but we have scrutinized the transcript, and, while there was testimony by a defense witness that he had put the liquor into defendant's car, having borrowed it in the evening according to his statement, yet there is testimony which, if believed by the jury, sustains the verdict. The car of the defense witness was present and he was arrested as he started away in it. The liquor found in the defendant's car almost immediately after it was moved by him was in a hidden contrivance built into the car for the evident purpose of carrying pint bottles of liquor. There is no suggestion that the defense witness constructed the device. It was testified by one of the officers that the defendant stated that he was ready to plead guilty, and by another that he asked them not to tip over things in the house, that they had enough to convict him already. The testimony is sufficient to support the verdict.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to sentence the defendant for the offense charged, with one prior conviction.

===== LIERLY et al. v. McEWEN. (Civ. 5217.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 6, 1927.

Rehearing Granted Oct. 6, 1927.

Mines and minerals $\S$ 79(7)—In action for oil royalties, claimant awarded more than claim could not complain though not party to agreement constituting basis for award.

In an action to determine title to certain oil royalties, a claimant who was awarded more than his claim, not being injured, could not complain, although he was not party to an agreement that the royalties should be held in trust by a certain company, on the basis of which agreement the court determined the award.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action to determine title to certain oil royalties by W. S. Lierly and others against Daniel H. McEwen and others, substituted for Security Trust Company. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 254 P. 587.

James Donovan, of Los Angeles, and John L. McNab, and Byron Coleman, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. W. Kaye, of Los Angeles, and Alfred Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This action was originally brought by plaintiffs against Security Trust Company of Bakersfield as defendant for the purpose of having determined the proportionate amount of royalties that certain locators of oil lands were entitled to under a leasing agreement with the Associated Oil Company, which royalties were held by the defendant banking company under a certain trust agreement. The company later came into court under motion, according to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, and deposited the sum of $1,704.32, the amount held by it, and procured an order bringing into the action certain defendants who thereafter filed pleadings alleging the proportion of the amount they were entitled to.

The facts are somewhat involved. It appears from the record that on January 1, 1910, W. S. Lierly, plaintiff herein, made a number of oil locations on government lands under the then existing system and named B. F. Wilson as one of the locators. Shortly thereafter the Associated Oil Company leased certain of these locations, including those in which Wilson's name was used as a locator. As soon as Wilson ascertained the fact that his name had been used as one of the locators, he communicated the fact to his partner, D. H. McEwen, defendant and appellant herein, advising him that the locations made in his name were for the joint benefit of both, by reason of their partnership. Later the government sought to disturb the locations so made because of the withdrawal of the particular lands from location by President Taft in the fall of 1909. Nothing was determined under these controversies at this time. On February 25, 1920, Congress passed what is known as the "Leasing Act" (30 USCA §§ 181-263; U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4640¼-4640¼-ss). On August 10, 1920, the Associated Oil Company entered into an agreement with certain locators, including McEwen, from whom leases were taken covering the locations in which B. F. Wilson was interested. This agreement had for its object the development of the lands under the Leasing Act, in the event that it should be determined that the locators were entitled to a lease. The Associated Oil Company succeeded in procuring a lease from the government upon the properties on condition that it effected a settlement among the various claimants of their conflicting interests. This the company succeeded in doing, and on April 2d all of the parties to this action, or their predecessors in interest, signed an agreement with the Associated Oil Company, whereby they agreed upon the proportion that each claimant should have under their various claims. The substance of this contract is: That the government of the United States leased to the Associated Oil Company the southeast quarter of section 26, township 30 south, range 24 east, on condition that such company would clear up any adverse claims against the government upon this quarter section, and upon the further consideration that three other quarter sections which were put into the naval reserve should be surrendered to the government by all the locators or their successors in interest, and that in consideration of the surrender of these three quarter sections, the government leased the quarter section above described to the oil company. This section is outside the naval reserve. It then became incumbent upon those who had claimed some interest, either as locators or subsequent transferees of the three quarter sections, to adjust their respective rights with the Associated Oil Company, which was done under the contract of April 2, 1921. By the terms of this contract the government was to receive 20 per cent. royalty and other interests were to receive 5 per cent., leaving 75 per cent. of the net production to be divided between the oil company and the various locators on the three quarter sections. It is claimed by appellant McEwen that as there were twenty-four locators on these disputed three quarter sections and each surrendered to the government the same quantity that each other person surrendered, they therefore surrendered $\frac{1}{8}$ of each location considered as a separate surrender of each quarter section, or considering the three quarter sections as a unit, each surrendered $\frac{1}{24}$ of the three. That this is the respective relation that each locator stood to the other, $\frac{1}{8}$ of one, or $\frac{1}{24}$ of the three considered as a unit, and the royalty which the Associated Oil Company agreed to pay them was one-eighth of 75 per cent. of the net production. One-eighth of the royalty divided by $\frac{1}{24}$ gives each person $\frac{1}{192}$ part of the royalty of 75 per cent. and the agreement specifically provided that this was the interest that each of the locators was entitled to thereunder. This agreement was signed by both Wilson and McEwen.

Prior to the entering into thereof, Wilson attempted to repudiate and deny that McEwen had any interest in the locations or the contract originally entered into with the Associated Oil Company. McEwen thereupon instituted suit against Wilson, joining the oil company, the Security Trust Company and one William C. Davis; the latter having acquired from Wilson some interest in the property. The issues were joined, and prior to the case going to trial a certain stipulation was entered into by all the parties to said action to the effect that upon its final determination there would be paid to the person or persons to whom said royalty should be awarded, in such proportions as the court should determine. On January 10, 1923, judgment was duly made and entered giving and granting to McEwen one-half of all the interests acquired by Wilson under the locations made on and after January 10, 1910.

It was also decreed that under the contracts of August 10, 1920, and April 2, 1921, above referred to, McEwen was entitled to one-half of the interests acquired by reason of Wilson's locations and also one-half of the compromise agreement made between the government of the United States with the Associated Oil Company under the contract of April 2, 1921. In other words, Wilson's and McEwen's interest collectively in the southeast quarter of section 26, township 30 south, range 24 east, was $\frac{1}{24}$ of the royalty or $\frac{1}{192}$ part of the 75 per cent., which would make their separate interest $\frac{1}{384}$ part of 75 per cent. of all production of oil, gas, and other substances obtained from the quarter section mentioned. Prior to the settlement of the controversy between McEwen and Wilson, the Security Trust Company on September 21, 1921, entered into an agreement with certain of the locators who were entitled to a part of the royalty on the above-described quarter section, whereby the Associated Oil Company was to pay to the Security Trust Company the royalties, and the owners of such royalties were to receive from such trust company the distributive share to which each was entitled. Thereafter, W. S. Lierly brought the present action against the Security Trust Company to recover the royalties in its hands. This action set forth the trust agreement and then alleged the reception by the trust company of a certain sum of money from the oil company. The action was filed on March 20, 1923, subsequent to the rendition of the decree in McEwen v. Wilson. On application of the trust company an order was made permitting it to pay the amount into court, and certain of the royalty owners were then substituted as defendants in the action. As above recited, certain of these defendants filed pleadings. McEwen answered denying any knowledge of the contract of September 21, 1921, with the trust company, and he also alleged that he was not a party to that contract. He then referred to his action against Wilson wherein it was adjudged and decreed that he was the owner and entitled to the possession of $\frac{1}{384}$ part of 75 per cent. of the royalty due from the oil company under the agreement of April 2, 1921; that the judgment had become final. Wilson also filed an answer claiming a $\frac{1}{48}$ interest in the royalties. The action proceeded to trial before the court, without a jury. There was introduced in evidence a certain schedule prepared by W. W. Kaye, Esq., one of the attorneys for plaintiffs herein, which purported to show the proportionate interests of the various grantors and their successors in interest in the fund. This schedule adopts the number 5120 as a common denominator or number of shares into which the entire fractional interests of the several locators and their successors in interest is to be divided. It recites that Wilson is entitled to 80 shares and McEwen to an equal number. Under this computation Wilson and McEwen would be entitled to $\frac{80}{5120}$, or, reduced to its lowest terms, $\frac{1}{64}$ of one-third, or $\frac{1}{192}$ of the total royalties payable to each of the eight locators, of one of the three quarter sections surrendered to the government; there being, as above pointed out, twenty-four locators on the three quarter sections surrendered. The trial court adopted the schedule as showing the interest that each party to the action owned in the fund and rendered judgment accordingly.

It is appellant McEwen's contention that he was in no manner bound by the agreement entered into on September 21, 1921, by certain of the locators with the Security Trust Company, as he was not a party to it; that his rights were fixed and determined under his contract with the oil company, and that never having conveyed any of this interest he was by reason of his judgment against Wilson entitled to one-half of the $\frac{1}{192}$ part of 75 per cent. of the royalties obtained from the oil company, which would be $\frac{1}{384}$ of 75 per cent. But, as pointed out, the schedule or agreement with the Security Trust Company assigned to defendant Wilson and also to McEwen $\frac{1}{64}$ of one-third, or $\frac{1}{192}$ each of the total royalties. By the allegations in his answer and also under the prayer thereof, McEwen claims to be entitled under his judgment against Wilson to $\frac{1}{384}$ of 75 per cent. of all of the royalties from the wells in question. It will thus be observed that the agreement assigned to him a considerably larger portion of the royalties than he claims. The judgment of the court follows the schedule, and while he was not a party to the agreement with the trust company he has been awarded a greater amount than he claims. He is therefore not injured by the judgment and consequently in no position to complain. The judgment is affirmed.

LATKY et ux. v. WOLFE. (Civ. 3295.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 6, 1927.

1. Pleading $\S$ 18—Complaint generally alleging that defendant negligently operated, maintained, and controlled automobile held not insufficient for uncertainty.

Complaint alleging that defendant negligently, carelessly, recklessly, and unlawfully drove, operated, maintained, and controlled his automobile, so that plaintiff was injured, held not insufficient for uncertainty in not more specifically setting forth in what manner defendant was negligent.

2. Negligence $\S$ 11(1)—In personal injury cases, negligence may be alleged in general language.

In personal injury cases, it is not necessary to specifically allege various acts which constitute negligence; allegation of negligence in general language being sufficient.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1040(10)—Possible error in overruling demurrer for uncertainty held without prejudice, where issues were clearly and fully tried.

Possible error in overruling demurrer for uncertainty held without prejudice, where the demurring party was not misled by the alleged defects in the pleading, and the case was fairly tried on its merits.

4. Damages $\S$ 158(1)—Under general allegations of injuries in automobile accident, proof of specific injuries held proper.

Where the plaintiffs in an automobile accident case generally alleged injuries suffered, it was proper and competent to prove any specific physical injury or mental impairment which injured plaintiff might have sustained.

5. Pleading $\S$ 18—Use of word "unlawfully" in describing negligence, while surplusage, held not to imply violation of unnamed statute or ordinance, making complaint uncertain.

Complaint alleging that defendant "unlawfully" controlled his automobile so as to injure plaintiff held not uncertain because no statute or ordinance was named, since the use of the word "unlawfully" in describing negligence, while mere surplusage, did not necessarily imply violation of a statute or ordinance.

6. Appeal and error $\S$ 843(1)—Review of assignments of errors held unnecessary, where alleged errors, in any event, were not so prejudicial as to require reversal.

Where alleged errors, in any event, were not so prejudicial as to require reversal, it was deemed unnecessary to review assignments of error based thereon.

7. Evidence $\S$ 474(11)—Plaintiff, injured in automobile accident, held competent to testify as to physical condition prior to and following accident.

Plaintiff, injured by being struck by defendant's automobile rolling down incline, held competent to give testimony as to her physical condition prior to and following the accident as indicative of the effect her injuries had upon her body and mind.

8. Evidence $\S$ 222(2)—Statement by defendant automobile owner whose automobile rolled down hill, injuring plaintiff, admitting possibility of defective brakes, held admissible.

Statement made by defendant automobile owner whose automobile rolled down an incline, injuring the plaintiff, in answer to question as to how the accident could have happened, to the effect that he could not understand unless his brakes were out of order, held admissible, being in the nature of an admission.

9. Evidence ⇨222(2)—Declarations made by defendant in personal injury case, tending to show admission of negligence, are admissible.

Any declarations made by defendant in personal injury case, tending to show admission by him that he was guilty of negligence charged against him, are admissible in evidence.

10. Negligence ⇨119(4)—Proving defective automobile brakes under general allegations of negligence held proper.

Where injuries are charged in complaint to have been caused by negligence of automobile driver, it is proper, under general allegations of negligence, to prove brakes were defective.

11. Evidence ⇨528(2)—Question to doctor as to whether automobile accident contributed to recurrence of tuberculosis held proper.

Question to a doctor as to whether injuries received by plaintiff in an automobile accident contributed to the recurrence of tuberculosis of which she had been cured some years before held competent.

12. Evidence ⇨477(3)—Testimony of husband of plaintiff injured by automobile describing her condition as he observed it held competent (Code Civ. Proc. § 1845).

Testimony of the husband of plaintiff injured by automobile, describing her condition as he had observed it after her return from sanatorium where she had been under treatment for several weeks after the accident, held competent, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1845.

13. Witnesses ⇨240(2)—Leading questions are sometimes allowable in court's discretion where situation makes questions so framed necessary.

Leading questions on direct examination are sometimes allowable in the discretion of the court where the situation is such as to make questions so framed necessary.

14. Appeal and error ⇨1048(3)—Asking leading questions, though improper, held harmless.

Where improperly asking leading questions did not affect appellant's substantial rights, error held harmless.

15. Appeal and error ⇨930(2)—Where court charged jury could only find $341 for medical services, appellate court assumed verdict for personal injuries included $341 for doctors' bills.

Where, in automobile injury case, doctors' bills to amount of $341 were admitted as evidence and court charged that the jury's verdict for the element of doctors' services could not exceed that amount, and jury did not segregate elements of damage in verdict, appellate court assumed jury allowed $341 for medical services.

16. Damages ⇨116—Measure of damages for medical services is reasonable value of services.

The proper measure of damages for medical services in a case arising from an automobile accident is the reasonable value of the services rendered.

17. Damages ⇨191—Amounts paid for medical treatment are sufficient evidence of reasonable value, in absence of contrary showing.

Where bills for medical treatment have been paid, the amounts paid are sufficient evidence of reasonable value, in the absence of a contrary showing, to support finding to that effect.

18. Damages ⇨191—In automobile accident case, where it was not shown unpaid medical bills represented reasonable value of services, verdict partially based thereon was to that extent reduced.

In automobile accident case where it was not proved that unpaid medical bills represented the reasonable value of the medical services, a verdict for personal injuries, which was presumed to include the amount of the unpaid bills, was reduced in the amount represented by such bills.

19. Appeal and error ⇨930(1)—Appellate court must assume testimony of witnesses for prevailing plaintiff in automobile accident case was credited by jury.

Where plaintiff injured by automobile prevails in action brought to recover for injuries, appellate court must assume that the testimony of witnesses favorable to plaintiff was credited by the jury.

20. Municipal corporations ⇨705(6)—Parking car on incline without taking precautions to prevent its rolling down grade held to constitute "gross negligence."

Parking automobile on the incline of a grade and leaving it there unattended without taking necessary precautions to prevent it from leaving its position and rolling down the grade held to constitute "gross negligence."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gross Negligence.]

21. Municipal corporations ⇨705(6)—Knowledge that automobile left at top of incline unattended is liable to roll down is imputable to driver.

Knowledge that a car left on an incline unattended might be expected to roll down the incline from concussion produced by heavy traffic is imputable to driver, who is accustomed to driving and otherwise handling automobiles.

22. Municipal corporations ⇨706(5)—Where testimony showed brakes could hold automobile on incline, it was permissible inference that automobile rolled down, injuring plaintiff, because brakes were not properly set.

Where defendant testified that his automobile had been able to stand on an incline without rolling away shortly after it had rolled down the incline and injured plaintiff, it was permissible inference that the automobile rolled down when plaintiff was injured, because the brakes had not been properly set.

23. Municipal corporations ⇨705(6)—Automobile driver leaving car on incline had duty to see that brakes were properly set.

Where automobile driver left his automobile on an incline unattended, it was his duty to see that his brakes were properly set.

24. Damages ⚡96—In action for automobile injury, assessment of damages held for jury.

In action for injury sustained from an automobile accident, the measure of damages held not fixed by any precise rule of law but to be a question for the jury.

25. Appeal and error ⚡1004(1)—Unless damages allowed by jury for injuries from automobile accident are flagrantly outrageous, award will not be disturbed.

The appellate court will not interfere with a jury award of damages in an automobile accident case unless it can justly be held, from the face of the record or as a matter of law, that the damages awarded are flagrantly outrageous and extravagant.

26. Damages ⚡132(1), 133—$9,000 held not excessive damages for husband and wife, where wife, 49 years old, in good health, suffered intense pains, physical and nervous ailments, and incapacity for household work.

$9,000 held not excessive damages to husband and wife where the wife, 49 years old, was injured by defendant's automobile, causing intense pains, seriously impairing her nervous system, possibly causing a recurrence of tubercular trouble, making it impossible for her to perform usual household duties, and otherwise injuring her internally.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by John T. Latky and wife against Fred Wolfe. Judgment for plaintiffs. From the judgment and certain interlocutory orders, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Butler, Van Dyke & Desmond, of Sacramento, and Hartley F. Peart and Gus L. Baraty, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action for damages in the total sum of $31,655.56 for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, Mary A. Latky, by and through the alleged negligence of the defendant, which includes the sum of $6,655.56 for damage alleged to have been suffered by her husband (coplaintiff) as the direct consequence of the physical injuries alleged to have been so inflicted upon her.

The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiffs in the aggregate sum of $9,000. Judgment was entered accordingly, after a motion for a new trial was made by defendant and denied by the court.

The appeal is by defendant from said judgment, "and from each and every other interlocutory order made by the court," and upon a bill of exceptions.

Exceptions to the ruling on the demurrer to the complaint, to rulings with respect to the admissibility of certain evidence, to certain instructions, given and refused, and the claim that the verdict does not derive sufficient support from the evidence constitute the complaints urged against the result arrived at below.

The brief of the plaintiffs, save in a few particulars, contains an accurate statement of the facts brought out by the testimony presented by them to support the allegations of the complaint and also some of the facts testified to by defendant. Said statement, corrected, though, in the particulars in which the inaccuracies referred to appear, so that it will conform to the testimony so presented, will, in part, be adopted as the statement of the facts herein, as follows:

The plaintiffs are husband and wife, residing on their ranch, consisting of 70 acres of young almond trees, situated about 5 miles out of Winters. On the morning of April 24, 1923, Mrs. Latky drove their auto, accompanied by a neighbor, Mrs. Sellers, to Sacramento to do some shopping, purchasing, among other things, a supply of groceries at Hale Bros., and about closing time she drove her auto, a single seated Overland coupé, in the alley to the rear of Hale's store to have the articles purchased placed in the car. This alley is regularly used by vehicles and is sufficiently wide to permit of the passage of two vehicles; it is immediately to the rear of Hale's store, and runs in a general easterly and westerly direction, connecting Eighth and Ninth streets; it is paved with cobblestone; the alley has quite a steep grade downward from Ninth street; from Ninth street the alley runs down grade for about 35 feet, at which point it continues onward on the level.

Mrs. Latky drove her auto down this grade in a westerly direction to the level portion of the alley and came to a stop about 10 or 15 feet beyond the bottom of this slope; her car was close to the building on her right side. Mrs. Latky stood at the rear left fender of her car, while an employee of Hale's (Witness Thomas) placed the groceries in the rear of her auto. This task completed, Mrs. Latky was about to step into her car, when she was struck by defendant's auto, which had run down this incline from Ninth street without a driver; she was thrown and knocked to the ground and pinned under defendant's auto, as a result of which she sustained severe and permanent injuries, and her husband deprived of her help and companionship.

Defendant, Fred Wolfe, an employee of Hale's—it was closing time at the store—had driven his touring car into this alley from Ninth street; he saw the Latky car at the bottom of the incline with the delivery boys around it, and also noticed the trucks of Hale Bros. on the opposite side of the alley to the Latky car. Wolfe stopped his car about halfway down the incline or near the top of the grade; he claims he put on the emergency brake, he did not put it in gear, nor turn the wheels toward the building on his immediate right; he then jumped from his car and left it and started to walk back to the top of the incline to get a package in the store. Just then, as he entered the store, he heard a cry, turned around, and tried to jump onto his moving automobile to stop it, but could not do so. Defendant's auto came down this incline at a good speed. After the car had struck Mrs. Latky, it was pushed back off her body and clothes by "quite a few" men without any one first attempting to release or manipulate the brakes.

The evidence showed that, just prior to the accident, Mrs. Latky was of the age of 49 years and that, although in ill health and under treatment by a doctor for tubercular trouble for several months in the year 1919—from April 30th to August 6th of that year—when she was discharged as cured by her physician, she was, from the last-mentioned date to the time of the accident, in good health, an active woman, and capable of and actually attending to her household duties, "doing all of the housework in a five-room modern bungalow, with porches, doing all the washing, cooking for herself and husband and extra men, when necessary." She planted and attended to a vegetable garden which supplies vegetables for the ranch, watered, and weeded it; she had a nice flower garden which she cared for; she had planted and started a young nursery; she had 200 hens and had raised and attended to about 300 young chickens. She drove the auto almost every day for errands to the surrounding cities.

As a result of the injuries sustained when she was struck by defendant's auto, she was rendered unconscious and removed to the Emergency Hospital; she sustained a fracture of the left fibula and a severe cut on her forehead; "pain and suffering was severe; her head was paining as were her eyes, and there was a large lump raised on her head. During all the time she remained in the Emergency Hospital the pain was excruciating. Prior to the accident her hair was black with streaks of gray. When Mrs. Latky was finally taken to her home her hair was white."

She remained in the Emergency Hospital until the night of the 24th of April. She was put on a stretcher and taken by ambulance to the Sisters' Hospital in Sacramento, where she was put under the care of Dr. Von Geldern, and she remained in this hospital for two months. Long splints were placed on her left side from under her arms down to the bottom of her feet and on both sides of the left leg. She suffered severe pain to the left leg and to her head and neck. When she left the Sisters' Hospital, she was not able to walk; she was taken home in a wheel chair placed in an ambulance. She remained home at Winters for about ten days and was in bed continuously. She was then taken to San Francisco by automobile, propped up in a bed. She was taken to a hotel in San Francisco, where she remained seven days, confined to her bed, with the exception of several trips to the doctor's office, which were made by taxi and by the aid of two men. She was then taken to a sanatorium at Belmont, where she was under constant medical treatment and remained there about five or six weeks. From there she went in an ambulance on August 10, 1923, to the University of California Hospital in San Francisco, where she remained for a further period of six or seven weeks under the care of several physicians and surgeons. A cast was applied to the left leg at the sanatorium at Belmont; it was removed at the University of California Hospital. During all of this time she suffered severe pain. While at the University of California Hospital it was necessary to put a cradle over her body, and this cradle was used for about four months for the reason that she could not stand the weight of bedclothes. She remained in the University of California Hospital, suffering great pain and under constant medical attention, until September, 1923, when she returned to her home. At home she was practically unable to attend to any of the ordinary duties of a housewife; she was constantly attended to by her husband.

When the action was commenced January 30, 1924, Mrs. Latky had not yet discarded crutches; at the time of the accident she weighed 193 pounds; at the time of the trial she weighed 160 pounds—she then weighed more at the time of trial than a few months prior thereto. At the time of the trial, one year after the accident, "Mrs. Latky was still suffering pain in her leg, back, and arm; she had almost lost the hearing of her right ear, sleeps but little; her eyes are painful; she is unable to read. * * * She was in the hospital with the injuries set forth above for three months; for another four months she was confined to her home on crutches;" and at the time of the trial "we find a woman unable to do any housework, with hearing and eyesight gone—unable to be of any help, or assistance to her husband—she is wrecked in body and spirits."

Certain other facts, particularly those to which the defendant testified and to which reference has to some extent been made above, will be adverted to and considered when we come to the consideration of the point made by the defendant that the verdict or judgment is not supported by the evidence, and that the verdict is excessive.

The complaint, in language appropriate to pleadings, sets forth the essential facts embraced within the foregoing statement.

The defendant filed a demurrer to the complaint for want of facts and also on the special grounds that it is ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain. The demurrer was disallowed, and the defendant answered by a specific denial of each and every material fact alleged in the complaint.

1. The salient averments of the complaint are:

"* * * That the defendant so negligently, carelessly, recklessly and unlawfully drove, operated, maintained, and controlled his said automobile so that by reason thereof said automobile struck and ran into and against plaintiff Mary A. Latky, injuring the person of plaintiff Mary A. Latky, and injuring and damaging plaintiffs to the extent hereinafter alleged.

"That by reason of the said negligence, carelessness, recklessness, and unlawful driving and operating of said automobile by defendant, the plaintiff Mary A. Latky was struck by the said automobile, and was thrown and crushed to the ground, and was severely injured in her person, as follows: She was injured, bruised, cut, and contused about the body, arms, limbs, elbows, knees, neck, head, ears, and eyes; she sustained a severe shock to her nervous system and body and a severe wrenching of her spine and back; that her right eye was injured; and that her left leg was fractured; that her hearing has been impaired; that she sustained internal injuries; that ever since the said 24th day of April, 1923, said plaintiff has been sick, sore, disabled, and weak; that said plaintiff has sustained permanent injury to her left leg, her back, head, ears, and eyes, and to her health in general; that plaintiff has lost many pounds in weight; that ever since said 24th day of April, 1923, said plaintiff has suffered intense and excruciating pain and suffering; she has been unable to sleep for any length of time; has been confined to hospitals for the greater part of the said time and has been continuously, except at odd intervals, in bed; that said plaintiff is able to get about only with the aid of crutches."

[1, 2] The specific criticism of the complaint is that it is uncertain, in that it cannot be determined therefrom in what manner the defendant "unlawfully drove" his automobile, or in what manner, if at all, he "negligently, carelessly, recklessly, or unlawfully maintained his automobile," or what was the nature of the internal injuries plaintiff Mary A. Latky sustained, or "how many pounds in weight" it is claimed she lost in consequence of her alleged injuries, or "for what length of time" it is claimed she was "confined to hospitals."

[3] The objections to the complaint are untenable. It is, in this state—and we may, from the good sense of the rule, assume also in other jurisdictions—a well-established rule of pleading in personal injury cases that negligence may be alleged in general language. "What was done being stated, it is sufficient to say it was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent. But it must appear from the facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury." Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 P. 663. See, also, Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 P. 29; Wiley

v. Cole, 52 Cal. App. 617, 199 P. 550; Tietke v. Forrest, 64 Cal. App. 364, 221 P. 681. The complaint in Stein v. United Railroads, supra, was in language quite similar to that by which the negligence imputed to the defendant here is alleged. Moreover, it is further said in the Stein Case, and the same is equally true in this, that:

"Even if it were error (and it was not), to overrule the demurrer for uncertainty, it was error without prejudice unless the demurring party was misled by the defects in the pleading and the case [by reason thereof] was not fairly tried on the merits. Here it appears that the issues were all fully, fairly, and understandingly tried. Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234, 90 P. 936; Irrgang v. Ott, 9 Cal. App. 440, 99 P. 528."

See, also, Dennis v. Crocker-Huffman, etc., Co., 6 Cal. App. 58, 61, 91 P. 425, and cases therein cited.

[4] Under the general averments as to the injuries suffered by plaintiff Mary A. Latky, which are alleged to have been proximately caused by defendant's negligence, it was proper and competent for plaintiffs to prove any specific physical injury or any mental impairment which thus she might have sustained. "A plaintiff is not required to allege specifically each physical injury sustained or which may have resulted from the accident. It is sufficient if such injuries can be traced to the occurrence complained of and are such as might naturally result from the injury." Kuhns v. Marshall, 44 Cal. App. 588, 186 P. 682; Samuels v. California St. Ry. Co., 124 Cal. 296, 56 P. 1115; Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 22 P. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175; Worden v. Central Fire Proof Bldg. Co., 172 Cal. 94, 155 P. 839.

[5] The complaint that the use of the word "unlawfully" in describing the general character or nature of the negligence charged in the complaint against the defendant necessarily implies that such negligence was in the violation by the defendant of some particular statute or local ordinance, and that, therefore, the complaint is obnoxious to the objection of uncertainty in that it does not by reference or otherwise plead such statute or such ordinance, cannot be sustained. Indeed, a complete answer to the proposition is to be found in the case of Wiley v. Cole, 52 Cal. App. 617, 199 P. 550. It is obvious that the word "unlawfully" was used in the complaint for the purpose of characterizing in a general way the conduct of the defendant constituting the negligence, which, plaintiffs say, was the proximate or efficient cause of the injuries which were inflicted upon the plaintiff Mary A. Latky. Manifestly, if defendant were guilty of negligence as alleged in the complaint, and with the result as so alleged, such negligence was wrongful and unlawful. Every infringement of a right and every tort or other actionable wrong are, in the very nature of the case, unlawful. But the employment of the word "unlawfully" in the connection in which it is used in the complaint was unnecessary and is surplusage. The use of the word as descriptive of the negligence alleged neither added to nor operated to detract from the sufficiency of the complaint in the statement of a cause of action for negligence. Wiley v. Cole, supra.

Further consideration of the complaint is not required. The pleading is impregnable as against all the objections urged by the demurrer.

[6] 2. There are here urged too many exceptions to the rulings of the trial court on the question of the admissibility of certain testimony to justify an attempt to give each special attention herein. In fact, such a review herein of those assignments is deemed to be unnecessary, since a careful examination of each of said assignments has made it clear to our minds that none of them, even if it were true that any is well founded (and we do not so hold), is of such gravity, or so prejudicial as to warrant a reversal of the judgment. We will, however, refer to some of them in a general way by stating what it was competent for the plaintiffs to prove, under the averments of their complaint, either by their own testimony or that of other witnesses.

[7] We have already declared that the plaintiffs were entitled to show, in response to the issues made by the complaint and the answer thereto, any particular physical injury directly resulting to the injured plaintiff from the accident. It was competent for Mrs. Latky herself to give testimony as to her physical condition prior to and following the accident as indicative of the effect that the injuries she received in the accident had upon her body or her mind. For instance, it was proper for her to testify, as she did, that a large lump was produced upon her head; that her left leg was so injured as to necessitate the placing of her leg in a splint; that her hair, before the accident "iron gray" in color, shortly after the accident turned entirely white; that she was examined and treated by her physicians for "internal disturbances"; that she suffered pain in her left side; that, after the accident and resultant injuries, she experienced severe pains in her stomach; that she was troubled with nausea, and became so nervous that "moving and turning in bed" caused her to vomit; that her urinary organs (kidneys and bladder) were so affected by her injuries that she was compelled, after receiving them, to empty her bladder at inordinately frequent intervals. The following cases approve the action of the trial courts as proper in allowing a party complaining of injury sustained through the negligence of another to give the same character of testimony as the foregoing by the injured party in this case: Freiburg v. Israel, 45 Cal. App. 138, 187 P. 130; Ehat v. Scheidt, 17 Cal. App. 430, 120 P. 49; Samuels v. Cal. St. Ry. Co., supra; Kuhns v. Marshall, supra. As to all these matters, it may be stated, the physicians professionally attending and treating Mrs. Latky for her injuries described with technical nicety the nature thereof and their effect upon her generally, and that her description of her wounds and their effect upon her physical organization was, as far as she went, substantially the same as that given by the medical men.

[8, 9] The witness Mrs. Maybelle Sellers, a friend of Mrs. Latky, and who accompanied the latter to Sacramento on the day of the accident and who was present when it occurred, testified that she held a conversation with the defendant immediately after the accident happened. She was asked by one of the counsel for plaintiff:

"Now, what was that conversation? A. I said, 'How could that terrible accident have happened?' He (defendant) said, 'I cannot understand, unless my brakes were out of order.'"

At this juncture, or after a few more immaterial words of the conversation were given the witness, counsel for the defendant moved to strike out that part of the testimony of the witness stating that defendant said that he did not understand how the accident happened "unless my brakes were out of order." The motion was denied, and it is here claimed that thus the court erred. The statement of the defendant with reference to the brakes on his automobile did not, as is obvious, involve a direct admission that they were defective or out of order, yet the statement was more or less pregnant with an admission that he (defendant) had not taken the precautionary measures to prevent his car, if unattended by any one, from moving down the grade or decline by gravity which the peculiar circumstances of the situation, of his own creation, would naturally seem to have suggested and required. The testimony was relevant and material and, therefore, admissible for what it was worth and its weight for the jury's determination. Of course, it will not be doubted that any declarations made by a defendant in cases of the class to which this belongs tending to show an admission by him that he was guilty of the negligence charged against him are admissible in evidence. See, on this proposition, Scott v. Sciaroni, 66 Cal. App. 577, 226 P. 827.

[10] Nor will it be doubted that, in cases where, as here, the injuries complained of are charged in the complaint to have been caused by the negligence of a driver of an automobile in operating or otherwise handling his car, it is competent and proper under general allegations of negligence, or in other words, where, as here, there is no specific charge that the brakes were defective, to prove that the brakes of the car were, at the time of the mishap, in a defective condition. Carnahan v. Motor Transit Co., 65 Cal. App. 402, 224 P. 143; Wirthman v. Isenstein, 182 Cal., 108, 187 P. 12.

[11] Mrs. Latky, as seen, was, a few years prior to the accident, afflicted with tuberculosis, and was for many months for that disease under the care and treatment of Dr. H. C. Warren, a specialist in lung diseases at the Belmont Sanatorium, in this state. The doctor's treatment effected a cure of Mrs. Latky, and she was discharged by the doctor as cured in the latter part of the year 1919. Within a few months after the accident, she returned to Dr. Warren, and, upon examination, it was found that there was evidence of a recurrence of her lung trouble. When on the witness stand in this case, Dr. Warren, testifying on behalf of plaintiffs, was asked by counsel for plaintiffs whether, in his opinion, the injuries received by Mrs. Latky in the automobile accident in question were a contributing factor to the return of her tubercular affliction. The question was objected to and the objection overruled. The answer in effect was that, in the absence of any evidence of a recurrence of the lung trouble from any other cause, it might be expected that the revival of the tubercular condition was superinduced by the injuries she had received. The question was proper and the answer responsive. Such questions to a medical doctor call for the testimony of an expert upon a subject as to which expert testimony is admissible. Dow v. City of Oroville, 22 Cal. App. 215, 134 P. 197.

[12] The husband and coplaintiff of Mrs. Latky was questioned with regard to the physical condition of the latter subsequent to her return to her home from the sanatorium at which she had been under treatment for several weeks after the accident, and, over objections by counsel for defendant, was allowed to describe her condition as he observed it. The ground of the objections was that the questions called "for the opinion and conclusion" of the witness. The witness was competent to describe the condition of Mrs. Latky as he observed it. A lay witness is competent to give testimony upon such subjects where "the injury is such as that its nature, extent, and effect would be obvious to the common mind." Carr v. Stern, 17 Cal. App. 397, 406, 120 P. 35, 39; Code Civ. Proc. § 1845.

[13, 14] With the exception of certain rulings relating to the evidence introduced by plaintiffs to prove the expenses incurred by plaintiffs for medical treatment administered to Mrs. Latky for her injuries by several doctors, and which rulings will presently be considered, the foregoing embraces a review of the more important assignments involving attacks upon the rulings of the court on matters of evidence. With reference to some of the rulings already considered and disposed of, as well as to some of those not specially considered herein, it is proper to say that to the questions involved therein the objection was also made that they were leading or suggestive of the answers desired. This complaint has some foundation for its support. Of course, such manner of examining a witness on direct examination by the party producing him is improper, sometimes allowable, however, in the discretion of the court, where the situation is such, as sometimes it does arise, as to make questions so framed necessary. But questions in such form are, comparatively speaking, rarely propounded by one to his own witness on direct, and, when considered by the light of the record in its entirety, are generally not justly regarded as so serious in their effect upon the rights of the opposing party as to justify, for that reason alone, a reversal. It is perfectly clear that such objectionable form of propounding questions to one's own witnesses, as was followed in the instances referred to here, could not, as an examination of the record will readily and convincingly show, as thus we have been satisfied, have affected, to his disadvantage or prejudice, any of the substantial rights of the defendant.

[15] 3. The plaintiffs offered, and the court permitted to be received, as in proof of the special damage sustained by them as a result of the physical injuries suffered by Mrs. Latky, and which special damage was specially pleaded in the complaint, certain bills rendered to plaintiffs by the several doctors for medical services performed by them for her in the treatment of her injuries. The aggregate amount of those bills was $341, and the court, on this subject, instructed the jury that, "There has been no testimony that plaintiffs have incurred any liability for alleged physician and surgeon services in excess of" that sum, and further instructed:

"In case you do find in favor of plaintiffs as to such alleged services, your verdict cannot exceed said amount."

The jury, in their verdict, did not segregate the damages into the several amounts which were to be assigned, respectively, to the several different items or elements of damage alleged and proved, but returned a verdict in gross or for the total amount. It is therefore to be presumed, since the special damage following from expenses incurred for medical services was by the testimony definitely fixed or stated, as measured in money, and in view of the instruction on that subject, that the jury allowed plaintiffs and included in their verdict the total amount of the expenses for medical services as stated in the instructions.

[16-18] The proper measure of damages in such a case is the reasonable value of the medical services rendered, but, as to some of the bills here, no evidence of such value of the services forming the basis thereof was offered or received. It was not even shown that the particular bills in question had been paid, a circumstance which it has been held, is some evidence of their reasonable value, and sufficient, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, to support a finding to that effect. Dewhirst v. Leopold, 194 Cal. 424, 433, 229 P. 30; Townsend v. Keith, 34 Cal. App. 564, 565, 168 P. 402; 10 Cal. Jur. § 125, pp. 842, 843, and cases cited. The bills or claims which were not shown to have been paid, and as to which no other testimony was offered or received to the effect that they represented the reasonable value of the medical services rendered, are the following: Dr. Deane, $5; Drs. Ruggles & Bryan, $30; Drs. Markel & Baldwin, $75; Dr. Lennon, $50; the total amount of the claims or bills being $160, in which amount the judgment must be reduced.

4. The action of the court in giving and refusing to give and modifying certain instructions is criticized by defendant. None of the points so urged merits special attention herein. The charge of the court to the jury embraced a singularly clear, and a full and correct statement of the law of the case as it was made by the pleadings and the proofs. Every principle of law pertinent to the facts was correctly submitted to the jury by the court. The given instructions to which the defendant here objects have been approved by the Supreme Court in many personal injury cases, the general facts of which are similar to those here. The modification of certain instructions proposed by the defendant, and given as so modified, did not have the effect of so changing such instructions as to render them ineffective in stating clearly the principles or rules of law therein sought to be stated.

[19] 5. The claim that the verdict is without sufficient evidentiary support and that the amount of damages awarded by the jury is excessive is untenable. The circumstances under which the accident happened, as detailed by the witnesses, principally those of the plaintiffs, and as hereinabove presented, being, as we must assume, credited by the jury, are such as to have justified them in finding that it was defendant's negligence which directly or proximately caused Mrs. Latky's injuries. But the defendant's own testimony is almost conclusive of the fact that he was negligent in parking his car as described, and that such negligence was the efficient cause of the accident and its consequences as alleged in the complaint. He testified that at the time of the accident he stopped his automobile on the incline and "put on the emergency brakes"; that he then left the automobile and "went into * * * the entrance of the store" to get a parcel; that as he "was going inside of the store and was clear inside the entrance," he "heard somebody holler"; that he thereupon "turned around and jumped over to my car, tried to jump to it; it was too late;" that he had to release the brakes in order to push the car back; that after the accident the "automobile stood on the incline all the time when I set the brakes the last time and did not roll away." On cross-examination, he stated that his car was a secondhand automobile when he bought it, it being a 1919 model; that it then had been driven about 20,000 miles. He further stated that after the car was "rolled back" from the point where it struck Mrs. Latky he had to get into it in order to hold it. " * * * My car," he proceeded to say, "stood on the incline all the time when I set the brakes the last time and did not roll away. * * * I did not turn the front wheels in toward the north wall of the alley. I just put on the emergency brakes and jumped out of the car and left it."

[20, 21] There is no reasonable ground for doubt that the defendant's act in parking his car on the incline of the grade and leaving it there parked and unattended, without taking extra precautions which those circumstances would seem to require, to prevent the car from leaving its position and going down the grade, constituted gross negligence. In such a situation, a car left stationed on the brow of an incline, unattended by any one, might be expected to leave its position at any time and proceed down the incline, from the concussion necessarily and constantly produced by the heavy auto traffic or the movements with the usual speed of the bulky trucks and other automotive vehicles along the street with which the alley is connected, unless the brakes were perfectly intact and thoroughly set. Knowledge of these facts is imputable to those who are accustomed to driving and otherwise handling automobiles.

[22, 23] But it is not necessary to proceed further with a discussion of the evidence to show that the verdict, in so far as it is thereby found that the defendant was guilty of negligence in leaving his car in the position in which he left it under the circumstances as disclosed, is amply supported, except to suggest that the statement, to which the defendant himself testified, that after the accident and after moving his car back to the position on the incline from which he left it in the first instance, he "put the brakes on," and the car "stood on the incline all the time" and "did not roll away," is justly susceptible to the interpretation that the reason that the car did not remain in the position on the incline in which he left it to go into the store was because the brakes had not been properly set. In other words, the jury could justly, and probably did, draw the conclusion from that statement of the defendant that the brakes were in good order, and that if defendant, as it was, in view of the peculiar situation, emphatically his duty to have done, had taken the pains to see that they were properly set when he left the car to go into the Hale store, the accident would not have happened.

6. It cannot with justice be held, as a matter of law, that the damages allowed by the jury are in excess of a reasonable and fair award of compensatory relief when compared with the nature of Mrs. Latky's injuries. In other words, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the amount of damages awarded plaintiffs by the verdict is so disproportionate to the injuries shown to have been suffered by Mrs. Latky as to justify an appeal court in reversing the judgment. Meek v. Pac. R. Co., 175 Cal. 55, 164 P. 1117; Reeve v. Colusa Gas & Electric Co., 152 Cal. 99, 92 P. 89; Morgan v. Southern Pac. Co., 95 Cal. 99, 30 P. 601.

[24] As to the matter of the admeasurement of damages in actions of this character, what is said as follows in Eldridge v. Clark & Henery Construction Co., 75 Cal. App. 516, 243 P. 43, is cogently pertinent to this, as generally to all personal injury cases:

"Of course, it is to be conceded that the matter of assessing damages in a personal injury case is generally attended with more or less difficulty. The element of pain and suffering, which is proper to be taken into account with other elements in determining in such cases what would be a just admeasurement of compensatory relief, affords no definite or certain criterion by which the amount to be assigned to that item may be ascertained, and the same is often true, in a less degree perhaps, of other elements of the several which it is competent to consider in making the general award. Hence, in the last analysis, in the general run of cases, the determination by the jury of the amount which will fairly compensate for the loss sustained by reason of the defendant's tortious breach of a duty which he owes to others must be accepted as an honest, fair, intelligent, and just adjustment of the matter."

Again in Rystinki v. Central Cal. T. Co., 175 Cal. 336, 345, 165 P. 952, 956, it is said:

"This court has frequently approved the statement in Aldrich v. Palmer, 24 Cal. 513, 516, that, 'In actions for personal torts the law does not attempt to fix any precise rules for the admeasurement of damages, but, from the necessity of the case, leaves their assessment to the good sense and unbiased judgment of the jury.'"

[25] It follows from the principles thus declared that, on the question of excessive damages, the appellate court will not interfere unless it can justly be held, from the face of the record or as a matter of law, that the damages awarded are "flagrantly outrageous and extravagant," and this, as we have declared, cannot be said as to the instant case.

The court below, as before stated, instructed the jury upon every material evidentiary phase of the case, and thus in clear language advised them as to their duty in deliberating upon and considering the evidence and arriving at a final determination. Correctly, it thus told the jury that, if in their judgment the evidence satisfactorily showed that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries suffered by Mrs. Latky, it would be their duty to award plaintiff compensation by way of damages which would be fair and reasonable when measured by the nature and extent of such injuries; and likewise told the jury that the special damage alleged, if proved, should be allowed to the plaintiffs jointly—that is (and the instruction was explicit as to this), that the jury could not allow each plaintiff independently of the other, damages on the plea of special damages, etc.

[26] Under these and the other instructions constituting the general charge to the jury upon the law and the evidence disclosing the character of the injuries suffered by plaintiff Mary A. Latky, and having found that such injuries were the direct consequence of defendant's negligence, it appears that the jury, in awarding plaintiffs $9,000 on account of all the several elements of damage pleaded generally and specially, showed that they had given a commendably conservative consideration to the case as made by the evidence, so far as compensation was concerned. A brief recapitulation of the facts regarding the injuries and the physical condition in which they left Mrs. Latky may, without impropriety, here be given. For several years prior to the date of the accident, she was in excellent health, capable of and at all times actually performing the onerous and exacting duties incumbent upon a housewife. For about a year from the time of the accident, according to her own testimony and corroborated by the description of her injuries by the doctors, she suffered intense bodily pains, and at the time of the trial, which was exactly one year from the date of the accident, it was still necessary for Mrs. Latky to use crutches to enable her to walk. Her general nervous system was seriously impaired and her digestive and urinary organs so disarranged as to prevent the normal or usual functioning thereof. Because of all the physical disabilities caused by the injuries she received she was unable, at least up to the date of the trial of this action, to attend to her usual household duties in the usual way, her husband and coplaintiff being compelled to assist her therein. She was, at the time of the accident, a woman in middle life, and added to her physical pains, which must have been, and were according to her testimony, intense and excruciating, was the mental anguish and suffering that is the natural concomitant of severe physical hurts and wounds, the effects of which are of long duration.

A general résumé of our conclusions herein may thus be stated: That the complaint in all respects sufficiently and clearly and unambiguously states a cause of action for the relief herein sought; that no prejudicial errors were committed in the matter of the admission or exclusion of evidence; that the charge of the court to the jury upon the law of the case correctly and sufficiently covered all the vital questions of fact submitted to the determination of the jury; that in this connection, speaking more specifically, the court, in no part of its charge, assumed, as defendant contends, the establishment of the fact of the negligence of the defendant, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of Mrs. Latky's injuries; that the verdict is amply supported and the amount of damages awarded to plaintiffs is not excessive, or, at any rate, cannot be held so to be as a matter of law, and that, therefore, the verdict and the judgment thereupon entered, in so far as they are to be regarded as involving implied findings of the essential facts, are binding or conclusive upon this court.

The judgment, as above stated, must be modified for the reason heretofore explained, by striking therefrom the sum of $160, representing the aggregate amounts due several of the medical doctors for professional services rendered Mrs. Latky in the treatment of her injuries, thereby reducing the amount of the judgment to the sum of $8,840, and it is hereby so ordered. As so modified, the judgment is affirmed, as are also the several "interlocutory" orders from which, in omnibus form, appeals are taken by defendant. If the appeal from the orders in the form stated was intended to include the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, then, as such order is not appealable, the same is dismissed.

MILLS et ux. v. GARNER. (Civ. 5937.) *

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 13, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨185—Tender of deed, though subsequent to date when purchase price was due, placed purchaser in default, and contract terminated on purchaser's failure to perform.

Where contract for purchase of realty was not terminated on date when purchase price was to be paid by failure of vendor to tender deed and abstract, purchaser was nevertheless placed in default by subsequent affirmative action of vendor in tendering deed and abstract and demanding payment for balance due, and contract terminated on failure of purchaser to perform.

2. Quieting title ⇨44(3)—Vendor held under evidence entitled to judgment quieting title against purchaser at no time willing to pay price.

In action by vendor of realty to quiet title on purchaser's default, evidence showing that purchaser was at no time ready, able, or willing to pay balance of purchase price authorized judgment for vendor, though contract was not terminated on date when purchase price was due.

3. Evidence ⇨471(25)—Questions whether purchaser was able to perform on date of contract and whether he understood contract was concurrent held properly excluded as calling for conclusions.

In action by vendor to quiet title to land on purchaser's default, questions of purchaser whether he was ready and able to perform contract on day provided in contract, and whether it was his understanding that contract was mutual and concurrent, were properly excluded as calling for conclusion of witness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Roy Mills and wife against George W. Garner. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Richard S. Miner, of Independence, and White Smith, of Bishop, for appellants.

Swallow & Richards, A. H. Swallow, and Robert Richards, all of Bishop, for respondents.

WARNE, Justice pro tem. This is an action to quiet title to certain real property in Inyo county, together with certain shares of the capital stock of Bishop Creek Ditch Company, a corporation, and the waters for irrigation of said lands represented by said shares and furnished to said land by said corporation. Judgment passed for plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial.

Under date of March 20, 1922, the parties to this action entered into a written contract for the purchase and sale of said property, and defendant paid to plaintiffs the sum of $1,500 upon the purchase price. The balance of the purchase price was to be paid on or before January 1, 1924, and the contract further provided:

"The parties of the first part agree that, when the second party shall pay or cause to be paid the balance due, then they will make a good and merchantable deed to second party with an abstract showing said property free of all debts and incumbrances except such expenses as might arise under the water settlement which is now under negotiation which second party agrees to assume.

"The party of the second part agrees to make the payments as they shall become due and all taxes and interest that shall become due, and, in case that he shall fail or refuse to make such payments as they become due, then to forfeit all money paid and improvements made, and said property, and first parties to have immediate possession and ownership in said property restored in full. But if first parties shall receive payment in full and second party shall keep all the covenants and conditions, then said deed to be executed as herein set forth."

The defendant answered, setting up the contract of sale, and alleged an offer to fully perform according to the terms of the contract on his part, but inability and refusal to perform on the part of the plaintiff. The court, after finding all the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint to be true and that defendant's claim was invalid and groundless, found that plaintiffs had duly performed and fulfilled all and singular the terms and conditions on their part to be performed and to be fulfilled of the contract, but that defendant has not performed or fulfilled any of the terms or conditions of said contract on his part to be performed and fulfilled, and by reason whereof said contract is no longer in force and effect, and that the real and personal property therein described was not subject to the terms and conditions of the contract.

Nothing was done on January 1, 1924, by either party; that is, plaintiffs did not tender a deed and abstract to defendant and demand payment, nor did defendant pay or tender to plaintiffs the balance due under the contract. On March 17, 1923, plaintiff Mills notified the defendant in writing that he (defendant) was in default under his contract, and that accordingly that plaintiffs had canceled and rescinded the agreement. The defendant did not respond to this notice, and the plaintiffs took no further action until April 18, 1924, when they tendered to defendant a deed and abstract and made written demand for the payment of the balance due under the contract. The demand was not complied with, and the plaintiffs commenced this action on April 25, 1924.

It is admitted that the balance due on the purchase price of the property has not been paid.

Defendant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, and that the decision and judgment is against law, on the theory that the delivery of the deed and abstract and the payment of the balance due on the purchase price were dependent and concurrent conditions, and in support of this contention he cites the case of Kerr v. Reed, 187 Cal. 411, 202 P. 142, and cases cited therein, where the Supreme Court announced that it was thoroughly established that, when the final payment comes due under a contract in which time is of the essence of the contract, the obligation to make the payment and the obligation on the part of the vendor to make a deed are dependent and concurrent conditions.

[1] We fail to see wherein the rule as announced in Kerr v. Reed, supra, is applicable to the case at bar. Conceding that the contract was not terminated on January 1, 1924, by reason of the plaintiffs having failed to tender the defendant a deed and abstract to the property, nevertheless, the defendant was placed in default by the affirmative action of the plaintiffs in tendering defendant a deed and abstract on April 18, 1924, and demanding payment of the balance due. The contract was terminated by the failure of the defendant to perform after notice. Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 P. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126; 25 Cal. Juris. 618.

[2] The defendant was offered every reasonable opportunity to pay, but failed to do so. The evidence clearly shows that he was at no time ready, able, or willing to pay the balance of the purchase price. The findings are amply supported by the evidence, and the decision and judgment are not contrary to the law.

[3] The appellant also contends that the court committed error in sustaining plaintiffs' objection to the following questions:

"Were you ready and able to perform that contract with Mr. Mills on the 1st day of January, 1924, on the day provided in the contract? And when the contract was made by yourself and Mr. Mills, was it your understanding of that contract that it would be mutual and concurrent and that the abstract was to come at the same time the money was paid?"

The trial court properly sustained the objections to these questions on the ground that the same called for the conclusions of the witness.

No other points appear worthy of discussion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DERRICK. (Cr. 1500.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 13, 1927.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 478(1)—Experts deciphering slips containing wagers on horse races were not disqualified because of inability to decipher figures on back (Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4).

Where police officers, testifying in prosecution under Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4, for keeping a room with papers and paraphernalia for purpose of wagering on horse races, testified as experts in deciphering certain slips of paper containing wagers, it was unnecessary that they be able to decipher certain figures on the back of such slips, after testifying in substance that such figures did not relate to subject-matter set down on the front, which was complete in itself.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 481, 1153(2)—Trial court has broad discretion in determining qualifications of expert, and ruling will be sustained, save for manifest error.

Trial court is vested with broad legal discretion in determining the qualifications of one who offers himself as an expert witness, and ruling thereon must be sustained, in absence of manifest error.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 472—Characters on slips used in recording bids on horse races held proper subject of expert testimony.

Characters on slips containing record of wagers of money on horse race, with some identification of person laying bet, held proper subject of expert testimony.

4. Witnesses $\S$ 37(4)—Excluding character testimony on ground witnesses did not know defendant's residence address held erroneous (Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4).

In prosecution for violation of Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4, relative to wagering on horse races, excluding certain character testimony on ground witnesses did not know residence address of defendant held erroneous.

5. Witnesses $\S$ 280—Questioning police officer relative to failure to mention observing prosecuting witness on defendant's premises, though testifying at preliminary hearing, held improper cross-examination (Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4, relative to wagering on horse races, questioning police officer relative to fact that, though he had testified at preliminary hearing, he had not before trial said anything about observing prosecuting witness on defendant's premises, held improper cross-examination, as being so worded as to call for immaterial response.

6. Gaming $\S$ 102—Instruction that writing of record of bet on horse race was not indispensable to establish recording held not erroneous under evidence (Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4, relative to wagering on horse racas, instruction that, in order to establish recording of bet, it was not indispensable that writing of record itself be produced, held not erroneous under evidence justifying conclusion that it was plan or practice of defendant to record wagers on slips produced before the jury.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4)—Evidence, in prosecution under law relative to wagers on horse races, held to render nonprejudicial erroneous exclusion of character testimony (Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4; Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, $\S$ 337a, subds. 2-4, relative to wagers on horse races, evidence held such as to render nonprejudicial, within Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, the erroneous exclusion of character testimony on ground witnesses did not know defendant's residence address.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

J. E. Derrick was convicted of keeping a room with papers and paraphernalia for the purpose of recording wagers on horse races, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Johnson, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendant was charged in an information consisting of three counts, with the offenses denounced by section 337a of the Penal Code, in subdivisions 2, 3, and 4 thereof, the first count accusing him in effect of keeping a room with papers and paraphernalia for the purpose of recording wagers laid on horse races, the second of holding or forwarding money wagered on horse races, and the third of registering a wager upon a horse race. The section of the Code is not limited to this specific contest, but it would extend this opinion beyond proper length to define the offenses with greater particularity. The jury returned a verdict of guilty on each count, and sentence was pronounced upon the first count and suspended upon the second and third. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The grounds assigned in support of the appeal are four, as follows: (1) That the court erred in admitting expert testimony; (2) that the court erred in rejecting character testimony; (3) that error was committed by the curtailment of cross-examination; and (4) that the jury was incorrectly instructed.

[1-3] With regard to the first assignment, certain slips of papers, eight in number, were found by the officers in a tin cup in a cigar box back of the barber chair operated by defendant. On these slips of paper were written figures and names more or less unintelligible to persons inexperienced in the methods of gambling. On the reverse side of the papers were some figures which may or may not have had reference to the wager recorded on the first side. Two policemen who were called by the prosecution testified that they had worked on the gambling detail in San Diego—one for a period of two years and the other for a period of four years; that they had become familiar with the expressions, symbols, and characters used by bookmakers in recording bets on horse races; that each slip of paper found was the record of a wager of money on a horse race, with some identification of the person laying the bet. This last testimony was admitted over the objection of defendant, who elicited from the witnesses that they could not say what the figures on the reverse side meant. He now contends that the witnesses should have been able to decipher the entire instrument (both sides) before they could testify as experts. We conclude from appellant's argument that his objection to the reception of this evidence is based upon the thought that if the witnesses could not decipher the whole they were not qualified to decipher a part; a conclusion which does not follow from the premise. For example, suppose the reverse side had been written in Chinese laundry marks, or Sanskrit, it certainly would not be contended that it was any part of the first side or that familiarity therewith was necessary foundational knowledge to an interpretation of the gambling symbols. The testimony of the witnesses, in substance, that they did not know what the figures on the back of the slip meant, was in effect a statement that the figures did not relate to the subject-matter set down on the front. The record contained on the first side of the slips was complete in itself. That being the case, familiarity with the reverse side was in no way essential. The trial court is vested with a broad legal discretion in determining the qualifications of one who offers himself as an expert witness, and without manifest error, which we do not find in this instance, the ruling must be sustained. People v. Goldsworthy, 130 Cal. 600, 605, 62 P. 1074. That the characters constituted a proper subject of expert testimony cannot be questioned. Section 1863, Code Civ. Proc.; People v. Sutherland, 59 Cal. App. 462, 210 P. 965; People v. Hinkle, 64 Cal. App. 375, 221 P. 693.

[4] It is equally as certain that the trial court did commit error in the rejection of certain character testimony. Two character witnesses had testified to the good reputation of the defendant as a law-abiding citizen when it appeared from the cross-examination of each that neither of them knew the residence address of the defendant, whereupon the court struck out the testimony. With the third witness the same lack of knowledge appeared on direct examination and an objection was sustained to the query as to whether he knew the reputation of defendant as a law-abiding citizen in the community in which he lived and did business. These rulings limited the defendant to one character witness, plus the testimony of his sister-in-law, who testified that his reputation was good, and whose testimony the jury would undoubtedly consider as flowing from an interested source. In this age of rapid transit and quick communication it is not only conceivable, but a matter of common knowledge, that business men may acquire no reputation one way or the other in the community in which they actually reside, and bear an excellent reputation miles distant where they follow their daily vocations and come in contact with many associates. People v. Schmidt (Cal. App.) 249 P. 832. See, also, State v. Henderson, 29 W. Va. 147, 1 S. E. 225, 240; State v. Cushing, 14 Wash. 527, 45 P. 145, 147, 53 Am. St. Rep. 883. Any other view would prevent many eminent citizens from proving well-earned reputations. Nor in this case can we justify the exclusion of the testimony on the sole ground that it was a reasonable limitation placed upon the number of this class of witnesses. The ruling was erroneous, and if a reversal is not to be ordered it must be that after a consideration of the entire record, including the testimony, we are satisfied that a miscarriage of justice has not resulted.

[5] It appeared from the testimony of Police Officer Shea that he had gone into the defendant's barber shop on December 28, 1926, and had heard a man place a bet of $2 on some horse in one of the Tia Juana races and had seen him hand the defendant the money. Shea testified that he returned on the next day and placed a bet himself. The defendant did not take the stand in his own behalf. His brother, Wardie E. Derrick, and the boot-black employed in the shop, both testified that they were present on the 28th and 29th and did not see Officer Shea there. On rebuttal the district attorney placed on the stand Officer Burke, one of the two officers who found and took possession of the slips of paper, who testified that he had stood on the street corner and watched Officer Shea go into the barber shop. On cross-examination the witness said he had testified at the preliminary hearing and then he was asked this question by the defense counsel:

"Q. And to-day is the first time, although you testified at the preliminary examination, and testified before you took the stand this time—this moment is the very first time you have ever said anything about observing the witness Shea in the premises of Derrick?"

The objection that it was immaterial, argumentative, and not proper cross-examination was sustained. There is no merit in the argument of counsel that when the court stated in ruling upon the objection that, "when the defendant's witness went on the stand and alleged that he did not go in there, that raised the question; so, as far as this trial is concerned, that is the first time this question was up"; that the court was commenting on the facts. The court was referring to the order of proof, which it was perfectly justified in doing, and quite correctly stated that there was no occasion for the witness to so testify until upon rebuttal. Furthermore, it should be noted that counsel did not attempt to impeach the witness by showing that he had testified differently upon a former occasion. The question was so worded as to call for an immaterial response and was not proper cross-examination.

[6] Counsel complains, as his last objection, that the trial court erred in instructing the jury as follows:

"You are instructed that, in order to establish the recording of a bet, it is not indispensable that the writing of the record itself be produced in court, where such a writing is lost or destroyed or cannot be produced, if, from the testimony of witnesses, the jury is reasonably satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt that a bet was made, and that the defendant wrote down a memorandum thereof upon paper or other writing material as alleged in the information."

His objection to this instruction is, he says, that it assumes the fact that the defendant wrote down the wager testified to by Shea, when in fact there was no direct testimony to this effect introduced. From the evidence introduced, however, the jury were justified in drawing the deduction that it was the system, plan, or practice of defendant to record the wagers on the slips produced before it, and that subsequent to Shea's wager that the defendant had made similar note of it. In 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, at page 72, quoted with approval in People v. Sindici, 54 Cal. App. 193, 201 P. 975, it is said:

"Where the very doing of the act charged is in issue and is to be evidenced, one of the essential facts admissible is the person's plan or design to do the act. This plan or design itself may be evidenced by his conduct, and such conduct may consist of other similar acts so connected as to indicate a common purpose including in its scope the act charged. There is a decided difference between this use' and the one to show intent; 'for there the object is merely to give a complexion to an act conceded or proved, i. e., to negative innocent intent, while here the object is to evidence a prior general plan, scheme or design, which in its turn is to evidence the doing of the act so planned.'"

In denying a rehearing in the case just cited the Supreme Court uses this language:

"The application for a hearing in this court * * * is denied for the reason that evidence objected to of the commission of similar offenses by defendant was clearly admissible on the ground stated by the District Court of Appeal that such evidence tended to prove such similarity of plan or system in committing the other acts as to indicate that the offense charged was likewise the act of this defendant.

* * *

See, also, People v. Ciulla, 44 Cal. App. 719, 187 P. 46, and People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 98, 122 P. 435, 447.

In the last-cited case it is stated:

"It is held by all the authorities that, whenever there is a clear connection between two offenses, from which it may be logically inferred that, if guilty of one, the defendant is also guilty of the other, evidence of such other offense is admissible."

It is a logical deduction from the evidence that, if the defendant recorded the wagers evidenced by the eight different slips of paper, he also recorded the wager laid by Officer Shea. The slip itself was not produced, and the instruction must have been understood by the jury to mean that it was not essential to conviction that such a writing be produced, if they were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had made note of it. So understood, the instruction could not have prejudiced the defendant in the minds of the jury.

[7] We have left for the last consideration the question of whether the rejection of the character testimony requires or justifies a reversal of the judgment. From the recitation of the facts as we have proceeded, the defense consisted of testimony that Officer Shea was not present at the time stated by him. There was no effort made to explain the existence or presence of the slips of paper containing the records of wagers laid, other than the statement by Wardie Derrick that slips of paper of similar size were used by him and his brother to record the amount that they each took in during the day. There is no denial in the record of wagers having been recorded by defendant. From the written record it does not appear that there is a serious doubt that defendant was guilty. While character testimony may always be introduced concerning the trait involved in the charge, nevertheless, in considering the entire case and the fact that at least one witness testified without being contradicted that defendant's reputation was good, we are satisfied that there has not been a miscarriage of justice as required by section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution before we are authorized to order a reversal.

Judgment and order affirmed.

WILLIAMS et al. v. BLUE BIRD LAUNDRY CO. (Civ. 4595.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 12, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 10, 1927.

- 1. Nuisance §75—Allegations of irreparable injury to health and value of homes and destruction of property by operation of laundry held to charge special injury.

Complaint alleging that unless an injunction is issued, irreparable injury will be done to plaintiffs in that their homes will be made uninhabitable by reason of the noxious fumes emanating from defendant's laundry, and that the operation of the laundry will become a nuisance to the health of the plaintiffs and their neighbors and will impair the value of their homes and property, destroy the flowers and vegetation in their yards, and make it impossible for plaintiffs to continue to reside therein, held sufficient to charge a special injury, even though the same conduct may be alleged to have been injurious to the general public.

- 2. Nuisance §72—Cause of action to enjoin nuisance is not destroyed because rights of indefinite number of others are similarly infringed.

If a nuisance invades a distinct private right, plaintiff's cause of action is not destroyed by the fact that similar rights of an indefinite number of other persons are also infringed in the same manner.

- 3. Nuisance §6—Operation of laundry in district zoned for such business does not justify creation or continuance of private nuisance by laundry owner.

That district was zoned to permit operation of laundries therein did not justify creation or continuance of a private nuisance by owners of laundry so as to preclude injunctive relief to persons building residences in the vicinity on the theory that they must submit to the discomforts and injuries ordinarily incident to operation of similar industries in the manner in which they are customarily conducted.

- 4. Nuisance §75—Finding that operation of laundry constituted nuisance by emitting noises, odors, blocking of sidewalks, and soot and grease deposits, held sustained by evidence.

Evidence as to noises, noxious odors, blocking of sidewalks, soot and grease deposits resulting from operation of defendant's laundry, held to warrant finding that nuisance was created by such operation, entitling plaintiffs to injunction.

- 5. Appeal and error §931(1)—Every Intendment must be resolved in support of trial court's judgment.

Every intendment must be resolved in support of trial court's judgment.

- 6. Judgment §21—Judgment restraining operation of laundries so as to cause loud noises, offensive odors, black smoke and soot, or to be deleterious to health, held not too indefinite.

Judgment enjoining defendant from so operating its laundries as to avoid causing loud noises, offensive odors, black smoke or soot, or in any other such manner as to be deleterious to the health of plaintiffs, residents of the vicinity, held not objectionable as too indefinite.

- 7. Nuisance §73—That defendant operated laundry in same manner more than ten years held not to estop nearby residents suing to enjoin nuisance.

That defendant operated its laundry for more than ten years in the same manner before plaintiffs took any action to enjoin nuisance claimed to be created thereby held not to estop plaintiffs from maintaining action for abatement of the alleged nuisance on theory of waiver or estoppel by acquiescence, in absence of contention that delay and acquiescence misled defendant into expenditure of money in reliance thereon.

- 8. Appeal and error §1071(6)—Trial court's failure to find respecting matters as to which it would necessarily have found against appellant held not prejudicial.

Failure of trial court to make findings respecting matters as to which it would necessarily have found against appellant's contentions held not prejudicial.

- 9. Evidence §78—Evidence as to suppression of evidence held to justify court in concluding that unless restrained, elements constituting nuisance in operation of old laundry would be continued in building to be constructed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 5).

Where, in suit to enjoin nuisance, there was evidence that defendant willfully suppressed physical evidence when court made personal inspection of defendant's laundry, held that under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 5, and maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, court would have been warranted in disbelieving defendant's representations concerning the alleged harmless and inoffensive means and methods to be employed in its new laundry under construction and would have been justified in concluding that unless restrained, objectionable elements in the operation of the old laundry would be continued in the new one.

- 10. Nuisance §84—Decree properly enjoined defendant from so operating its laundry as to be deleterious to health instead of enjoining operation thereof.

Where injury complained of resulted from manner of operating laundry business, which is not per se a nuisance, court properly refused to restrain operation of laundry, but enjoined defendant owner from so operating the laundry or a new one to be constructed by it as to be deleterious to the health of plaintiffs, residents of the vicinity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Suit by Myrtle Mae Williams and others against the Blue Bird Laundry Company. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ward Chapman and L. M. Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James Donovan and Hugh E. Macbeth, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. Appellant was the owner of and operated a steam laundry in the city of Los Angeles and had obtained a permit for and contemplated erecting and operating another laundry in the same community. The respondents, residents of that vicinity, sued to obtain an injunction restraining the operation of the old laundry, and from constructing the new building and using it for the operation of a like business. The complaint alleged that at the establishment being operated when suit was filed, unwashed laundry was strewn upon the sidewalk which emitted offensive odors, machinery was operated late at night which caused loud and disturbing noises to nearby residents, crude oil was burned which gave off heavy black smoke and soot, and an offensive odor was created by materials used in operating the laundry, all of which created a nuisance and were offensive to the senses and deleterious to the health of the plaintiffs; that the defendant had begun the construction of another laundry across the street from the one first mentioned, which would be operated in the same manner and under the same conditions as the old laundry, and which also would create a nuisance. Issue having been joined, and a trial had upon the pleadings so framed, the trial court found the foregoing facts to be true, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, enjoining the defendant from operating machinery in either laundry between the hours of 9 o'clock p. m. and 6 o'clock a. m. of each day, and from causing loud noises, creating offensive odors, black smoke, or soot, and from so operating either laundry as through any of the last-mentioned causes, or in any manner, to render them deleterious to the health of the plaintiffs.

[1] A number of grounds are urged for a reversal. First, it is complained that the facts stated in the complaint are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because the nuisance, if any be alleged, is not one resulting in special damage to the plaintiffs. Among other things the complaint alleges that unless an injunction is issued irreparable injury will be done to plaintiffs, in that "their homes will be made uninhabitable by reason of the noxious fumes arising and emanating from said laundry and the operation of said laundry will become a nuisance to the health of the plaintiffs and their neighbors, and will impair the value of their homes and property, destroy the flowers and vegetation in their yards, and make it impossible for the plaintiffs to continue to reside therein," etc.

[2] These allegations are sufficient to charge a special injury, even though the same conduct may be alleged to have been injurious to the general public. McIntosh v. Brimmer, 68 Cal. App. 770, 230 P. 203; Lind v. City of San Luis Obispo, 109 Cal. 340, 42 P. 437. If the nuisance invades a distinct private right, a cause of action for injunction is not destroyed by the fact that similar rights of an indefinite number of other persons are also infringed in the same manner. Williams v. Los Angeles R. Co., 150 Cal. 592, 89 P. 330; Brown v. Rea, 150 Cal. 171, 88 P. 713; Fisher v. Zumwalt, 128 Cal. 496, 61 P. 82.

[3] It seems to be assumed that because the premises on which the laundry is situated were zoned to permit the maintenance of such establishments, all persons building residences in that vicinity must submit to such discomforts and injuries as are ordinarily incident to the operation of similar industries in the manner in which they are customarily conducted. We do not understand this to be the law. The doctrine of coming to a nuisance was long ago exploded. The operation of a business under municipal permission does not justify the creation or continuance of a private nuisance. Strong v. Sullivan, 180 Cal. 331, 181 P. 59, 4 A. L. R. 343; Judson v. Los Angeles Suburban Gas Co., 157 Cal. 168, 106 P. 581, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 21 Ann. Cas. 1247; Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248, 13 P. 655, 1 Am. St. Rep. 51; Tuebner v. California St. R. Co., 66 Cal. 171, 4 P. 1162; Humphrey v. Dunnells, 21 Cal. App. 312, 131 P. 761; Coats v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 1 Cal. App. 441, 82 P. 640.

[4] The trial court found that the manner in which the existing laundry was operated was offensive to the senses, deleterious to the health of the plaintiffs, and constituted a nuisance, and it is urged that the evidence is insufficient to support such finding. From the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs it appears that the Blue Bird laundry was operated daily, frequently on Sunday, and at times until 11 o'clock or later at night; that a shrill whistle was blown mornings, at noon, and in the evening; that the boilers were often blown out, causing loud noises and filth to permeate the air; the machinery rumbled and roared like "the billows at the beach"; thick, heavy, oily smoke emanated from the laundry, which settled upon the outside of houses, and inside upon the furniture and linen, covering them with a dark, greasy substance which it was found difficult, or impossible, to remove; soot and grease were deposited upon the grass and flowers of neighboring yards to a distance of 500 feet in all directions, which discolored and wilted vegetation; obnoxious, offensive odors from chemicals or substances used in the laundry floated throughout the community; that during the early part of each week, for two or three days at a time, large quantities of unwashed laundry which gave off offensive odors were piled on the sidewalks, and which also blocked the walks, requiring school children and others desiring to pass to travel in the middle of the street or else go around the block; that as a result of these things roomers had been compelled to move from the neighborhood, and permanent residents in ill health were constantly irritated and prevented from sleeping at night. There is in the record an abundance of evidence of these noises, odors, blocking of sidewalks, soot and grease deposits. Some of the witnesses swore that at times the air was so dense with pungent odors as to cause violent coughing and sneezing.

[5] Every intendment must be resolved in support of the judgment of the trial court, and under this rule we are impelled to accept as true the foregoing facts which the evidence of the plaintiffs, respondents here, strongly tended to establish, and the findings and judgment of the court that a nuisance was created by such operation of the defendant and appellant's establishment. This being true, we think the evidence was amply sufficient in that respect.

[6] It is strenuously contended that because the judgment merely restrains the defendant from so conducting its plants as to cause loud noises, offensive odors, black smoke and soot, it is so indefinite as to render it ineffective, and that it must be reversed; that it is impossible to determine what degree of noise, or degree of odor, etc., would constitute a violation of the injunction; and that the defendant may be subjected to citations for contempt at any time that one of the plaintiffs may deem any noise, odor or smoke objectionable to himself. However, the judgment plainly states that the laundry or laundries shall be so operated as to avoid causing loud noises, offensive odors, black smoke, or soot, or in any other such manner as to be deleterious to the health of the plaintiffs. We think the entire judgment when read together is sufficiently definite in this regard. Appellant bases its argument upon Powers v. Perry, 12 Cal. App. 77, 106 P. 595, and Steinberger v. Meyer, 130 Cal. 156, 62 P. 483, wherein judgments were held to be fatally uncertain. In Powers v. Perry it was held that the complaint failed to allege the amount of water needed for the plaintiffs' needs, and that the language of the judgment providing that they should be afforded "sufficient water for household purposes," it would be impossible to determine the extent of servitude sought to be placed upon the defendants' land, since the plaintiffs might build several houses upon the land in the future. In Steinberger v. Meyer the judgment declared that the plaintiff had the legal right to divert all of the water of Willow Ranch creek at any and all times, and in the same judgment it was recited that the defendant as against the plaintiff was lawfully entitled to the free and unobstructed flow and to the diversion and use of sufficient water from certain springs to properly and thoroughly irrigate three acres of land for domestic purposes. It was there said by the Supreme Court that nothing was said in the judgment as to the injunction prayed for in the complaint, and that it would be utterly impossible to determine how much water was necessary to "properly and thoroughly irrigate in the aggregate three acres of land." It is obvious that these cases are not in point, for while any amount of water might be diverted in either case without violating the inhibiting clause of the judgment, any of the acts forbidden by the decree in the instant case would constitute an infraction of its provisions if sufficiently serious to be "offensive to the senses" or "deleterious to the health of the plaintiffs." The injunction is not more indefinite than that in Judson v. Los Angeles Suburban Gas Co., 157 Cal. 168, 106 P. 581, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 21 Ann. Cas. 1247, which was upheld. There the judgment enjoined the defendant from operating gas works in such a manner as to cause or permit smoke, gases, or offensive smells or fumes to be emitted therefrom or to be precipitated upon the property of the plaintiff. In interpreting this language the Supreme Court said: "The appellants are enjoined from maintaining the same sort of nuisance that had caused the annoyance to plaintiff." This is true in the instant case. The evidence showed and the court found that loud noises, offensive odors, black smoke and soot emanating from the appellants' laundry were offensive to the senses and deleterious to the health of the plaintiffs, and that they created a nuisance. It is these objectionable emanations, the same sort of nuisance which had caused the annoyance to the plaintiffs, that are enjoined. Even if true, it is no objection to the validity of an order that there is room for difference of opinion as to what noises are loud, what odors are offensive, and what smoke is black. An injunction against the diversion of more than a continual flow of six miner's inches of water would hardly be questioned as indefinite, and yet when charged with its violation it might be seriously contended that the amount taken was not six miner's inches, though after a hearing the court should so find and hold. An order restraining the maintenance of a flume on a certain property would scarcely be attacked as indefinite, and yet upon citation for its violation the defendant might claim that the conduit which he had built was not a flume. Such a theory as that the term "black smoke" is indefinite because one of the parties might be color blind and claim that the smoke was blue, would render practically all injunctions indefinite and result in it being possible to nullify almost any judgment. The shriek of a steam engine is surely a loud noise, and yet some persons might think and argue otherwise. If the operation of the defendant's plant should be deemed by the plaintiffs to create such noises or pollution of the atmosphere as to be deleterious to their health or offensive to their senses and should they produce competent and satisfactory evidence that any or all of these objectionable features were injuring or destroying their health, we think they would be entitled to relief under the terms of the judgment, otherwise not.

[7, 8] It is next insisted that, the defendant Blue Bird Laundry Company having operated its laundry for a period of more than ten years, and the plaintiffs having been fully aware of the manner in which it was conducted, they acquiesced, and that they waived any legal objection which they may have had, and therefore approved and ratified the nuisance which the trial court found existed. No California authority is cited which recognizes this rule, and we are unable to find one. It has repeatedly been held that in suits for injunction by a private person to enjoin an offense amounting to a public nuisance, no lapse of time will justify the special injury; that while laches or the statute of limitations may in proper cases be pleaded in bar of the original act which created the conditions sought to be enjoined, neither one is a ground of defense to a continuing nuisance, since the character of such offense gives rise to successive rights of action. Bowen v. Wendt, 103 Cal. 236, 37 P. 149; McLean v. Llewellyn Iron Works, 2 Cal. App. 346, 83 P. 1082, 1085; Kafka v. Bozio, 191 Cal. 746, 218 P. 753, 29 A. L. R. 833. The appellant was not sought to be restrained from erecting the Blue Bird laundry. The respondents alleged, their evidence tended to establish, and the court below found, that its present operation was such as to constitute a nuisance. Nor in this case is it contended or shown that the delay and acquiescence on the part of the plaintiffs misled the laundry company so as to result in the expenditure by the latter of large sums of money or in fact any money whatever. In this regard the instant case is similar to those cited in this paragraph. We must therefore hold that the respondents were not estopped to maintain their action for abatement of the offenses of which they complained. From what we have said it is apparent that had findings been made upon the defenses of acquiescence and estoppel which were interposed, such findings would necessarily have been against the defendants' contentions; hence, the failure of the trial court to make findings upon these issues was not prejudicial.

[9] The only other point advanced by appellant is that the evidence, portions of which have heretofore been stated, and the finding of the trial court which in substance recites the same facts, do not justify an injunction against the establishment and maintenance of the proposed new laundry. As we have already observed, the judgment of the trial court restraining the operation of the old laundry in such manner as to create odors, noises, smoke, etc., which were deleterious to health, was warranted by the evidence. With respect to the new laundry, it was alleged that the defendant would, unless restrained from so doing, erect, maintain and conduct another laundry across the street from the first one, in the same manner and with the same injurious features as those complained of with respect to the laundry then in operation. The defendants denied by their answer that the new laundry would be so operated as to constitute a nuisance to the plaintiffs, or that any deleterious odors would emanate therefrom. It appears that application was made to the city of Los Angeles for a permit to build an addition to the old laundry; that the defendant commenced the construction of another laundry across the street from the one in operation, and intended using electric power, but that the oil burners would be maintained in the old plant, and steam-piped under the street to the new one, where the actual washing was to be done. During the trial the court visited and inspected the premises for the purpose of observing the character and extent of the noises, odors, smoke and soot complained of, which, when the inspection was made, appear from the record to have been negligible. Appellant's witnesses swore that the court had been shown the average existing conditions, and that at no time was there appreciably more noise, smoke or odor than existed at that time; that a bell could be substituted for the whistle, objectionable odors, if any, might be eliminated, and that soiled laundry need not be piled upon the sidewalk, but that they could offer no assurance that the small flow of smoke could be avoided. On the day following the court's inspection witnesses called by the plaintiffs in rebuttal testified that there was as much difference between the noises made while the judge was present and that on other days "as an empty wagon going on a rocky mountain and a buggy going on a level ground," "something like using a .22 rifle to an ordinary shotgun"; that when standing within 50 feet of the laundry the witness on the day of the court's visit could scarcely hear any noise, whereas all during the preceding four years one "could hear that noise for blocks"; that while there was but little or no smoke the day before "worth anything compared with the smoke that there would usually be"; on other days it flowed "just as full as that smokestack can hold it."

The trial court having made a personal inspection, and having had all of the witnesses before it, may have concluded that the defendant willfully suppressed physical evidence, and that notwithstanding its strenuous protests to be contrary, the noises and odors at the new plant would in all probability be no less than those complained of and restrained at the old one. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd 5. Upon the maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, the court would have been warranted in disbelieving the representations of the defendant and its witnesses concerning the alleged harmless and inoffensive means and methods to be employed in the laundry under construction, and would have been justified in concluding that unless restrained the objectionable elements involved in the operation of the old laundry would be continued in the addition.

Since the appellant represented that it contemplated removing its machinery and operating its laundry in the new building, the only reasonable ground for the court's viewing the old plant would have been for the purpose of determining in what manner the new one would be conducted. If the court concluded that with this in view the defendant had misled the court as to the true situation, it was wholly justified in restraining deleterious noise, odor, and smoke at either laundry.

[10] The court did not grant the injunction prayed by the plaintiffs, restraining the operation of both laundries, but enjoined the defendant from so operating either laundry as to be deleterious to the health of the plaintiffs, which we think was not improper in view of all of the evidence before it. In McIntosh v. Brimmer, 68 Cal. App. 770, 230 P. 203, it was said:

"Where the injury complained of results from a business which is not per se a nuisance, it being caused only by reason of the manner in which the business is conducted or by the surrounding circumstances, it is always proper for the court so to frame its decree that defendant's business will not be absolutely prohibited, if this can be done and still give to plaintiff the relief to which he is entitled. Collins v. Wayne Iron Works, 227 Pa. 326 [76 A. 24]; 20 R. C. L., p. 482."

We find no error in the granting of the injunction as framed, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

GOYTAN et al. v. DEASY, Judge. (Civ. 5916.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 15, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 14, 1927.

Depositions ⚡71—Witnesses ⚡297—Court held without power to compel defendant to answer questions tending to incriminate him or questions relating to immaterial matters.

Where plaintiff sought to take a deposition and defendant refused to answer questions propounded, superior court held without power to compel him to answer questions tending to incriminate him, or questions relating to matters immaterial to the issues involved.

Application for a writ of mandate by Rose Mary Goytan and others, prayed to be directed to Daniel C. Deasy, as Judge of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, to compel respondent to order defendant in a case in which petitioners were plaintiffs to answer certain questions. Writ denied.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; CURTIS, J., dissenting.

Bronson, Bronson & Slaven, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. Petitioners are plaintiffs in an action for damages pending in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and sought to take the deposition before a notary public of one of the defendants named in said action, who refused to answer the questions propounded to him. He was thereupon cited to appear before respondent as judge of said superior court to show cause why he should not so answer, and after a hearing was had the citation was dismissed without requiring the defendant to answer said questions. Petitioners now apply to this court for a writ of mandate requiring respondent to compel said defendant to answer said questions, or, upon defendant's refusal so to do, to adjudge him guilty of contempt and to cause him to be punished accordingly.

We have given careful consideration to the import of the questions petitioners seek to have said defendant answer, and are of the opinion that as to most of them said defendant was entitled to rely upon the privilege claimed by him that his answer thereto may tend to incriminate him in the courts of this state; the remaining questions, we think, relate to immaterial matters. We conclude, therefore, that for the reasons stated, respondent was without legal power to compel said defendant to answer said questions, and consequently the application for the writ herein must be denied. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. TOSSEY et al. (Cr. 979.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 13, 1927.

Infants ⚡68—Defendant pleading guilty before disclosing that he was less than 18 years old held properly sentenced on such plea (Juvenile Court Law, § 4d, and § 6, as amended by St. 1921, p. 799, § 1).

Where defendant pleaded guilty in superior court to charge of robbery before disclosing that he was under the age of 18 years, and where proceedings were thereafter had in juvenile court which certified case back to the superior court to be prosecuted under the general law, held proceedings in superior court before transfer to juvenile court were valid, under Juvenile Court Law, § 4d, and section 6, as amended by St. 1921, p. 799, § 1, and superior court did not err in pronouncing sentence on plea of guilty previously made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Joseph Tossey, alias James Trautman, and another, pleaded guilty to charge of robbery, and Joseph Tossey appeals from judgment. Affirmed.

Mrs. V. E. Parkinson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The information herein, charging the defendants with the crime of robbery, was filed October 21, 1926. On their arraignment two days later the defendants appeared without counsel and, after being duly informed of their rights, stated that they did not desire counsel to represent them. Tossey, who will be referred to as the defendant, stated that his true name is James Trautman. They both entered pleas of guilty and waived time for pronouncing sentence. The court thereupon examined Tossey, who was not under oath, however, in part as follows:

"Q. How old are you, Trautman? A. Fifteen.

"Q. Fifteen? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Tell me the truth about it, how old are you? A. I told you the truth, sir.

"Q. You are only fifteen? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You are a big boy for fifteen. * * * I don't know as I can send a boy of your age to San Quentin, to state's prison. * * * A. I never knew you could send a juvenile to prison.

"Q. Of course you can; that doesn't prevent sending you to prison; don't think you are immune because you are a juvenile that you can go out and commit any crime. A. I never meant that; but what are our reformatories for?

"Q. * * * What year were you born? A. 1911. * * *

"Q. At the time you committed this robbery, did you have any deadly weapons with you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. A gun? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did you do, point the gun at him? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And make him give up his overcoat? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you tell him to stick up his hands? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was the gun loaded? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Who did the gun belong to? A. Me.

"Q. And where did you get the gun? A. At Evanston, Wyo.

"Q. How many other similar holdups had you committed on the way out here from Wyoming? A. I think four.

"Q. The two of you together? A. No, sir.

"Q. How many have you committed since the two of you were together, you and Pulliam? A. Four. * * *

"Q. Had you stuck anybody up before you met Pulliam? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How many times had you stuck any one up before you met him? A. Four. * * * I pulled four myself and four with him."

The court then sentenced appellant to imprisonment in the state prison. In doing so, the court said:

"When sentencing this defendant to San Quentin, the court takes into consideration the fact this is not his first offense; he seems to have started out on a wild career of crime, traveling through the country committing these holdups by the use of deadly weapon. It is a case, under the law, that does not permit of the granting of probation, and it would be a tragedy to take a boy like this and send him to the reform school among other young boys, a fellow who is a wholesale highwayman, just going there for the purpose of educating other boys in similar crime."

The court apparently proceeded upon the theory that sections 4d and 6 of the Juvenile Court Law are inapplicable to cases pending in the superior court. It does not appear that any suggestion was made on defendant's preliminary examination that he was under the age of 18 years, and the first suggestion to that effect was made by the defendant in his aforesaid examination by the superior court after the entry of his plea of guilty, and no application or request was then made to certify the case to the juvenile court. Thereafter, on application to Division 2 of the District Court of Appeal, First District, for a writ of habeas corpus it was held that the trial court had exceeded its jurisdiction in sentencing the defendant to imprisonment without having first certified the case to the juvenile court, and it was "ordered that said defendant be discharged from the custody of the warden at San Quentin prison, and that said minor be delivered into the custody of the sheriff of the county of Sacramento, and that he be there dealt with as provided by law." Ex parte Tassey (Cal. App.) 253 P. 948. Thereafter the defendant was taken into the trial court and, for the first time, application was made to that court that the case be referred to the juvenile court. The case was so referred and thereafter the juvenile court after reciting the history of the case, made the following finding and order:

"The said James Trautman, true name Joseph Tossey, appeared in person, represented by his attorney, Mrs. Valla Parkinson, and after hearing evidence, and being fully advised in the premises, and it appearing that the said James Trautman, true name Joseph Tossey, is not a fit and proper subject to be dealt with under the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law, now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed * * * that the said James Trautman, true name Joseph Tossey, be and he is hereby certified to the superior court, there to be prosecuted under the general law, and he is remanded to the custody of the sheriff."

Thereafter the defendant was again taken into the superior court, whereupon his counsel asked that he be permitted to withdraw his plea of guilty and enter a plea of robbery of the second degree, and the defendant testified, in support of the request that the gun used in committing the robbery was not loaded at that time but the court denied the request and sentenced the defendant to imprisonment in the state prison. The defendant has appealed from the judgment.

The Juvenile Court Law provides:

"Sec. 4d. No person under the age of eighteen years at the time of the commission of an alleged offense or crime shall be prosecuted for crime until the matter has first been submitted to the juvenile court by petition as hereinbefore provided, or by certificate of the lower court as hereinafter provided." Stats. 1915, p. 1228.

"Sec. 6. Whenever a deposition or complaint shall be filed in any court other than a superior court, charging a person with a crime and it shall be suggested or shall appear to the judge, justice or recorder before whom such person is brought that the person charged was at the date the offense is alleged to have been committed under the age of eighteen years, said judge, justice or recorder, shall immediately suspend all proceedings against such person on said charge and examine into the age of such person, and if, from such examination, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said judge, justice or recorder, that such person was at the date the offense is alleged to have been committed under the age of eighteen years, he shall forthwith certify to the juvenile court of his county (a) that said person * * * is charged with such crime * * *; (b) that said person appears to be under the age of eighteen years, * * * and (c) that proceedings have been suspended against such person on such charge by reason of his age; * * * and immediately thereupon all proceedings against the said person on said charge shall be suspended until said juvenile court shall issue its mandate, as hereinafter provided, directing the court before which said charge was made to proceed with the examination into or trial thereof. * * * If such judge [of the juvenile court] shall at any time conclude that such person is not a fit subject for further consideration under this act, * * * he may remand such person to the court in which said person is charged with said offense for further proceedings on said charge, and upon receipt of the mandate of said juvenile court, or the judge thereof, the court before which said charge is then pending shall be vested with full authority to proceed with the examination or trial thereof." Stats. 1921, p. 799.

Appellant contends that:

"The superior court had competent jurisdiction up to and including the determination of the age of the infant. From that point on in case at bar all proceedings were void and the reassigning of the case to the superior court from the juvenile court could not in any manner validate any irregularity in the former proceedings."

Without expressing any opinion as to whether the superior court had jurisdiction to enter the first judgment, or whether sections 4d and 6 are applicable to cases pending in the superior court, and assuming, for the purposes of this opinion, that such sections are so applicable and that the court was without jurisdiction to enter such judgment it may be conceded that counsel's statement is correct. But the defendant had entered his plea of guilty prior to any suggestion that he was under the age of 18 years. The statute does not provide that, upon such suggestion being made, the proceedings theretofore had shall be vacated or become of no effect, but that all proceedings shall be suspended until the juvenile court shall direct the court in which the defendant is charged to proceed with the case. The reasonable interpretation of the statute appears to be that all proceedings prior to any suggestion that a defendant is under 18 years of age are perfectly valid and need not be repeated on his being remanded by the juvenile court. This is in accordance with the ordinary and natural meaning of the word "suspend" as used in the statute. The most that can be said in favor of a defendant under such circumstances is that the trial court should resume proceedings at the point where the statute required the suspension thereof, all subsequent proceedings prior to the certification to the juvenile court being treated as void. If the defendant had been tried and found guilty and had thereupon, for the first time, suggested that he was under 18 years of age, it would hardly be contended that the subsequent certification of the case to the juvenile court and that court's remand of the defendant to the trial court would have the effect of vacating the verdict and making a new trial necessary. It does not appear why a different rule should apply in case of a plea of guilty. The following cases while not directly in point, are at least consistent with the foregoing views: In re Wolff, 183 Cal. 602, 192 P. 33; People v. Wolff, 182 Cal. 728, 190 P. 22; People v. Oxnam, 170 Cal. 211, 149 P. 165; In re Northon, 35 Cal. App. 369, 169 P. 1051; In re Tom, 17 Cal. App. 678, 121 P. 294.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FEARY. (Cr. 975.)★District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 13, 1927.Rehearing Denied Oct. 13, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Criminal law §419, 420(10)—In prosecution for lewd and lascivious conduct with child, child's extrajudicial statements held inadmissible.

In prosecution for lewd and lascivious conduct with child, child's extrajudicial statements held inadmissible to prove any element of the crime charged.

2. Criminal law §562—Where only evidence tending to show guilt of defendant of lewd and lascivious conduct with child, was child's extrajudicial statements, conviction was reversed.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction of lewd and lascivious conduct with child, where only evidence of the crime was child's extrajudicial statements.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Richard V. Feary was convicted of lewd and lascivious conduct, and he appeals. Reversed.

George Stahlman, Jr., and Sydney C. Bennett, both of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of lewd and lascivious conduct with a child, his daughter, then of the age of 9 years. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

[1, 2] At the trial the child positively denied that the defendant committed any of the acts charged. On the ground that he was taken by surprise by such denial, the district attorney was permitted to prove by the testimony of the girl and that of other witnesses that at other times she had stated that the defendant had committed such acts. In admitting this testimony the court stated that it was admitted for the purpose of contradicting the girl's testimony given at the trial, to the effect that the defendant had not committed such acts, "to impeach and wipe out that testimony; and that is the only effect and purpose that this testimony can have, is to wipe out her previous testimony, if the jury so believe that it does, but it is not for the purpose of showing the fact itself." It is elementary, of course, that the girl's extrajudicial statements were inadmissible to prove any element of the crime charged. Appellant contends that there is no other evidence to support the verdict. At the oral argument counsel for the people confessed inability to find any such other evidence and a careful reading of the entire record fails to disclose any such evidence. The appellant therefore is entitled to a reversal.

The court instructed the jury that "testimony has been introduced by the prosecution tending to prove other acts of lewd and lascivious conduct of the defendant toward" the girl "prior to the acts relied upon for conviction," and that this evidence might be considered as tending to prove "the lewd and lascivious disposition and tendency of the defendant to commit lewd and lascivious acts." No evidence of such "other acts of lewd and lascivious conduct of the defendant" has been discovered in the record.

The judgment and the order are reversed.

VIGNOLO v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 5942.)†

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 16, 1927.

As Modified Sept. 29, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 14, 1927.

1. Justices of the peace §171(3)—Adjudication of facts in justice court is necessary before de novo trial and judgment on merits may on appeal, be had in superior court.

When an action is commenced in a justice of the peace court, there must be an adjudication of the facts therein before a trial de novo may be had and a judgment rendered on the merits in the superior court.

2. Justices of the peace §171(3)—Where unverified answer in justice court denied allegations of complaint, but parties orally stipulated facts were as pleaded, judgment rendered was on fact adjudication, hence permitted appeal on facts.

Where defendant's unverified answer in a justice of the peace court denied all allegations of the complaint, but on trial the defendant stipulated orally that the facts were the same as pleaded in the complaint, judgment thereafter rendered was based on an adjudication of facts, hence afforded plaintiff a right to appeal to the superior court on questions of fact as well as of law.

3. Justices of the peace §31—Trials in justice courts may be had upon issues of law and of fact (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 878-882).

Trial in justice of the peace courts may be had upon issues of law and upon issues of fact, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 878-882.

4. Justices of the peace §171(3)—Fact adjudication required in justice court before de novo appeal to superior court will be allowed may be based upon party's judicial admissions (Code Civ. Proc. § 1824).

The adjudication of facts necessary to entitle a party to appeal de novo to the superior court from a justice court may, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1824, be based upon a party's judicial admissions, the kind of proof being immaterial.

5. Justices of the peace ☞104—Judicial admissions in justice court held evidential and of same value as witnesses' testimony for decision on merits.

Judicial admissions of the defendant in a justice court held evidential in character and dispensing with the necessity of any further evidence for a decision on the merits, and, when accepted by the plaintiff for whose benefit they were made, carried the same probative force as the testimony of witnesses with reference to the disposal of the issues of fact.

6. Justices of the peace ☞106—Upon facts being established, though only by admissions, judgment upon merits before justice was mandatory (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 890, 890a, 925).

Where the facts in a trial before a justice of the peace were established by defendant's admissions only, no other evidence being adduced thereon, rendition of judgment upon the merits was mandatory, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 925, relative to limited jurisdiction of justice courts, and sections 890 and 890a, relative to restrictions of justices' authority to dismiss actions.

7. Justices of the peace ☞106—Justice courts may not render nonsuit judgments (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 890, 890a, 925).

Justice courts have no authority to render judgments of nonsuit, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 890, 890a, 925.

8. Justices of the peace ☞141(5)—Defendant's voluntary participation in superior court de novo trial on appeal from justice court, without objection to de novo jurisdiction, precluded his questioning latter court's jurisdiction to determine appeal on merits.

Where defendant voluntarily participated in a trial de novo in the superior court appealed from a justice court, without objection being made to the jurisdiction of the superior court to try the action anew, he was thereafter precluded from questioning the jurisdiction of the superior court to proceed de novo to determine the appeal on its merits.

Action by James Neary against Pietro Vignolo in a justice of the peace court. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed to the superior court of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, where a de novo trial resulted in judgment for plaintiff, and defendant petitions for a writ of review to have the judgment of the superior court annulled. Proceedings affirmed.

Sawyer & Sawyer, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Frederic Appelman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Petitioner applies for a writ of review for the purpose of having annulled a judgment of the respondeat superior court rendered on the merits, after trial de novo, in an action brought before said superior court on an appeal from the justice court taken on questions of law and fact. Petitioner's main contention is that there was no trial of the facts in the justice court, and that therefore the appeal to the superior court was in effect one taken upon questions of law alone, whereunder the power of the superior court was limited to a reversal of the judgment and a remand of the cause to the justice court for trial on the issues of fact tendered by the pleadings.

The action was commenced by one James Neary against petitioner to recover upon an assigned claim for real estate broker's commissions. The essential allegations of the complaint were that petitioner authorized plaintiff's assignor, a duly licensed firm of real estate brokers, to sell his real property; that thereafter said brokers secured a purchaser, with whom petitioner entered into a written contract of sale, a copy of which was attached to and made a part of the complaint; that at the time of the execution of said contract petitioner accepted from the purchaser a deposit of $400; and that, although said purchaser was ready, willing and able to consummate the sale in accordance with the terms of the written contract, petitioner refused to do so.

Petitioner demurred to the complaint on general grounds, and the demurrer was overruled. Thereupon he filed an unverified answer denying "generally and specifically, each and every, all and singular, the allegations of said complaint." The cause then came on for trial before the justice, and petitioner stipulated orally "that the facts are the same as pleaded in the complaint," following which judgment was given in favor of petitioner, and the plaintiff appealed to the superior court on questions of law and fact. Thereafter the cause came on for trial on the merits before the latter court, without objection being made thereto by petitioner, and a second and similar stipulation was made by petitioner as to the facts; whereupon the superior court rendered its judgment granting unto plaintiff the relief prayed for in the complaint. The parties then filed a written stipulation waiving findings of fact and conclusions of law, and judgment for plaintiff was entered accordingly. At this stage of the proceedings petitioner's present counsel were substituted as his attorneys, and they made a motion for a new trial, which was denied. Execution was thereafter issued and levied on certain real property belonging to petitioner. This proceeding was then instituted.

[1, 2] Conceding, as petitioner contends, that when an action is commenced in the justice court there must be an adjudication of the facts therein before a trial de novo may be had and a judgment rendered on the merits in the superior court (Myrick v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 98, 8 P. 648; Null v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. App. 207, 87 P. 392), the present case, in our opinion, does not fall within the rule stated because the proceedings had before the justice here doubtless constituted a trial upon and a disposal of the issues of facts; consequently, the judgment rendered was based on the merits and afforded the aggrieved party thereto a right of appeal on questions of law and fact, and to have such appeal heard and determined accordingly in the superior court.

[3-5] Trials in the justice courts may be had upon issues of law and upon issues of fact. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 878, 881, 882. An issue of law arises upon a demurrer to the complaint or answer, or to some part thereof, and must be tried by the court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 879, 881. "An issue of fact arises—1. Upon a material allegation in the complaint controverted by the answer * * *" and "must be tried by a jury, unless a jury is waived, in which case it might be tried by the court." Code Civ. Proc. §§ 880, 882. The action here came on for trial before the justice upon the issues of fact joined by the allegations contained in the complaint, and the denials thereof contained in the answer. By reason of such controversion of facts plaintiff was required to substantiate the allegations of his complaint by proof, which is defined by section 1824 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be "the effect of evidence, the establishment of a fact by evidence." It was therefore wholly immaterial, we think, as to the kind of evidence plaintiff adduced, whether it consisted of the testimony of witnesses or the judicial admissions of the defendant. The latter were evidently made for the purpose of saving time and expense, and to avoid the inconvenience of calling witnesses to establish the facts about which there was no dispute; and that they were intended to relate only to the particular trial in the justice court is shown by the fact that a second and similar stipulation as to the facts was made in the trial de novo before the superior court. Such judicial admissions were therefore merely evidential in character (Volker, etc., Lumber Co. v. Vance, 36 Utah, 348, 103 P. 970, 24 L. R. A. [N. S.] 321, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 124), doing away with any further evidence, and, when accepted by plaintiff, for whose benefit they were made, carried the same probative force as the testimony of witnesses with reference to the disposal of the issues of fact (5 Wigmore on Evidence, pp. 604, 605).

[6, 7] The facts being thus established after trial the justice was called upon to render judgment, and under the law governing the procedure in justice courts the rendition of a judgment on the merits was mandatory. As declared by section 925 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "Justice courts being courts of peculiar and limited jurisdiction, only those provisions of this Code which are, in their nature, applicable to the organization, powers and course of proceedings in justices' courts, or which have been made applicable by special provisions in this title [part II, tit. XI], are applicable to justices courts and the proceedings therein;" and with reference to the exercise of such limited powers it has been held that a justice of the peace is not vested with authority to pass upon or grant a motion for a nonsuit, that the dismissals he may enter are restricted to the causes mentioned in section 890 of said Code, of which the failure of plaintiff to establish his case by evidence is not one, and that "where evidence has been introduced in a trial of a case before him and the plaintiff rests his case upon evidence which, to the mind of the justice, is not sufficient to entitle him to judgment, the result is that there has been a trial upon the merits, that the plaintiff has failed to establish his cause, and that judgment upon the merits should be rendered for the defendant. Such is the clear meaning of our law, and so it has been construed in 1 Cowdery's Justice Treatise, p. 664, § 1134." Peacock v. Superior Court, 163 Cal. 701, 126 P. 976, overruling in effect the decision in Smith v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. App. 529, 84 P. 54, as to the power of a justice court to grant a nonsuit. Subsequent to the rendition of the decision in the case just quoted from, section 890a, of said Code was enacted, which granted to justice courts authority to dismiss actions upon grounds other than and in addition to those enumerated in said section 890; but the power to render a judgment of nonsuit was not included therein, and consequently justice courts are still lacking in such authority.

In the present case, therefore, after the justice had proceeded with the trial of the facts pleaded in the complaint, and the same had been proved by the judicial admissions of the defendant, it was imperative that he render a judgment upon the merits, for, being without legal authority to dismiss the action by nonsuit, he could do nothing else; and the fact that such judgment was grounded upon judicial admissions rather than upon oral testimony or any other kind of legal proof manifestly did not change the nature of the trial from one of fact to one of law, nor affect the character of the judgment as being one upon the merits. As said in Freeman on Judgments:

"A judgment is on the merits when it amounts to a declaration of the law as to the respective rights and duties of the parties, based on the ultimate facts or state of the facts disclosed by the pleadings and evidence upon which the right of recovery depends, irrespective of formal, technical or dilatory objections or contentions. But it need not be the result of a trial or hearing on controverted facts, if the parties have had a legally sufficient opportunity to present the merits of the controversy and have waived or otherwise lost the right to such a hearing." 2 Freeman on Judgments, p. 1543.

Even though petitioner's stipulation as to the facts be considered as having nullified the denials in his answer, and consequently that the judgment be deemed to be one rendered upon the pleadings, it nevertheless was a judgment upon the merits. Takekawa v. Hole, 17 Cal. App. 653, 121 P. 296; Bailey v. Aetna Indemnity Co., 5 Cal. App. 740, 91 P. 416.

The cases cited by petitioner in support of his contention do not reach the point involved here. They either are essentially different in their facts from the present one or declare legal principles which are foreign to the issue herein. For instance, in Null v. Superior Court, supra, and Myrick v. Superior Court, supra, there was no adjudication of the facts whatever by the justice, a judgment of dismissal being entered in each action after the justice had refused to entertain jurisdiction. It was held that under such circumstances the superior court, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, was without power to try the action de novo. In People v. County Court, 10 Cal. 19, and Fabretti v. Superior Court, 77 Cal. 305, 19 P. 481, no issues of fact were tendered by the pleadings, the appeals having been taken from default judgments, and it was held that appeals on questions of law alone would lie. The case of Maxson v. Superior Court, 124 Cal. 468, 57 P. 379, determined merely that the superior court, in the exercise of its appellate power, had jurisdiction upon reversal of a judgment of the justice court appealed upon questions of law alone to make its judgment of reversal effectual by remanding the cause to the justice court for further proceedings according to its directions, and might thereby control and direct the subsequent action of the justice court. Abbey Land & Improvement Co. v. County of San Mateo, 167 Cal. 434, 139 P. 1068, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 408, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 804, and Quist v. Sandman, 154 Cal. 748, 99 P. 204, were actions commenced originally in the superior court. The causes were submitted for decision on the pleadings or on stipulated facts, and it was held that since the facts were not controverted motions for a new trial would not be entertained. In Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 36 P. 364, which was also a superior court action, it was held that a stipulation as to the facts dispenses with findings; and in Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. 471, it was held that where a plaintiff in the justice court has appealed to the superior court on questions of law from a judgment of dismissal entered against it upon the ground of failure to serve summons, and the defendant in the action appeared specially in the superior court for the purpose of moving the dismissal of the appeal, the superior court has not the right to ignore the appeal and order the defendant to answer and proceed to trial therein.

[8] Furthermore, and aside from the merits of the legal questions presented, we are convinced that petitioner, having voluntarily participated in the trial de novo in the superior court, without objection being made to the jurisdiction of that court to try the action anew, and having entered into a second stipulation therein as to the facts, is now precluded from attacking the judgment rendered therein on the merits. As held in Stehlin v. Superior Court, 12 Cal. App. 421, 107 P. 563, the superior court acquired jurisdiction of the appeal as taken, both of the parties and of the subject-matter; and where, under such circumstances, petitioner voluntarily appeared and submitted the whole controversy to the superior court, and an adverse judgment was rendered against him, he cannot be allowed for the first time upon certiorari to question the power of the court to try and determine the appeal on the merits.

For the reasons hereinabove set forth, the proceedings sought to be annulled are affirmed.

MURERO v. REINHART LUMBER CO. et al.
(Civ. 5821.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 12, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Trial §203(1), 295(1)—Trial court must give proper instructions supporting defendant's theory, as well as plaintiff's theory, and all instructions given must be read together.

Just as it is trial court's duty to give all proper instructions supporting plaintiff's theory of case, it is equally its duty to give all proper instructions supporting defendant's theory, and all instructions given must be read together.

2. Evidence §558(7)—Evidence that physician testifying as expert in personal injury case was frequently called as expert held not to show his interest.

Evidence that physician testifying for defendant in personal injury action was frequently called as expert witness in cases involving questions of medical jurisprudence did not show or tend to show his interest, and exclusion of such evidence to show interest was not prejudicial to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Louise Murero against the Reinhart Lumber Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; WASTE, C. J., and SEAWELL, J., voting for transfer.

Reisner & Deming, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis V. Crowley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover a judgment for damages alleged to have been suffered by reason of being struck by an automobile truck owned by the defendant lumber company and operated by the defendant Peter Leonard. The defendants answered and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendants and the plaintiff has appealed.

The plaintiff contends that the trial court erred in instructing the jury. Before considering the specific instructions it is necessary to state some of the facts. About 9 o'clock in the morning on the 26th day of September, 1923, the plaintiff had ridden on an east-bound car across Sixteenth street to Bryant street in San Francisco. She claimed that the car stopped on the east side of Bryant street, and that she stepped down onto the ground and turned to assist her daughter-in-law to also alight. While so standing immediately alongside of the car, she claims that the defendants' truck approached from the west and knocked her down and caused the injuries complained of.

The witnesses for the defense stated quite a different set of facts. The story as recited by those witnesses, in so far as necessary to be recited, was as follows: They claim that the defendants' truck was traveling along the south side of Sixteenth street toward Bryant street; that when it reached Bryant street a car was in the act of crossing over Sixteenth street running south on Bryant; that the truck paused for that car to cross Sixteenth street and thereafter the truck proceeded on its way. About that time a car on Sixteenth street approached from the west going in an easterly direction. As the defendants' truck was waiting for an opportunity to cross over Bryant, the two women were standing about on the south rail of the Sixteenth street car line, approximately on a line with the westerly sidewalk of Bryant. When the driver started ahead and when his front wheels were on the westerly rail of the south-bound Bryant street car track, he heard a yell and stopped. The plaintiff had come in collision with his left rear wheel. According to this theory the plaintiff was not in the act of alighting from any street car, her street car was not seen, and another street car was approaching from the west on the Sixteenth street tracks. In other words, it was the theory of the plaintiff that the accident occurred on the east side of the intersection of Sixteenth street and Bryant, and it was the theory of the defendants that the accident occurred on the west side of the intersection.

The trial court gave the jury an exhaustive charge and a number of instructions. It did so in groups and stated to the jury what portion was the charge of the trial court, what portion included instructions requested by the plaintiff, and what portion included instructions requested by the defendants. We do not understand the plaintiff to claim that any one instruction was an erroneous statement of the law. However, she does claim that some of the instructions were prejudicial—inapplicable to the case on trial. In other words, she relies on that part of section 134 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, pp. 517, 560) which is as follows:

"In passing any * * * street car while passengers are alighting from or boarding the same, vehicles shall be operated or driven on the right-hand side of such cars and at a rate of speed not exceeding ten miles an hour and no portion thereof or of any load thereon shall come within six feet of the running board or steps of such cars. * * *

That six-foot space she claims is a zone to which she had a superior right, and in which she could stand, relying on the presumption that all others would obey the law and not injure her while she was standing in that position. That contention it may be conceded is wholly sound. However, the concession does not assist the plaintiff. The trial court fully instructed the jury on that subject.

[1] Just as it was the duty of the trial court to instruct the jury giving all proper instructions supporting the theory of the plaintiff, it was equally the duty of the trial court to give to the jury all proper instructions supporting the theory of the defendants. It could not give all of the instructions in one. It is settled law, however, that all of the instructions are to be read together. As so read the instructions given in the instant case are not in conflict, but are full, fair, and exact. From an examination of the record it will readily be seen that the jury could not have been misinformed regarding the plaintiff's six-foot zone and her special rights therein. It is equally clear that if, as testified to by the witnesses for the defendants, the plaintiff's car had long since passed by and there was not involved a question of alighting from, or boarding a car, then it is equally clear that the jury should have been advised and was advised of the rights of the respective parties to use the streets.

[2] The last point made by the plaintiff is that the court erred in limiting the plaintiff on her cross-examination of Dr. McElroy, a witness tendered by the defendants. In this connection the record discloses that on cross-examination the plaintiff attempted to prove that Dr. McElroy is frequently called, and in the past has been frequently called, as an expert witness on questions of medical jurisprudence. She stated that in entering upon that line of proof she expected to show Dr. McElroy's interest. The trial court informed her that she was entirely at liberty to make any showing to place before the jury the interest of the witness. However, the trial court ruled that a showing that Dr. McElroy had frequently been called as an expert witness was not evidence showing, or tending to show, his interest. The ruling was clearly correct. The evidence tendered would be material as fortifying the qualifications of the witness and thus of strengthening the case for the defendants and disproving the case which the plaintiff was attempting to introduce. The plaintiff was not prejudiced by its rejection.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

BLOOM v. PACIFIC MUT. LIFE INS. CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 3281.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 13, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Insurance ⇨665(2)—Evidence held to warrant conclusion that life policies were unconditionally delivered to insured by insurer's agent.

In action to recover on policies of life insurance alleged to have been issued to plaintiff's husband, evidence held to warrant conclusion that policies were unconditionally delivered by insurer's agent to insured.

2. Insurance ⇨136(3)—Life policies became effective on delivery discharged of any condition on which delivery was made (Civ. Code, § 1626).

Under Civ. Code, § 1626, to effect that contract in writing takes effect upon its delivery to a party in whose favor it is made or to his agent, insurance policies became effective on delivery discharged of any condition on which delivery was made.

3. Insurance ⇨136(2)—Policy was constructively delivered when by agreement it was so understood.

An insurance policy is constructively delivered when, by agreement of parties at time of execution, it was understood to be delivered and under such circumstances that insured is entitled to immediate delivery.

4. Insurance ⇨136(2, 5)—Delivery of life policy is complete when sent to local agent for delivery, and acceptance binds acceptor as well as insurer.

Delivery of life policy is complete when policy is sent to local agent to be unconditionally delivered, and, though lost on the way, it is nevertheless the property of insured, and receipt of policy and acceptance by the insured binds the acceptor as well as insured to terms thereof.

5. Insurance ⇨141(2)—That full payment of premiums was not made at time of unconditional delivery of life policies held immaterial.

That full payment of premiums on life policy was not made at time of unconditional delivery of policies by insurer's agent held immaterial, where it was shown that agreement was made that he was to call for payment of premium that evening and policies were unconditionally delivered.

6. Insurance ⇨134(1)—Insured's failure to sign additional applications forwarded with policies to make insurer's records clear held not to affect recovery.

Failure of insured to sign additional applications contained in envelopes with policies and unconditionally delivered to him, in order to make records of insurer clear, held not to affect recovery thereof, since application forwarded with insured's name typewritten thereon became part of policy as fully to all intents and purposes as though actually signed by insured.

7. Evidence ⇨271(19)—Private correspondence between insurer and agent held inadmissible, in action to recover on life policies.

In action to recover on life policies alleged to have been issued by defendant to plaintiff's husband, private correspondence between defendant and its agent after issuance of policy held inadmissible as not constituting evidence against a third party.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1170(9)—Failure of instruction on distrusting false witness to require that testimony must be on material matter held not erroneous (Const. art. 6, § 4½; Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3).

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, failure of court to embody in instruction, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3, to effect that witness, false in one part of testimony, was to be distrusted in others, the element that testimony must be on a material matter held not to have resulted in miscarriage of justice.

9. Insurance ⇨669(2)—Trial ⇨194(11)—Instruction on insured's purpose in obtaining physical possession of life policies and inability to accept them without examination held property refused as invasion of jury's province and not supported by evidence.

In action to recover on life policies alleged to have been issued to plaintiff's husband, instruction relative to insured's purpose in obtaining physical possession of policies and to his inability to accept them without examining them and papers accompanying them held properly refused as being invasion of province of jury as instruction on facts and not supported by testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Rose Bloom against the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. S. Gray, of San Francisco, for appellant. Evan J. Hughes, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in the sum of $9,284.50 upon an action instituted to recover said sum on two certain policies of life insurance alleged to have been issued by the defendant, insuring plaintiff's husband, William Wolf Bloom. The policies in question were each for the sum of $5,000, and judgment was awarded for the amount of each policy, less the premium due thereon in the sum of $320.25 for each policy. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The transcript discloses the following facts:

That on or about the month of April, 1923, one Stillman, acting as the agent of the defendant and then residing in the city of Modesto, where the plaintiff then resided, interviewed the plaintiff and her husband, William Wolf Bloom, relative to the taking out of a life insurance policy by the said Bloom. After considerable negotiation the said William Wolf Bloom consented to the taking out of a policy in the sum of $5,000. Thereupon said Stillman wrote out and submitted a written proposal to the defendant, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California, whereby the said Bloom made application for the issuance to him of a life insurance policy in said sum. The application as filled out consists of questions and answers, and was upon a form presented by the said Stillman representing himself as the agent of the defendant.

It further appears from the transcript that the negotiations were had in the office adjoining the storeroom occupied by the Blooms in the conducting of a shoe store. That during the time the negotiations were being had Mr. Bloom was waiting upon customers. That he was going into the storeroom and waiting upon customers and returning to the place where the negotiations were being conducted. That at the completion of the writing out of the answers and questions contained in the application, Mr. Bloom was called into the storeroom to wait upon a customer, and thereupon Mr. Stillman requested that the plaintiff sign the name of William Wolf Bloom to the application, by herself, and this was done.

The transcript further shows that in pursuance of the application the said William Wolf Bloom went to the defendant's medical examiner in the city of Modesto, was there examined by him, made answers to the questions propounded by said medical examiner, signed the same, and this, together with the medical examiner's report and the report of Mr. Stillman, as well as the application, was sent to the defendant at its home office, in the city of Los Angeles.

It further appears that at the time these negotiations were being had and the application for a policy in the sum of $5,000 was being written, Mr. Stillman told Mr. Bloom that he would have another policy for an additional $5,000 prepared and issued for delivery; that he (Bloom) ought to take out insurance in the sum of $10,000. The application to which we have referred bears date of the 26th day of April, 1923, and was for an ordinary life policy. At the time of making the application just referred to the Blooms executed a promissory note for the payment of the first premium on the policy applied for, in the sum of $223, and delivered the same to said Stillman. A short time after these occurrences, the said Stillman, having learned that the company was preparing or issuing a different kind of policy from the one applied for, went to the Blooms and said to them:

"I just found out from the company that they are not issuing these policies. They are issuing higher premium policies."

He said they were $320 and some odd cents each. To this statement the record shows that both the plaintiff and Mr. Bloom replied, "That is all right."

That on about the 9th day of June, 1923, the defendant issued and forwarded to its agent in the city of San Francisco two 15-year endowment policies on the life of William Wolf Bloom. These policies were, by the San Francisco agent of the defendant, forwarded to Mr. Stillman in the city of Modesto. Thereafter, and on the morning of the 15th day of June, 1923, these policies were placed in the physical possession of William Wolf Bloom and plaintiff. The testimony of Stillman as to this particular transaction is, in substance, as follows:

"Approximately about 2½ months later I received two policies on the 15-year endowment plan and a note of not accepting the noncancelable at all. In other words, that was rejected. I was having breakfast at the Hughson Hotel and Mr. Bloom then passed the window. I called his attention and showed him the policies through the window. He came into the dining room, and he asked if those were his. I told him, 'Yes,' and then he said: 'Can I take them to show them to Mrs. Bloom?' I answered, 'Yes.' I finished my breakfast and followed to the store. I thought I would have a hard time in selling the insurance that was more than double the premium, and I began to explain to Mrs. Bloom what they were, and Mrs. Bloom at the time said: 'Come back in the evening, and we will talk it over.' I put the policies in my pocket, returned to my regular work, and in the afternoon I received a wire from the Pacific Mutual not to deliver the policies."

The testimony of Mrs. Bloom, corroborated by witness Robishaw, concerning this occurrence is, in substance, as follows:

"Mr. Bloom came into the store and handed me the policies. I looked at the policies and saw that they were for $5,000, with $320 premium each. I did not take the policies out of the envelope, but saw what they were by looking through the transparent covering of the envelopes in which they were contained."

The language of this witness, also corroborated by Robishaw, as to what occurred when Stillman called on the Blooms, after handing the policies to Mr. Bloom, is as follows:

"I set the policies on my ledger. It was about half past 10 or 11 o'clock that morning while I was sitting at my desk. Mr. Stillman came in and came right to my desk and talked about different things about 15 minutes and then said: 'Mrs. Bloom, can I borrow those policies and take them down the street to show to somebody, that I have a prospective customer,' and I handed them to him and said, 'If anything should happen to Mr. Bloom, is he covered?' And he said, 'He sure is.' So then I said, 'Come in to-night and get your money,' and he said, 'That is all right.' Mr. Stillman said the company would expect cash, and I said, 'Yes, sir.'"

The transcript further shows that on or about the 3d day of July, 1923, the promissory note for $223, executed by the Blooms and hereinbefore referred to, was returned to them by the company.

On the part of the defendant, it is contended that the envelopes containing the policies also contained a certificate of health to be signed by Bloom, and also another application for insurance to be signed by Bloom personally, and that delivery of the policies and their becoming effective were dependent upon the signing of another application by Mr. Bloom, and also his signing a certificate of health. The testimony of Mrs. Bloom, is to the effect that neither she nor Mr. Bloom saw either one of the papers referred to. As against this the defendant contends that these papers were inclosed in the envelopes containing the policies, and that if the Blooms had examined the contents of the two envelopes, they would have discovered these papers.

While the arguments of counsel are voluminous and many points have been made by the appellant in seeking reversal of the judgment in this cause, only two questions are really presented. First, were the policies delivered by the agent of the company to the Blooms? Second, was that delivery conditional? Upon the question of delivery and what Stillman had said to Bloom when the policies were handed to him, or what Bloom may have said at the time of handing said policies to Bloom, the jury was entitled to take into consideration what occurred between the Blooms and Mr. Stillman when he obtained possession of the policies at a later hour during the day, in relation to borrowing the policies.

The record further shows that William Wolf Bloom died on or about the 4th day of February, 1924, and that application was made for blanks to make proof of death, etc. These were declined by the defendant on the ground of nonliability. The record also shows that probably on the 14th day of June, 1923, Bloom consulted a physician who was the medical examiner employed by the defendant. This physician testified first that he was consulted on the 17th of June, but later in the day testified that he had re-examined his records and ascertained that Bloom had consulted him on June 14th. However, as the record does not show that said Bloom was afflicted with any disease at that time that caused his death, or in any way could be said to impair his physical condition or render him an unfit subject for insurance, it is immaterial on what day Bloom may have consulted a physician, as there is nothing in the record which shows any connection between the cause which induced Bloom to consult the physician in the month of June, 1923, and the cause which resulted in the death of Bloom in February, 1924.

Some contention is also made that Stillman was not authorized to deliver the policies in question to the Blooms. The record shows, however, that the application for an insurance policy to be issued by the defendant was taken by Stillman as the agent of the defendant; that the medical examination of Bloom was had at the instance of Mr. Stillman, and the papers pertaining to the same were all sent by Stillman to the home office of the defendant, and that the defendant, acting upon the same, issued the policies involved in this action. It may also be stated that practically all the papers in the record produced by the defendant, as well as by the plaintiff, bear the name of J. Stillman as agent of the defendant. The telegram sent by the defendant to Stillman to withhold the policies in question were received by him on the afternoon of June 15, 1923, after the policies had been placed in the possession of Mr. Bloom and after Mr. Stillman had called at the store to request, as testified by Mrs. Bloom and the witness Robishaw, that he might borrow the policies to show to a prospective customer. The testimony further shows that Stillman did not inform the Blooms of the telegram which he received on the afternoon of June 15, 1923, until two or three days later when request was made of him for the return of the policies. Mr. Stillman did not keep his appointment to meet the Blooms at 8 o'clock on the evening of June 15th, but telephoned to them that he had to make a trip to Stockton, some 30 miles away.

That the policies placed in the possession of the Blooms by Stillman were not so placed conditionally as contended for by the respondent is evidenced by a letter written by one L. W. Morgan, an official of the company and the manager of the company at San Francisco, transmitting the policies in question to the agent of the company at said city, and by said agent transmitted to Stillman. The letter is as follows:

"Laurence W. Morgan, Asst. Secretary and Superintendent Policy Department.

"Los Angeles, Cal., June 12, 1923.

"500789-90—Bloom.

"Mr. Arthur C. Parsons, Mgr., San Francisco, Cal.—Dear Sir: We inclose herewith the above numbered policies issued on the nonparticipating fifteen-year endowment plan without extended insurance as approved, rather than on the plan applied for. This case had the careful consideration of our application committee and it was decided that the plan as outlined above was the best we could offer on the life of Mr. Bloom.

"Kindly have the inclosed certificate of health signed and returned to the home office.

"Inasmuch as the application submitted is signed by Mrs. Bloom for her husband, and the medical report is signed by Mr. Bloom himself, we are inclosing herewith a typed copy of the application which we must ask you to kindly have Mr. Bloom sign himself in order that our records may be complete. When the application has been personally signed, please return same to the home office.

"Yours very truly,
"M.G.

L. W. Morgan."

[1] The transcript further shows that the said Arthur C. Parsons referred to in this letter, upon receipt of the policies, forwarded the same to J. Stillman, at Modesto, with a letter couched in identical language. These letters constitute all there is in the record relative to what was desired by the company in relation to having another and additional application signed by Mr. Bloom himself, and also as to Bloom signing a health certificate. The record is absolutely silent as to Bloom having been requested by the agent Stillman to sign either of said papers. Whether said papers were or were not in the envelopes at the time they were handed to the Blooms does not satisfactorily appear, but, assuming that they were, there is nothing to show that the Blooms ever saw them. However, the language of the two letters which we have set forth herein establishes beyond question that delivery of the policies was not made conditional upon the signing of either an additional application or the health certificate. The very language of the letter establishes that the company wanted at least one of the papers, to wit, the application, simply "in order that our records may be complete." These letters were admitted in evidence at the request of the defendant over the objection of the plaintiff, and while they would not be binding upon the plaintiff, having been produced and admitted in evidence at the request of the defendant, the defendant cannot very well now be heard to insist that they mean anything other or further than as stated by the express language used therein. And, as we have said, there is not a word in the letters accompanying the policies indicating to Stillman or to the Blooms that the delivery of the policies and their becoming effective was conditional upon Bloom signing either the health certificate or a new application to take the place of the one upon which the policies were issued. The record likewise shows that it was the practice of agents of the company, upon writing a policy in the sum of $5,000, to request the writing also of a policy in an additional sum of $5,000, in the event that the insured was financially able to carry the same. That as we have stated, Mr. Stillman so informed the Blooms and the Blooms agreed thereto, in pursuance of which Stillman did indorse upon the application forwarded to the company a request for an additional insurance in the sum of $5,000 bearing a like premium rate of $320 per annum, and that the two policies were sent by Mr. Morgan, the assistant secretary and superintendent of the policy department of the defendant, to its agent at San Francisco to be forwarded to Stillman for delivery to the Blooms. It may be here stated that the policies in question were numbered 500789 and 500790, the latter of which is referred to in the testimony as the "optional policy." The testimony of Mr. Morgan upon this fact is as follows:

"Q. Mr. Morgan, policies that you have identified here and marked 'Defendant's Exhibit 3', for identification, being policy 500789, and the policy marked 'Defendant's Exhibit 4' for identification, being 500790, were the policies that were issued on the life of William Wolf Bloom by the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company and sent through your San Francisco office to J. Stillman, the agent in Modesto? A. Yes, sir."

In addition to this the testimony of Stillman shows that he told Bloom he had two policies and that they were his (Bloom's) policies, and that he actually gave them to Bloom. As to whether the agent Stillman delivered the policies in question to Mr. Bloom as his policies or merely to show to his (Bloom's) wife, the jury was entitled to take into consideration the testimony of Stillman as to the manner and purpose of securing repossession of said policies, as contrasted with the testimony of the plaintiff and the witness Robishaw; and if the jury believed the version given by the plaintiff and the witness Robishaw, we think they had a right to conclude that there was nothing conditional in the delivery of the policies by Stillman to Bloom, at the Hughson Hotel, on the morning of June 15, 1923.

[2-4] As further bearing upon the question of delivery and whether the same was or was not conditional, we may further quote from the testimony of Stillman:

"Q. State whether or not you received any instructions in writing at the time you received and accompanying these two policies designated 500789 and 500790? A. I don't remember that. There might have been a letter with them saying that the company sent a 15-year endowment instead of ordinary life."

It is evident from this that nothing was sent by the company to its agent at Modesto indicating an intent to make delivery conditional or calling attention of its agent to the fact that any conditional delivery was contemplated. We think the jury was entitled to conclude from this testimony and the letter accompanying the policies forwarded by the company to its agent in San Francisco, and by him forwarded to Stillman, that no conditional delivery was contemplated, and that the taking effect of the policies did not depend in any wise upon Bloom signing a health certificate or a new application to take the place of the one first forwarded to the company, even though the envelopes containing the policies also contained said papers when they were placed in the possession of the Blooms. If the jury had a right so to conclude from the testimony, then section 1626 of the Civil Code applies. This section reads:

"A contract in writing takes effect upon its delivery to the party in whose favor it is made, or to his agent."

We may also here refer to the text set forth in 14 California Jurisprudence, page 425:

"Delivery is absolute, and thereupon the policies become effective discharged of any condition upon which delivery was made."

The text-writer in 14 California Jurisprudence, page 425, further states the rule, supported by many authorities, to wit:

"It is settled that when a contract of insurance is executed with a full knowledge of an existing fact which would render it void under a condition precedent embodied therein, the condition will be considered as waived, since otherwise it would be an unmeaning form, the only effect of which would be to deceive and defraud. It has been held, accordingly, that an express provision in a policy that the company shall not be liable until the premium is actually paid is waived by the unconditional delivery of the policy, as a completed and executed contract under an express or implied agreement that a credit shall be given for the premium; and the company is liable for a loss which may occur during the period of credit. A policy is constructively delivered when, by agreement of the parties at the time of execution, it is understood to be delivered, and under such circumstances that the insured is entitled to immediate delivery. * * * Moreover, it seems that if the insurer so far accepts the application as to prepare and forward a policy to its agent for delivery, and a payment of the premium has been made or waived or is not a condition of a policy taking effect, the contract is then complete and the insurer cannot revoke acceptance, though the policy has not been delivered. Delivery is complete, therefore, when the policy is sent to the local agent to be unconditionally delivered, and though lost on the way, it is nevertheless the property of the insured."

And, further, from the same volume, page 427:

"The receipt of a policy purporting to embody all the terms of the contract, and the acceptance thereof by the insured without objection, binds the acceptor as well as the insurer to the terms thereof. The insured may not thereafter be heard to say that he did not read it or know its terms, since it is his duty to read his policy, and it will be assumed that he did so."

[5] The transcript shows that after the receipt of the policy by the Blooms, a statement was made by them to the effect that they were ready and willing to pay for both policies in full, and if the agent would be there at 8 o'clock on the evening of the day when the policies were placed in the possession of the Blooms, full payment would be made, to which the agent stated, "That is all right." It is also to be borne in mind that the defendant already had in its possession a promissory note of the Blooms in the sum of $223. The fact that full payment was not made of the premiums on the two policies on the morning of June 15, 1923, under the circumstances which we have detailed, is wholly immaterial. This has been squarely decided in the case of Griffith v. New York Life Insurance Co., 101 Cal. 627, 36 P. 113, 40 Am. St. Rep. 96, where it held:

"An express provision in a policy of insurance that the company shall not be liable thereon unless the premium is actually paid is waived by the unconditional delivery of the policy to the assured as a completed and executed contract, under an express or implied agreement that a credit shall be given for a premium, and in such a case the company insuring is liable for a loss which may occur during the period of credit."

See, also, cases cited in 14 Cal. Jur. 425 et seq.

Many definitions of what is meant by delivery are cited in 18 C. J. 478, only one of which we need quote, to wit:

"A surrender of something to a person as his own property."

The very first statement of Stillman in relation to the policies to Bloom, by his own testimony, is that he held up the policies for Mr. Bloom to see, and stated to him (Bloom) that they were his (Bloom's) policies.

[6] Again, accepting the testimony of Stillman, the agent of the defendant, that the envelopes in which the policies were contained also contained an additional application for Mr. Bloom to sign to make the records of the defendant clear, as requested by them, the legal situation is unchanged. This question was presented and decided adversely to the contention of the appellant in the case of Kahn v. Royal Indemnity Co., 39 Cal. App. 180, 178 P. 331. Hearing in that case was denied by the Supreme Court. There the policy in question read as follows:

"This policy with a copy of the application therefor signed by the insured, and such other papers as may be attached to or indorsed hereon, shall constitute the entire contract between the company and the insured."

The application was not signed by the insured, and such failure was held immaterial. The policies with which we have to do read as follows:

"In consideration of the application for this policy, a copy of which is attached hereto and made a part hereof," etc.

The transcript shows, accepting the testimony of Stillman, that typewritten copies of Bloom's application, with Bloom's name typewritten therein in the place where ordinarily the signature of the applicant would be found, accompanied the policies, and under the case which we have cited and the authorities there referred to, the application became and was a part of each policy as fully to all intents and purposes as though actually signed by Bloom.

[7] The appellant in this case presented to the trial court a motion for nonsuit, a motion for a directed verdict, and a motion for a new trial. As grounds for a reversal herein appellant has argued these three points separately, but what we have said applies to all of said objections.

In further support of its appeal appellant alleges that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence a letter written by the defendant to Stillman, dated June 30, 1923. Also, in refusing to permit in evidence a letter from Stillman to the defendant returning the policies to the defendant, and a letter from the defendant's San Francisco office to Stillman, dated June 15, 1923. As to the third letter just mentioned, it refers to the fact that the defendant had issued a form of policy different from that actually applied for. As to the two other letters referred to, no authorities are cited to support the contention of appellant that private correspondence between the defendant and its agent, after the occurrence of an event, is admissible, and we assume that none can be cited, as it is self-evident that statements and letters passing between a principal and an agent in support of a defendant's contentions do not constitute evidence against a third party, though they may be admissible as admissions of a party writing the same when offered as admissions against interest.

[8] It is further urged that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury. In this behalf our attention is specifically called to the following, given at the request of the plaintiff:

"You are instructed that a witness, false in one part of his or her testimony, is to be distrusted in others. If you believe that any of the witnesses in this case testified falsely in any one part of his or her testimony, you have the right to distrust that witness in every other part of his or her testimony."

This instruction almost a literal repetition of subdivision 3 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure. However, in the case of People v. Plyler, 121 Cal. 160, 53 P. 553, it was held that the instruction given the language of the section should have added to it words incorporating the element of the witness being willfully false upon any material part of his testimony. The case referred to, however, was not reversed upon this ground, and under section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution we think that the failure of the court to embody in the instruction quoted the element of the witness being willfully false upon a material would not lead to a miscarriage of justice or tend to confuse or mislead the jury.

[9] It is further urged that the court committed reversible error in refusing to give to the jury the following instruction requested by the defendant:

"If you are satisfied from the evidence that the William Wolf Bloom named in the writings in evidence, known as 15-year endowment policies, obtained or received or was permitted to have physical possession of them because he asked for them to show to his wife, or otherwise than as then and there becoming absolutely his property without anything further being done, he could not accept them without examining them, and any papers that may have accompanied them, and the reading by him or the plaintiff of the indorsements on the back of said policies was not sufficient in that regard, and he and the plaintiff were bound by whatever would have been learned by reasonable examination of such policies and anything that may have accompanied them."

It is evident from a reading of this instruction that its refusal was proper. Besides being, in part, an invasion of the province of the jury as an instruction upon the facts, it is not supported by the testimony, as the record discloses that had Bloom and his wife examined the contents of the envelopes in which the policies were contained, as we have shown, they would not have ascertained or found anything therein indicating that any act should be done or performed by them as a condition precedent to the policies becoming effective. Under such circumstances, the trial court could not do otherwise than refuse the requested instruction. The instructions set forth in the transcript are very full, and have been carefully read and examined. We find no error therein prejudicial to the appellant, but we do find that the instructions given by the trial court are slightly more favorable to the appellant than appellant was entitled to. As to the immateriality of the objection that payment of the premium was not made on the morning of June 15th, but was promised to be made in full on the evening of said day, does not affect the validity of the policies, we may cite the cases of Raulet v. Northwestern Insurance Co., 157 Cal. 213-224, 107 P. 292, Farnum v. Phoenix Insurance Co., 83 Cal. 246-253, 23 P. 869, 17 Am. St. Rep. 233, and Griffith v. New York Life Insurance Co., 101 Cal. 627-631, 36 P. 113, 40 Am. St. Rep. 96. We do not deem it necessary to review the cases cited by appellant for the reason that, as heretofore stated in this opinion, really but two questions are presented—delivery and acceptance of the policies. These are questions involving simply the act and intent of the parties, and the finding of the jury thereon in favor of the plaintiff appears to us to be amply justified.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

HIGGINS v. EVA. (Civ. 5460.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 15, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 14, 1927.

1. Maritime liens ⚡60—Proceeding in rem against vessel in federal court held sole remedy of co-owners, voluntarily advancing money for salvaging and repairs of wrecked vessel.

Where part owners of wrecked vessel voluntarily provided funds for salvaging and repairs without any agreement by defendant co-owner to share such expenses, the remedy of such persons was solely in rem against the vessel, and hence within exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts.

2. Shipping ⚡21—Managing owner, as such, cannot bind co-owners personally for repairs at home port.

A managing owner of a vessel, as such, cannot bind his co-owners, to a personal liability for repairs at a home port.

3. Limitation of actions ⚡28(1), 39(1)—Action by part owners of vessel, if treated as one, for money judgment for defendant's proportionate share of cost of repairs, held barred by limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 343, and § 339, subd. 1).

Action, if treated as one, by part owners of vessel to recover money judgment against defendant co-owner for his proportionate share of cost of salvaging and repairs, held barred by two-year and four-year statute of limitations, Code Civ. Proc. § 343, and § 339, subd. 1.

4. Tenancy in common ⚡29(2)—Cotenant's interest is subject to lien for improvements authorized or assented to, though personal judgment for cost thereof cannot be had against cotenant, in absence of contract.

If a cotenant has assented to or authorized improvements to be made, he is answerable therefor, and a lien exists against his property for the amount thereof; but, in the absence of contract, one cotenant cannot recover a personal judgment against another for cost of improvements.

5. Tenancy in common ⚡32—Cotenant in possession may deduct from rents or profits cost of working, developing, or protecting property.

A cotenant in possession is entitled to deduct from rents or profits received the cost of all proper expenditures made in working the property and developing it or in protecting the common estate.

6. Shipping ⚡21—Tenancy in common ⚡1—Tenancy in common can exist in personality, as well as realty, and, ordinarily, owners of merchant vessels or steamers so hold.

Though definitions of tenancy in common generally relate to tenancy in common in real property, such a tenancy can exist in personality, as well as in realty, and, ordinarily, the owners of merchant vessels or steamers hold their interest therein as tenants in common.

7. Shipping ⚡21—In absence of contrary agreement, ship owners hold as tenants in common and not as partners.

Ships are chattels of which the owners, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, are possessed as tenants in common and not as partners.

8. Shipping ⚡21—Part owners held not entitled to personal judgment against co-owner for cost of unauthorized alterations.

Plaintiffs, part owners of vessel, held not entitled to judgment against co-owner for his proportionate share of cost of alterations and repairs, in the absence of any contract authorizing such expenditures.

9. Shipping ⚡21—Co-owner's silence, coupled with knowledge of salvaging and repairs of vessel, held not to warrant personal judgment for proportionate cost thereof in excess of profits.

Mere silence of co-owner of vessel, coupled with knowledge of expenditures for salvaging, reconstructing, and repairing vessel, will not warrant a personal judgment against such co-owner for his proportionate share of such expenditures in excess of profits earned, on theory that contract resulted.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by C. H. Higgins, for himself and for and on behalf of his co-owners of record in the American steamship Fort Bragg, other than the defendant, against William J. Eva, for specific performance of alleged contract and for money judgment. From the judgment rendered, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edwin T. McMurray, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. The steamer Fort Bragg was owned by appellant, respondent, and others as tenants in common. The steamer was wrecked in the Gulf of California; it was salvaged, repaired, and lengthened by respondent and other owners, not including appellant; appellant did not pay any portion of the cost of salvage, etc.; and this action involves the respective rights of the parties as the result of appellant's failure or refusal to pay his proportionate part of the cost of such salvage and moneys expended in repairing and lengthening the vessel.

According to the allegations of the complaint the steamer in question was wrecked; its owners are numerous, and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court; and that the questions involved are of common interest to all record owners, with the exception of defendant owner, Eva. Plaintiff was acting as managing owner. The vessel was determined to be a constructive total loss, and the underwriters paid the insurance carried by the several owners on their respective interests in full, thereby acquiring a 69 per cent. ownership in the wreck; that for approximately two months prior to January 17, 1916, the plaintiff, as managing owner and representative of the original owners of the steamer, undertook to sell the wreck and salvage the vessel for the account of those interested therein, but no substantial offer could be obtained therefor. On account thereof on or about January 17, 1916, plaintiff undertook to secure financial co-operation of the underwriters with the original owners in chartering, fitting out, and dispatching a steamer to the wreck in an attempt to float and tow it to an American port. Said underwriters declined to assume any portion of the financial hazard or obligation of such an undertaking, but, in order to induce said original owners to make an effort to float said steamer, agreed with plaintiff, as the representative of said owners, that, if they would assume the financial risk of such a venture, the underwriters would transfer their entire interest in said steamer to said owners without consideration, upon the condition, however, that, if said vessel were successfully floated, said owners would pay therefor on the basis of a valuation of $10,000 for the entire vessel, and upon the basis of a valuation of $15,000 for the entire vessel, if said owners succeeded in reaching an American port with said wreck. Immediately all of the owners, including the defendant, Eva, were advised and notified of said offer by said underwriters, and certain of the owners, including plaintiff, believed that an effort to float and repair said wreck should be made and agreed together with all other owners who should signify their willingness to pay pro rata to assume the expense thereof, upon the condition, however, that any or all of the other owners who did not desire to assume the risk and hazard and pay their portion of the expense would transfer their interest upon the same terms and conditions as the underwriters had agreed to do. There was no opposition or objection and all the owners who had declined to participate in the undertaking, excepting defendant, Eva, transferred their interests. A steamer was chartered, equipped, and dispatched to said wreck, and said vessel was floated and towed into the port of San Francisco at an expense of $17,264.77, and was reconstructed and repaired at a cost of $78,175.30, which amounts were paid by the original owners who had agreed to bear the same. The amount due defendant, Eva, under the agreement was tendered to him in due course and at various times up to and including July 20, 1920, and he at all times refused to transfer his interest, and his interest in said steamer still stands of record in his name in the United States custom house at San Francisco. At various times subsequent to the completion and repair of said vessel said owners offered to waive any right of transfer of said interest provided defendant, Eva, would be willing to assume the responsibility of an owner for the expense incurred aforesaid. Defendant at all times has consistently refused to admit any liability. Since the repair of said vessel it has been operated at a loss, and on March 1, 1921, an assessment of $348.26 was levied against each interest therein. All of said expense and losses chargeable against the interest of defendant, Eva, have been paid by plaintiff. The complaint further alleges that the registration in said custom house of the interest of William J. Eva is prejudicial to and a cloud upon the title of the owners therein who assumed the financial risk and hazard of operating said steamer. The prayer of the complaint is for judgment against defendant for the execution and delivery, by said defendant, Eva, of a good and sufficient bill of sale conveying said interest to plaintiff as the managing owner of said steamer upon payment to him by said owners of $150, or such other sum as the court may find to be just and equitable, or for such other and further relief as the court may deem fair and equitable in the premises.

Defendant demurred to the complaint on numerous grounds, among which being that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the court has not jurisdiction of the subject of the action; and that the alleged cause of action is barred by sections 339 and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer being overruled, defendant sets up in his answer, as further and separate defenses, the bar of the statute of limitations under the provisions of sections 339 and 343 of the Code referred to, and that the court has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, alleging that the action is a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States District Court.

From an examination of the allegations of the complaint in the light of the specific prayer thereof, it appears the action was intended as one to compel appellant to transfer his interest in the steamer to respondent and the other owners. The complaint, however, does not allege, nor does the evidence show, any agreement whereby appellant agreed to transfer his interest, and our attention has not been called to any statutory authority for compelling him to do so. The relief prayed for being in rem against the vessel and not a common-law remedy giving the plaintiff a right to proceed in personam against the defendant, the power to grant such relief was vested exclusively in the United States District Court. Fischer v. Carey, 173 Cal. 185, 159 P. 577, L. R. A. 1917A, 1100. However, in so far as this appeal is concerned, this theory of the case may be dismissed, for even though respondent had pleaded an agreement by appellant to convey his interest and the evidence had been sufficient to justify such a finding, the trial court did not grant any such relief, but specifically found "that specific performance of defendant's agreement to transfer his $\frac{1}{100}$ th interest in the steamer Fort Bragg should not be enforced."

[1] The allegations of the complaint, which the court found to be true, show that the several payments made by respondent and certain other owners for salvaging and repairs were voluntary payments and without any agreement by appellant to bear any part of the expense; therefore the only remedy of the former was in rem against the vessel. The Steamboat Mayflower v. The Steamboat Sabine, 101 U. S. 384, 25 L. Ed. 982.

While the court found that specific performance of defendant's agreement to transfer his interest in the steamer should not be enforced as prayed for by plaintiff, it did find "that defendant refused to pay the portion of said amount chargeable to his $\frac{1}{100}$ th interest, to it, \$954.40, and on or about September 1, 1916, plaintiff, as managing owner of said vessel, was required to borrow, and did borrow, the said amount in order to meet the indebtedness so incurred," and also "that on or about December 28, 1920, the amount of \$34,826 was expended by the owners of said steamer in making necessary alterations and repairs, and defendant refused to pay the portion thereof chargeable to his $\frac{1}{100}$ th interest amounting to \$348.26; and plaintiff was required to borrow, and did borrow, the said sum of \$348.26 to pay for said repairs and alterations," and concludes from such facts that plaintiff is entitled to a money judgment against defendant. From what has been said it follows that in our opinion these amounts claimed to be due for salvaging the vessel and repairing it under the circumstances here disclosed, in the absence of any authorization by appellant, cannot be recovered in an action in personam, but must be maintained in rem in the federal court, which has exclusive jurisdiction.

[2] The evidence also shows that the repairs were made in San Francisco, the home port of the steamer Fort Bragg. A managing owner as such—and respondent was no more than that—cannot bind his co-owners to a personal liability for repairs at a home port. Woodall v. Dempsey (D. C.) 100 F. 653; The William Thomas v. Ellis, 4 Har. (Del.) 309; Hill v. Crocker, 87 Me. 208, 32 A. 878, 47 Am. St. Rep. 321; Benson v. Thompson, 27 Me. 470, 46 Am. Dec. 617; Pentz v. Clarke, 41 Md. 327.

Respondent in his brief states that there is practically no conflict as to the facts; that "a controversy arose and existed at the time the action was brought between the several owners, not partners, in the steamer Fort Bragg arising out of the salvaging and repair of the vessel after being wrecked in the Gulf of California. On one side of the controversy is the appellant, owing a $\frac{1}{100}$ interest in the steamer, and on the other, the owners of the remaining $\frac{9}{100}$. The action was brought by respondent, the acting managing owner of $\frac{9}{100}$ interests, under section 964 of the Civil Code to determine this controversy." The section of the Code referred to provides:

"If a ship belong to several persons, not partners, and they differ as to its use or repair, the controversy may be determined by any court of competent jurisdiction."

We are unable to find any evidence in the record to support respondent's claim that the parties to the action differed either as to the use or as to the repair of the vessel, or that any controversy whatever arose over its use or repair. It appears that respondent, without any suggestion or interference on the part of appellant, repaired, reconstructed, and lengthened the vessel. The controversy seemed to be over the sale of the vessel. Respondent was seeking to compel appellant to sell his interest in the vessel for an amount that was not satisfactory to him, while appellant was claiming a right to inspect the books—to an accounting.

[3] If, however, the action be treated as one for a money judgment, it is clear that the claim for $954.40, which plaintiff as managing owner borrowed on September 1, 1916, and paid on the salvage indebtedness and the reconstruction expenditure to cover the proportionate share of defendant, arose in September, 1916, when the money was paid, and as the complaint was not filed until December 1, 1921, it is apparent such cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, whether we apply the two-year limitation for implied oral contracts provided by subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure or the four-year limitation prescribed by section 343 of the same Code for causes of action not coming within one of the other sections of the Code, as more than four years elapsed between the time the cause of action accrued and the action was commenced.

As to the $348.26, which the court found was chargeable to appellant's proportionate share, paid by respondent for repairs and alterations on or about December 28, 1920, and for which an assessment was levied on March 1, 1921, and concerning which there is no evidence to show that such repairs or alterations were authorized or agreed to by appellant or that he had any knowledge concerning the making of such repairs or alterations, it may be said:

"Neither cotenant has any power to compel the other to unite with him in erecting buildings or in making any other improvements upon the common property." Freeman on Cotenancy (2d Ed.) par. 262.

[4, 5] If a cotenant has assented to or authorized the improvements to be made, he is answerable therefor, and a lien exists against his property for the amount thereof (Robinson v. Bledsoe, 23 Cal. App. 687, 139 P. 245; Arroyo Ditch & Water Co. v. Bequette, 149 Cal. 543, 87 P. 10, but we know of no authority, and none has been called to our attention, holding that one cotenant can recover a personal judgment against another cotenant in the absence of contract to that effect. A cotenant in possession, however, is entitled to deduct from the rents or profits received the cost of all proper expenditures made in working the property and developing it, and protecting the common estate (McCord v. Oakland Q. M. Co., 64 Cal. 134, 27 P. 863, 49 Ann. Rep. 686; Raun v. Reynolds, 18 Cal. 275), which the evidence shows was done in this case; profits having been earned and payment of appellant's proportionate share withheld.

[6, 7] While definitions of tenancy in common generally relate to tenancy in common in real property, this tenancy can exist in personality, as well as in realty (Haven v. Mehlgarten, 19 Ill. 91; Livingston v. Lynch, 4 Johns Ch. [N. Y.] 573), and authority generally holds that owners of merchant vessels or steamers holding their interests therein as tenants in common are governed by the rules of law applicable to that species of tenure. See authorities, 36 Cyc. 29, note 31. Ships are declared to be chattels, of which the owners, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, are possessed as tenants in common and not as partners. Thorndike v. De Wolf, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 120.

[8] While the court found in finding that all the allegations of the complaint are true that an assessment of $348.26 expended in making alterations and repairs in December, 1920, was levied in March, 1921, against appellant, respondent pleads no contract authorizing the levy of an assessment, nor did he prove any such contract; neither did he plead nor prove any corporate status or other relationship giving any right to levy or collect by personal action an assessment to cover a deficit in operating expenses.

As has been said, according to the complaint, this action was brought for the purpose of enforcing specific performance of a contract of sale, the basis of the action being an implied agreement or acquiescence in the terms of a contract contained in a circular letter mailed to all of the owners of the steamer Fort Bragg, advising them that effort would be made to salvage such vessel, and explaining to them that it was proposed to charter and equip a steamer for that purpose, and advising any owners not wanting to incur the financial risk involved to join in the proposal made by the underwriters; that before anything could be done it would be necessary for those electing to join in the attempt to salvage the steamer to make their election and obligate themselves to pay their portion of the expense in writing. It also provided that, if no objection was made to the plan of procedure within a reasonable time, which was definitely specified, the plan would be considered approved and the proposed action taken, and that any of the owners not expressly making an election under the plan within the time specified would be considered as approving the plan and electing to join in the offer made by the underwriters; that is, to accept as payment for their respective interests what their proportionate interest bears to a valuation of $15,000 for the steamer, the steamer being floated and towed to the port of San Francisco.

[9] The appellant claims that he never received a copy of the circular letter, and, while the court made no finding that he did in fact receive such letter, it did find that appellant "had full knowledge of the action of his co-owners in the steamer Fort Bragg in reference to salvaging, repairing, and reconstructing said steamer, and ratified the same by his acquiescence." In other words, that mere silence on his part, coupled with knowledge of the fact of the salvaging, reconstruction, repair, and lengthening of the vessel, bound appellant to a contract upon which recovery could be had by way of personal judgment; that under such circumstances one tenant in common can enforce a personal judgment for money in excess of the profits earned. Respondent has not cited us to any authority sustaining such a position and what authority we have found is to the contrary. We do not deem it necessary to a decision of the case to discuss the points raised on demurrer, as the case can be disposed of on its merits.

From what has been said, it follows that we are of the opinion that if the action be one as indicated by the prayer of the complaint for the execution and delivery by defendant, Eva, of a bill of sale conveying his interest in the vessel to plaintiff, Higgins, as the managing owner of the steamer upon payment therefor, such action is one in rem and in the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal court; that if it be construed to be an action for the recovery by one tenant in common against another tenant in common for money paid in protecting, improving, and repairing the common property, no authorization existing therefor, no personal judgment may be had against the cotenant defendant, and, further, that the claim for money borrowed and paid by respondent, Higgins, to cover the proportionate share of appellant in salvaging, lengthening, and repairing the vessel in 1916 is barred by the statute; that the item of $348.26, which respondent borrowed and paid in December, 1920, as the proportionate share of appellant, as the court found, to cover the cost of repairs, and that an assessment was levied to cover this item, which occasioned a loss in operating expenses, no authorization by appellant being shown, cannot be recovered by way of personal judgment.

Upon the record here presented a reversal of the judgment must be ordered, and as there is no material conflict in the evidence, and upon a retrial no different result would obtain from that here indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the trial court directed to enter judgment for defendant.

PEOPLE v. HOTZ. (Cr. 1519.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 14, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Embezzlement ⇨8—Partner cannot embezzle partnership funds.

Partner cannot be guilty of embezzlement of partnership funds.

2. Partnership ⇨17—In determining whether agreement is partnership or agency agreement, designation adopted by parties should be considered.

In determining whether an agreement was a partnership or agency agreement, while the substance and terms must govern, some weight should be given to the designation adopted by the parties.

3. Partnership ⇨1—Some joint ownership and joint liability are essential elements of "copartnership."

To constitute a "copartnership" undertaking it is essential that there be some joint ownership and joint liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Copartnership.]

4. Embezzlement ⇨8—Partnership ⇨12—Mere agreement to share profits from sale of new automobiles and profits and losses from old automobiles received in exchange held not partnership, and defendant's appropriation of receipts therefore constituted embezzlement.

Mere agreement to share profits from the sale of new cars and the sale of used cars which were taken in trade, and to share losses from the sale of any of the used cars, where there was no joint ownership, joint liability, or joint control of the business, and where defendant had no share in paying general overhead expense, held one of agency, and not of partnership, and the defendant's appropriation of receipts therefore constituted embezzlement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Lloyd G. Hotz was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John S. Cooper and Greenschlag & Schaffer, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendant was convicted by the verdict of the jury with the offense of embezzlement, and he appeals from the judgment pronounced upon the verdict and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The facts essential to an understanding of this appeal are as follows: C. B. James & Son were the owners and operators of a garage in San Fernando, and as a part of that business sold new and used automobiles. Shortly before January 1, 1927, they orally entered into an agreement with the defendant, whereby he was to sell new automobiles for them and to receive as his compensation, as stated by defendant, "50 per cent. of the net profits of the sale of new cars, and 50 per cent. of the sale of used cars that we were taking in trade, and if it was sold for any less I was to assume 50 per cent. of the loss of the sale." Amplified by other witnesses, the contract under which the defendant went to work provided that he was to receive as his compensation one-half of the amount realized upon the sale of a new car over and above its cost, with the further understanding that if a used car were accepted as part payment and it was resold for a sum less than the sum allowed when taken in exchange, plus the cost of conditioning it for resale, if any, one-half of such deficiency was to be charged against the defendant. "The net profits" referred to by the defendant was defined by the witness Raleigh James as being the difference between the cost price and the selling price, and the loss referred to by the defendant as being the loss upon any automobile taken in on a sale of a new car by the defendant.

[1] There is no denial of the fact that the defendant used the proceeds resulting from the sale of a new car by him in the sum of $500, but he asserts that the relationship which existed between himself and C. B. James & Son was that of a partnership. He does not contend that he was a partner in the general garage business, but only in the business of selling new automobiles. He further asserts that, inasmuch as the money used by him was partnership funds, he could not be guilty of the offense of embezzlement. Since it is well established that a partner cannot be guilty of embezzlement of partnership funds (Ex parte Sanders, 23 Ariz. 20, 201 P. 93, 17 A. L. R. 980, and annotation, 982), the sole question for determination is whether the contract made did constitute the defendant a partner. It should be noted that in all of the testimony of the witnesses they referred to the employment of the defendant rather than entering into a copartnership.

[2] While the substance and terms of the agreement must govern, some weight should be given to the designation adopted by the parties. Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Grider, 152 Cal. 746, 94 P. 601; Auditorium Co. v. Barsotti, 40 Cal. App. 592, 181 P. 413; Gray v. Yarbrough, 61 Cal. App. 724-729, 215 P. 914.

[3, 4] As a further indication of the intent of the parties it should be noted that the agreement did not contemplate any deduction for general overhead expense prior to the division between the defendant and C. B. James & Son. While the term "net profits" was used, its subsequent definition proved that compensation was based on gross profits, subject only to the deduction liable to arise by reason of taking in as part payment a used automobile at too great a value. It is apparent therefore that there was no joint liability. Furthermore, there was no community of interest in the automobiles to be sold. The agreement in no way contemplated that they should become partnership assets. Some joint ownership and joint liability are essential elements of a copartnership undertaking. Ward v. State, 113 Miss. 22, 73 So. 865. Again, it should be borne in mind that the agreement did not provide that the defendant and C. B. James & Son should carry on business together, but rather that the defendant should sell automobiles for C. B. James & Son, who had the direct control of the business. Perhaps the most distinguishing feature of a copartnership is the association for the "purpose of carrying on business together" (Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451-454, 55 P. 147, 148), and the agreement to divide profits is not sufficient (Auditorium Co. v. Barsotti, supra). It is stated in the case of Wheeler v. Farmer, 38 Cal. 203-213, that one of the elements of partnership is the "community of interest in capital, stock, profit, or loss," and that "an agreement to divide the gross earnings does not constitute the parties to it partners." There can be no question under the authorities cited that the relationship existing between the parties here was that of principal and agent rather than that of partners.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action to quiet title by James D. Phelan and others against all persons claiming any interest in or lien on the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Francis J. Sullivan, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Francis J. Sullivan appeals. Affirmed.

Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco (Robert P. Troy, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

D. C. Murphy, of San Francisco, and R. M. J. Armstrong, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for Charles A. Sullivan.

LANGDON, J. This action was commenced by plaintiffs to quiet title to certain parcels of real property in the city and county of San Francisco, alleging that they were tenants in common of the same. The city and county of San Francisco filed a formal answer thereto, but no proof was made by them at the trial. Francis J. Sullivan filed an answer asserting that "he has a right, title, and interest in the real property referred to in the complaint." He also alleged that he was president of the plaintiff corporation, Alice Phelan Sullivan Corporation, and also a stockholder thereof; "that said corporation is a family corporation composed of 10,000 shares; that James D. Phelan owns a very few shares, to wit, one share, but absolutely controls the board of directors, who are also stockholders; that all the business of the corporation, as well as the officers thereof, except affiant, are subject to his will and act in conjunction with him; and that for this reason it would be of no avail to make a demand on the directors to file an answer herein. Such a request would have been useless and would have been refused; therefore affiant has verified and filed this answer on behalf of all the stockholders of the Alice Phelan Sullivan Corporation and of the corporation itself." It is also alleged that defendant Sullivan is the sole owner of

1. Quieting title $\S$ 10(2)—Ownership of stock held not to give stockholder interest in corporation's real property.

In an action to quiet title, the ownership of shares of stock in a corporation held to give no legal title to the stockholder to the property of the corporation.

2. Quieting title $\S$ 31—Statutory requirement that order of publication of summons, in action to quiet title, must be filed with clerk, held mandatory (McEnerney Act).

Requirement of McEnerney Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1906, p. 78) that the order of publication of summons, in an action to quiet title, designating the newspaper in which such publication is to be made, shall be signed and filed with the clerk, held mandatory.

the lot on the southwest corner of Folsom and Ninth streets, having purchased the same from the plaintiffs, but no proof was adduced at the trial of his ownership of this lot.

[1] From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant Sullivan appealed, and one of his contentions upon appeal is that the finding that he had no interest in said property or any part thereof at the time of the commencement of the action is contrary to the admitted fact that he was a stockholder of the Alice Phelan Sullivan Corporation at the commencement of the action, one of the tenants in common of the property. It is elementary that the ownership of shares of stock in a corporation gives no legal title to the property of the corporation to the stockholder. Kohl v. Lilienthal, 81 Cal. 378, 385, 20 P. 401, 22 P. 689, 6 L. R. A. 520.

[2, 3] It is also contended that the present action was barred by reason of a judgment obtained in 1909 in a McEnerney suit, affecting the property involved here, in which James D. Phelan, Mary L. Phelan, and Alice Phelan Sullivan were plaintiffs. Respondents take the position that said prior judgment was void on its face, because the judgment roll showed that no order for publication of summons was on file at the time publication was made. The publication of summons was completed on August 27, 1908, and the order for publication, though dated as of an earlier date, was not filed until January 13, 1909. Section 4 of the so-called McEnerney Act (Stats. 1906, p. 79) contains the following provision:

"The newspaper in which such publication is to be made shall be designated by an order of the court or a judge thereof to be signed and filed with the clerk."

The time allowed by the act (section 8) for pleading to the complaint begins to run from the first publication of summons. It is apparent, therefore, that the requirements as to the filing of the order for publication is mandatory and jurisdictional. Such a construction was placed upon section 1491a, Code of Civil Procedure, requiring the filing of a copy of notice to creditors, in the case of Hawkins v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 746, 134 P. 329, where it was said:

"If it is directory merely, it, of course, follows that the notice need not be filed within the time specified in the section, but at any other time, even after the publication has been completed and the time for presenting claims has expired, and when the filing of it could serve no purpose whatever. The practical effect of such a construction would be to hold that the filing of the required notice need not be made at all."

It has also been held (Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 109 P. 91), that an order has no inherent vitality or effect until filed with the clerk. Inasmuch as the judgment roll in the prior action to quiet title to the property involved here shows the actual date of filing the order for publication of summons therein, as of a date subsequent to the publication of summons, the recital in the judgment therein that summons was regularly published does not cure the defect. Grinbaum v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 546, 221 P. 635.

There are other matters urged by the appellant, but they are without merit and need not be discussed in detail, for the reason that it appears from the record that the judgment rendered is correct and proper and that no substantial right of appellant has been prejudiced thereby.

Since this appeal was perfected the appellant has been declared incompetent to manage his own affairs and a guardian of his person and estate has been duly appointed. The appellant acted as his own attorney in filing the appeal and the opening brief presented to the court and Robert P. Troy appeared as associate counsel. Mr. Troy contested the appointment of a guardian, but it was held in the case of Sullivan v. Dunne, 198 Cal. 183, 244 P. 343, that he had no authority to act for appellant under the circumstances. After the appointment of the guardian for appellant an additional brief was filed in this court by said guardian on behalf of appellant, in which brief the guardian recognized his duty to his ward not to prolong useless and meritless litigation, and in which it was admitted that no substantial right of appellant had been invaded by the judgment and that the judgment should be affirmed.

It is also true that Robert P. Troy has filed a brief herein as amicus curiae, raising various technical objections, which it is unnecessary to set forth in this opinion because we find no merit in the appeal nor in any of the matters urged for reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

WHITWORTH et al. v. FERNANDEZ et al.
(L. A. 7665.)★

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 13, 1927.

1. Adverse possession ⇐95—Evidence held to justify finding of payment of taxes for over 5 years by plaintiffs and predecessors before suing to determine adverse claims (Code Civ. Proc. § 749).

In action to determine adverse claims, under Code Civ. Proc. § 749, against claimant under quitclaim deed from plaintiffs' grantor, evidence held to support trial court's finding that plaintiffs and their predecessors had paid taxes on land in dispute for over 5 years, which, with elements conceded, completed elements to establish title by adverse possession as of such date, even though not founded on instrument, and to give perfect title as against grantor, predecessor of defendant grantee, by quitclaim deed.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1035—Judgment quieting title in plaintiffs will not be reversed because plaintiffs might properly have brought suits of different character (Code Civ. Proc. § 749).

Although plaintiffs suing grantee by quitclaim deed from their grantor to determine adverse claims, under Code Civ. Proc. § 749, might properly have brought suit or suits of different character and obtained same or equivalent relief, as, for example, suit to compel proper conveyance or to establish by parol testimony agreed boundary line where boundary was uncertain, judgment for plaintiffs based on title by adverse possession will not be reversed in order that more appropriate remedy may be sought.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by James C. Whitworth and another against Michael M. Fernandez and others to quiet title. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Superseding former opinions in 255 P. 873 and 257 P. 205.

J. H. De La Monte and Walter W. Little, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

C. L. Kilgore, Chandler, Wright & Ward, and Jefferson P. Chandler, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an action by plaintiffs, under section 749 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to determine adverse claims to what is known as lot 13 of the Whitworth tract, county of Los Angeles. The real dispute centers around the easterly 42.1 feet of said lot 13.

It appears that on the 20th day of January, 1883, and for some time prior thereto, one Christopher Greve was the owner of a tract of land situated in the westerly portion of what is officially known as lot 1 of the Rancho

Rodeo de las Aguas, lying north of Eberle road, now known as Pico road; that on the 20th day of January, 1883, said Greve granted to Joseph Whitworth the westerly portion of said subdivision of said lot 1, described as follows:

"Beginning at the southwest corner of the land now owned by Jas. A. Whitworth and being one of the corners of lot number two (2) of the Rancho Rodeo de las Aguas as recorded on page 572, book one (1), of the Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles County; thence following the north line of lot number two (2) east 6.76 chains; then south 4.52 chains to the north side of county road; thence north 76°, 54' W. along north side of county road 7.94 chains to a stake, thence N. 2° 21' east 4.48 chains to the place of beginning, containing three (3) acres of land more or less."

This conveyance made the easterly line of the Whitworth purchase the westerly line of said grantor Greve. Within a very short time after said purchase, the two neighbors built through their joint efforts a fence along said line between their properties and also planted along the fence a row of eucalypti, both of which landmarks have remained for the past 40 odd years. Whitworth used the fence as a portion of the inclosure of the tract of land purchased by him and continuously since said purchase he and his successors in interest have cultivated and enjoyed the whole of said tract of land to said fence line without hinderance of any kind from said Greve and his successors in interest or any one else except as hereinafter stated. Likewise, said Whitworth and his successors in interest have for more than 20 years last past had said strip of land here in dispute set to walnut trees.

About the year 1910 said grantor Greve caused the remaining portion of his land in that vicinity, to wit, 16.22 acres, to be known as a portion of tract 470 and a map thereof to be duly and officially filed. Later, about 1911, the successors in interest of said Whitworth, who had died in 1904, caused to be made and filed a map and plat of the property conveyed by said deed of 1883 and other lands and caused the same to be officially known on the records of Los Angeles county as the Whitworth tract. The strip of land here in dispute is, as above stated, the easterly 42.1 feet of said lot 13 of said Whitworth tract. These families were friends during their residence on these tracts and apparently the friendship between them still obtains, notwithstanding the acts and conduct of the defendant Michael M. Fernandez.

It appears that said Fernandez, in 1910 or 1911, discovered what he thought was a discrepancy in the descriptions in the deeds under which the respective parties to said tract of land were claiming, and induced said grantor Greve to cause to be put on the assessment roll for the year 1911 the said strip of land as a separate assessment, and it has continued to be separately assessed since said date—for some years to Greve, and a few times to both Greve and Whitworth.

On the 15th day of February, 1915, said Greve and wife made a quitclaim deed to defendant Fernandez of all said strip of land and to a separate tract described also as part of said lot 13, but the evidence shows that Fernandez paid no consideration for said deed and took same for the purpose of attempting to get some money consideration from the Whitworths, agreeing to divide any money so received equally with Greve. Later Christopher Greve died, and his widow and children and heirs at law also made a quitclaim deed to said strip of land to plaintiffs herein and likewise became witnesses for them in this cause, repudiating entirely, in so far as they could, the quitclaim deed made to Fernandez, and repudiating as well the conduct of Fernandez. In other words, it is apparent that the claim of Fernandez is wholly inequitable and entirely without moral justification.

It will be observed that in the description in the deed to Whitworth above mentioned, there are many discrepancies and uncertainties. Lot 2 is mentioned, which apparently should have been lot 1 of said Rancho. The starting point is uncertain and indefinite, and the calls of the deed do not correspond to the fixed monuments therein mentioned. It is difficult to say whether it is the east line or the west line of said tract that is most in doubt. The acreage computed by the calls of the deed alone, disregarding fixed monuments, makes only 2.53 acres. The acreage computed to the fence line would make 3.63 acres, so the description "three acres more or less" may fit either description. Moreover, it is conceded that every element of adverse possession against the defendant Fernandez is present save and except alone the one of payment of taxes. This must be true because the uncontradicted evidence shows, as above stated, peaceful enjoyment by Whitworth and his predecessors in interest of this entire tract of land, adversely and under a claim of right, over a period of more than 40 years.

The court found for the plaintiffs upon all points and found that taxes had been paid by them and their predecessors in interest for a continuous period of more than 5 years, to wit, for the years 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, 1910, and 1911. During these years the evidence shows that on the tax receipts and tax roll the land here in controversy was described as the west 3 acres of lot 1, but an examination of the block books or record maps of the assessor shows that the property was described as "3 acres more or less." The assessment during those years covering property of Greve did not necessarily include property west of the fence line between the two landowners. The Greve property was assessed as 16.22 acres, and there is no contention that the 42.1-foot strip is necessary to complete this acreage.

[1] We therefore conclude that there was ample evidence to justify the trial court in finding the payment by plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest of all the taxes levied or assessed against the said property for the 5-year period mentioned. This finding of the court completed the elements required by the law to establish a title by adverse possession as of that date, even though not founded upon an instrument. As against Greve, the predecessor of defendant Fernandez, the title became a perfect one at that time in the predecessors of plaintiffs. The defendant Fernandez claims only under his predecessor, Greve.

[2] It is perhaps worth noting that plaintiffs might more properly have brought a suit or suits of a different character and obtained the same or equivalent relief—for example, a suit to compel a proper conveyance or a suit to establish by parol testimony an agreed boundary line where the true boundary was uncertain. But we are of the opinion that the evidence justifies the findings made and the judgment rendered thereon by the court below. This being true, there is no need for a reversal of the judgment in order that a more appropriate remedy be sought. We feel the more positive of this position, in view of the fact that the evidence shows without contradiction the claim of defendant Fernandez to be without a semblance of merit in it. These views render it unnecessary to consider the effect of the quitclaim deed from the successors in interest of Greve to plaintiffs intended to nullify the quitclaim deed to defendant Fernandez.

Judgment affirmed.

GRIFFIN v. BOYLE, Auditor.

JACKSON et al. v. BADARACCO et al.

(S. F. 12675, 12677.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 12, 1927.

Municipal corporations — 176(1)—Charter provision, if giving board of election commissioners control of salaries of its employees, held repealed by later provision (Charter of city and county of San Francisco, art. 11, c. 1, § 4; art. 3, c. 1, § 3).

Charter of city and county of San Francisco, art. 11, c. 1, § 4, if giving the board of election commissioners exclusive and absolute control of the fixing of the salaries of its employees, held expressly repealed by charter article 3, c. 1, § 3, declaring that the board of supervisors shall make a budget itemizing the salaries of employees of each department or board, and repealing conflicting provisions.

Preston, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by W. W. Griffin for a writ of mandate to compel Thomas F. Boyle, as Auditor, etc., and others, to appropriate for the conduct of the department of elections the respective amounts itemized and set forth in its budget estimate, and to adopt and levy a tax rate sufficient to provide for the amounts set forth therein, with a similar application by J. W. Jackson and others, as the Board of Election Commissioners, etc., against J. B. Badaracco and others, as the Board of Supervisors, etc. Writs denied.

In Case S. F. 12675:

Cameron King, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Frank L. Fenton, of San Francisco, for respondents.

In Case S. F. 12677:

Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. [1] The above causes have been consolidated in the argument presented therein to this court, and as they present the same legal problem they will be determined together.

In each a writ of mandate is sought to compel the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to appropriate for the conduct of the department of elections the respective amounts itemized and set forth in its budget estimate, and to adopt and levy a tax rate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, sufficient to provide for the amount set forth therein.

A similar question was presented to this court and decided adversely to petitioners in the case of Fitzgerald et al. v. Badaracco et al. (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 937. The decision of that case would be conclusive here, unquestionably, except for the fact that an additional consideration enters into the present situation by reason of a special provision of article 11, c. 1, § 4, of the Charter of the city and county of San Francisco, relating to the power of the board of election commissioners to fix the salaries, etc., of its employees, and which special provision is found in this language:

"The provisions of this section shall have full force and effect, all other sections of the charter notwithstanding."

If we were to give to the language just quoted the force and effect contended for by petitioners, and hold that it insures to said board of election commissioners the specific right to exclusively control the employment and fix the salaries of its employees, because it prevails over the general right of the supervisors to estimate the amounts to be allowed to the election department, we should also be bound to hold that, so construed, it is in conflict with a later amendment (section 3, c. 1, art. 3, as amended November 4, 1924, approved by Legislature January 17, 1925 [St. 1925, p. 1172]) to said charter, and being thus in conflict is expressly repealed thereby.

The last-cited section reads as follows:

"The supervisors shall meet annually between the first Monday of May and the first Monday of June, and by a vote of the majority of all the members thereof make a budget of the amounts estimated to be required to pay the expenses of conducting the public business of the city and county for the next ensuing fiscal year * * * and the items thereof allowed to each department, office, board or commission, as the supervisors shall deem advisable; provided, however, that the salaries, wages or rates of compensation of the various deputies, clerks, assistants or employees of every kind and classification of each department, office, board or commission, except the police, fire, park, playgrounds, public library and school departments, shall be itemized in said budget; and provided, further, that any and all amounts so set apart, itemized and allowed in any department, office, board or commission, as wages, salary or compensation, as aforesaid, shall be expended for such purpose only, and, if not so expended, shall at the end of each and every month, revert to a special fund which may be reapportioned for the same purposes as those originally set out in the budget ordinance.

"Before finally determining upon the budget, the supervisors shall fix such sufficient time or times as may be necessary to allow the taxpayers to be heard in regard thereto, and the supervisors shall attend at the time or times so appointed for such hearing. All provisions of the charter in conflict with this section are hereby repealed."

It is apparent that if section 4, c. 1, art. 11, be construed as giving exclusive and absolute control to the board of election commissioners of the matter of fixing the salaries of its employees, it would be in direct conflict with the result sought to be effected by section 3, c. 1, art. 3, which is a later provision and expressly repeals conflicting provisions.

It follows that the writs sought must be denied, and it is so ordered.

ESBERG et al. v. BADARACCO et al.
(S. F. 12678.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 12, 1927.

1. Schools and school districts ⇨20—School system is matter of state supervision, and statutes respecting it are controlling over city charters (Const. art. 9, §§ 1, 5, 6).

School system of state is a matter of state supervision, rather than a "municipal affair" as that term is used in connection with charter cities, and statutes respecting it are controlling over conflicting provisions of city charters, under Const. art. 9, § 1, requiring Legislature to encourage intellectual improvement; section 5, requiring Legislature to provide system of common schools; and section 6, requiring Legislature to provide for city and county tax for school purposes.

2. Schools and school districts ⇨20—City charters may provide for matters concerning schools not enumerated in general laws, and matters specifically authorized by constitution (Const. art. 11, § 8½).

While statutes providing general system for creation and conduct of common schools prevail over conflicting provisions of city charters, the charters may provide for matters not enumerated in the statutes and not in conflict therewith, including matters in furtherance of their purpose, and also for matters specifically authorized by constitutional provisions, as, for example, Const. art. 11, § 8½.

3. Schools and school districts ⇨20—Powers of city are derived from charter, but powers of school district from Political Code, though two bodies embrace same territory (Pol. Code, § 1576).

City and school districts derive their powers from different sources, even though they comprise same territory, under Pol. Code, § 1576; city deriving its powers from its charter, whereas school district derives its powers from Political Code.

4. Schools and school districts ⇨21—School district embracing city and county held distinct corporate entity, notwithstanding consolidation of city and county (Pol. Code, § 1576).

School district established in territory embraced by city and county of San Francisco held distinct corporate entity, under Pol. Code, § 1576, not extinguished by consolidation of city and county.

5. Evidence ⇨25(2)—Court takes judicial notice that only consolidated city and county in California is city and county of San Francisco.

It is a matter of judicial knowledge that there is but one consolidated city and county in the state of California, which is the city and county of San Francisco.

6. Schools and school districts ⇨99—Power of board of education to determine amount of money to be raised for school purposes under general statute held controlling over power of city and county board of supervisors under charter (Const. art. 9, § 6; Pol. Code, § 1612a, as added by St. 1921, p. 720).

Power of board of education to determine the amount of money to be raised for school purposes, under Pol. Code, § 1612a, as added by St. 1921, p. 720, requiring board to make budget showing all purposes for which school district will need money and the amount thereof, and the board of supervisors of each city and county to levy such rate as will produce the money requested by the district, which was enacted under Const. art. 9, § 6, held controlling over the power of the city and county board of supervisors to determine the amount to be raised under charter provisions approved by St. 1925, p. 1172, in view of Pol. Code, § 1838, St. 1856, p. 155, and St. 1921, p. 1795.

7. Constitutional law ⇨70(3)—What power should be conferred on boards of education to raise money by current taxation is exclusively for Legislature so long as tax limit is not exceeded.

Matter of conferring on boards of education powers to raise money by current taxation is one of legislative policy with which courts may not interfere so long as the limitation on taxation for school purposes is not exceeded.

8. Statutes ⇨64(8)—Provision in statute relating to taxation for schools, authorizing county auditor to levy tax if board of supervisors do not, if unconstitutional, held severable (Const. art. 11, § 13; Pol. Code, § 1612a, as added by St. 1921, p. 720).

If that provision of Pol. Code, § 1612a, as added by St. 1921, p. 720, relating to taxation for school purposes, which authorizes county auditor to levy tax if board of supervisors refuse or neglect to do so, is invalid under Const. art. 11, § 13, forbidding Legislature to delegate to any special commission or others, power to levy taxes, the provision is severable.

9. Schools and school districts ⇨99—Statute authorizing boards of education to fix sums to be raised for schools by taxation held constitutional (Const. art. 9, § 6; Pol. Code, § 1612a, as added by St. 1921, p. 720).

Pol. Code, § 1612a, as added by St. 1921, p. 720, authorizing boards of education to fix sums to be raised for school purposes by taxation, and requiring boards of supervisors to levy the tax required to provide such sum, is not unconstitutional as to powers conferred on boards of education, under Const. art. 9, § 6, directing Legislature to provide for levy of tax by board of supervisors.

10. Evidence 83(2)—Court will not assume that board of education will impose unjust amount of taxes.

It is not to be assumed that board of education, in determining amount of money to be raised by taxation, will act without regard to rights of taxpayers so as to unduly extend taxation.

Original application by Alfred I. Esberg and others, constituting the Board of Education of the city and county of San Francisco, for a writ of mandate to compel John B. Badaracco and others, as members of and constituting the Board of Supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, to include in its proposed tax ordinance such levy of taxes for school purposes as would produce a certain sum, exclusive of amounts required for redemption of school bonds or interest thereon. Writ granted.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondents City and County of San Francisco.

H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, for Adolph Uhl.

SHENK, J. [1] This is an original application for a writ of mandate by the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco to compel the respondents, as members of and constituting the board of supervisors of said city and county, to include in its proposed tax ordinance for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, such levy of taxes for school purposes as will produce the sum of $7,621,529, exclusive of amounts required for redemption of school bonds or interest thereon.

There is no dispute as to the facts. Within the time prescribed by law the board of education prepared its budget setting forth the amounts required for the ensuing fiscal year for public instruction in the city and county of San Francisco, including therein the needs for high schools, elementary schools and kindergartens. This budget was prepared on forms prescribed by the board of supervisors and specified the proposed expenditures under the headings (1) Teachers' Salaries, (2) Other Maintenance Expenditures and (3) Capital Outlays and Permanent Improvements. The superintendent of schools approved this budget, and by computation determined therefrom the total amount of money required to be produced by a school tax after deducting the estimated income from the state of California and all other sources. A copy of the budget so proposed and approved was filed with the board of supervisors and with the auditor, as the law requires. From this budget it appears that the board of education has determined that the sum of $7,621,529 is necessary for school purposes for the ensuing school year. The assessed valuation of all of the taxable property in the city and county for the said fiscal year is $783,000,000, and a tax levy of $.97338 on each $100 valuation of said taxable property is necessary in order to produce the sum required by the board of education. During the months of May and June, 1927, the board of supervisors from time to time considered the budget of the board of education. After examination and consideration of the same, it deducted from the budget the sum of $987,306 and fixed a tax rate for school purposes of $.84729, which would produce approximately the amount allowed by the board of supervisors. The items included in the school budget and disallowed or refused by the board of supervisors were $87,306 on account of salaries, maintenance, and operation, and $900,000 on account of lands, buildings, and repairs. Following the refusal of the board of supervisors to fix a tax rate sufficient to raise the amount required by the board of education, this proceeding was commenced.

The sole question for determination is whether the board of supervisors has discretion to revise, change, or modify the budget as so prepared and presented by the board of education and fix the tax rate for school purposes accordingly; or must the board of supervisors fix such a tax rate as will raise the amount of money specified in the budget of the board of education without diminution? It is the contention of the board of supervisors that a discretion is lodged in that body to fix a budget allowance for the board of education within which the latter board must confine itself in making its expenditures for the ensuing school year. The claim is based principally on section 3 of chapter 1 of article 3 of the charter of the city and county, as amended in 1925. Stats. 1925, p. 1172. That section provides that the supervisors shall meet annually between the first Monday of May and the first Monday of June and "make a budget of the amounts estimated to be required to pay the expenses of conducting the business of the city and county for the next ensuing fiscal year." This budget must be prepared in such detail as to the aggregate sum and the items thereof allowed each department as the supervisors deem advisable, except that in departments other than the police, fire, park, playground, public library, and school departments the salaries, wages, and rates of compensation of deputies, clerks, assistants, and employees of all kinds and classifications shall be itemized in the budget and shall be expended for the purpose for which the same was set apart, and none other. This section of the charter as amended in 1925 expressly repealed all provisions of the charter in conflict therewith.

We had occasion to consider and define the scope of the budget making power of the board of supervisors under this charter amendment and prior thereto in the recent cases of Fitzgerald v. Badaracco, 258 P. 937, Griffin v. Boyle, S. F. No. 12675, and Jackson v. Badaracco, S. F. No. 12677, 259 P. 729, wherein it was held that the board of public works and the board of election commissioners of said city and county were, as to the expenditures to be made in their several departments, limited to the amounts appropriated by the board of supervisors in the exercise of its budget-making power. The respondents rely especially on the Fitzgerald Case as announcing a construction of the charter provisions which should be made applicable to the school department. In that case and in the other recent cases referred to we were dealing with subordinate boards of the city and county concerning which it was entirely competent to provide in the charter for whatever powers, duties, restrictions, and regulations the people of the city and county might desire to prescribe in adopting or amending said charter pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution. In those cases the boards are those whose activities, from a governmental standpoint, are primarily, if not wholly, of local concern and subject to charter regulation. But with the school department we are confronted by different and controlling considerations of law. The school system of the state is a matter of general concern as distinguished from a "municipal affair," as that term is considered in connection with charter cities. Article 9 of the organic law of California provides for the establishment of a public school system. It is provided in section 1 of that article:

"A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, the Legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement."

Section 5 of the same article provides that:

"The Legislature shall provide for a system of common schools. * * *

Section 6 of the article provides that the Legislature "shall provide for" the levy of a "city and county" tax by the board of supervisors for school purposes. By this article of the Constitution the people of the state have made the school system a matter of state supervision, and judicial declarations to the same effect are numerous. Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 P. 558; Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 561, 74 P. 44; Los Angeles School District v. Longden, 148 Cal. 380, 383, 83 P. 246; Board of Education v. Davidson, 190 Cal. 162, 210 P. 961.

[2] The effect of this framework of laws surrounding and supporting our public school system is that the acts of the Legislature, within constitutional bounds, are controlling over conflicting provisions of freeholders' charters.

"While statutes providing a general system of laws concerning the creation and conduct of common schools prevail over conflicting charter provisions, the charters may provide for matters not enumerated in the general laws and not in conflict therewith, including matters in furtherance of the purpose of the general laws of the State." 18 Cal. Jur. 814, and cases cited.

Likewise the charter may, of course, include such matters concerning school management and supervision as are specifically authorized in the Constitution. For example, section 8½ of article 11, as adopted in 1896, provided:

"It shall be competent, in all charters framed under the authority given by section eight" of article eleven of this Constitution, "to provide, in addition to those provisions allowable by this Constitution and by the laws of the state as follows: * * * 2. For the manner in which, the times at which, and the terms for which the members of the boards of education shall be elected or appointed, * * * and for the number which shall constitute any one of such boards."

This constitutional provision has remained by continuing amendment to the present time with the enlargement in 1911 in the respect that since that amendment the charter may also provide for the "qualifications, compensation, and removal" of members of boards of education. The city and county of San Francisco has availed itself of this constitutional authorization and has, in article 7 of its charter, provided for such matters concerning its board of education as it is competent therein to provide. In recognition of the effect of general state laws over school matters within the city and county, the charter in chapter 3 of article 7 provides:

"In addition to the powers conferred by the general laws of the state, the board of education shall have power. * * *

Then follow numerous powers conferred on the board which it is assumed are not directly conferred by general law.

[3] Since the adoption of the Political Code it has been provided in section 1576 thereof that each city in the state shall constitute a separate school district and shall be governed by its board of education or board of trustees. The school district and the city may comprise the same territory, but each derives its powers from a different source, "the powers of the city being derived from its charter, the powers of the school district being derived from the provisions of the Political Code." Los Angeles School District v. Longden, supra, page 383.

[4] The fact that the city of San Francisco has also the characteristics of a county, would not, we think, extinguish the school district established therein as a corporate entity long before the adoption of the freeholders' charter. It cannot be doubted that the present board of education is the successor of the board of education established under acts of the Legislature as far back as 1856. Stats. 1856, pp. 154, 155. That act consolidated the city and the county of San Francisco. In article 3, § 33 thereof, under the head of "Public Instruction," the board of education was given power "to determine annually the amount, not exceeding the rate of thirty-five cents on each one hundred dollars' valuation upon the assessment roll, to be raised by tax upon the real and personal property within the city and county not exempt from taxation, for the support of free common schools therein, and for providing suitable school houses, furniture, libraries and apparatus." It was therefore determined by the Legislature at the early date of 1856 that the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco should exercise the power to determine the amount needed for school purposes. Whether that power was conclusive under the consolidation act need not now be determined, for the reason that the Legislature, by recent enactment, has provided that such determination shall be conclusive. An examination of legislation applicable to boards of education in charter cities, including the school department of the city and county of San Francisco, convinces us that the board of education of said city and county is the governing board of the school department, and responsible to the people of the city and county through the manner of the appointment of the members thereof by the mayor and confirmation by the electors. It may also be noted that in chapter 1 of article 3 of the charter as amended in 1921, the board of education is referred to as the "school directors." Stats. 1921, p. 1795. The amendment of section 6 of article 9 of the Constitution in 1920 makes it especially clear that the territory comprised within the city and county of San Francisco is, for school purposes, a school purpose authorized by the legislature."

"The legislature shall provide for the levying of school district taxes by the board of supervisors of each * * * city and county, for the support of public elementary schools, secondary schools, technical schools, and kindergarten schools, or for any other public school purpose authorized by the legislature."

[5] Judicial notice is taken of the fact that there is but one city and county in the state of California, viz., the city and county of San Francisco. The constitutional amendment of 1920 therefore applies directly to the city and county of San Francisco and provides therein for the levy of a "school district tax."

[6] Since it is clear that in the conduct of its school affairs the city and county of San Francisco is subject to and is controlled by general law and in all matters of conflict the general law must prevail, it will next be noted what conflict exists between the general laws of the state and the charter provisions respecting the determination of the amount of the expenditures to be made for school purposes. In obedience to the mandate of section 6 of article 9 of the Constitution, as amended in 1920, the Legislature enacted section 1612a of the Political Code in 1921. Stats. 1921, p. 720. In that section it is provided that each board of education shall have the power and it shall be its duty annually in the month of June "to make a school budget showing all the purposes for which the school district will need money and the amount of money that will be needed for each of said purposes for the next ensuing school year." It is then provided that this budget be filed with the superintendent of schools of the city and county, be examined and approved by him, and after such approval it is made the duty of the superintendent of schools to determine by computation the total amount shown by the budget to be necessary for school purposes for the ensuing year after deducting income from all other sources. The approval of the budget by the superintendent of schools is not made a prerequisite to the submission of the budget to the board of supervisors. The section then provides as follows:

"The board of supervisors of each * * * city and county, must annually at the time and in the manner of levying * * * city and county taxes levy and cause to be collected a district tax for each school district whose budget shows a district tax to be necessary, and to fix such a rate for such district tax as will produce at least the amount of district tax money requested by the particular district. If the board of supervisors refuse or neglect to make the levy provided for under this section then the levy shall be made by the county auditor."

The act adding said section 1612a to the Political Code in 1921 expressly repealed all acts and parts of acts "not in harmony" with the new section.

The italicized portions of the foregoing quotations from said section 1612a make plain the obvious conflict between the powers lodged in the board of education to determine the amount of money to be raised for school purposes and the power conferred on the board of supervisors under the provisions of the charter. The powers of the two boards cannot be exercised over the same subject-matter at the same time. The law abhors such a conflict of authority, and since the general law is paramount the functions of the board of supervisors in the premises must yield to the authority of the state exercised through the Constitution and enactments of the Legislature.

[7] On oral argument, counsel for respondents conceded the plain mandatory force of the language of said section 1612a, but urged that it could not have been intended that this legislative requirement should apply to such communities as San Francisco and Los Angeles, where the assessed valuations are of such magnitude as to make it possible for the board of education to specify so large an amount of money to be raised in current taxes as to enable the board to embark on an enterprise of capital construction and extension of school facilities only justifiable under a bond issue. But the statute has made no exception of populous and prosperous communities, and we can make none. Furthermore, it is a matter of common knowledge that in populous centers the need for additional school facilities is a constantly pressing one. The law prescribes a tax limit for school purposes. So long as that limit is not exceeded—and it is not claimed that it is exceeded in this case—the matter of conferring such powers on boards of education is one of legislative policy with which the court may not interfere. It is readily conceivable that some expenditures on capital account may be necessary each year. Additions to existing structures, reconstruction, repairs, and new schoolhouses are essential aids in the promotion of education, and are incidental to the proper maintenance of the school system.

[8] It may well be questioned whether the provision in said section 1612a, of the Political Code, authorizing the county auditor to levy the required tax in the event the board of supervisors refuses or neglects to make the levy, is constitutional under the provisions of section 13 of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides that the Legislature shall not delegate to "any special commission, private corporation, company, association or individual" any power to levy taxes. Assuming said provision of the Code section to be invalid, it is clearly severable from the remainder of the section.

[9] The inclusion of that provision, however, serves to accentuate the plain intention of the Legislature to make the board of supervisors merely the instrumentality through which the tax levy for school purposes is to be accomplished. The board of education as the "school directors," under the charter, does not answer to the description of a "special commission, private corporation, company, association or individual," as those terms are used in the constitutional provision. On the contrary, the board of education is the duly constituted governing board of the public school system of the city and county of San Francisco, established as such under the Constitution and laws of the state. It may here be noted that it would have been entirely consistent with our system of government if the power were conferred by the Constitution on the Legislature to vest authority to levy school taxes directly in the board of education. Separate machinery could then be set up for the levy and collection of the same. However, the simpler and more inexpensive method has been followed, namely, of vesting the Legislature with power to "provide for" the levy and collection of school taxes by the board of supervisors of the city and county. Const. § 6, art. 9. When this method of raising the tax is prescribed, the responsibility for the amount to be raised for school purposes is with the board of education.

Counsel appearing for amicus curiæ urges that, since the Constitution provides that the Legislature "shall provide for" the levy "by the board of supervisors," the power to levy the tax carries with it the exclusive discretion to determine the amount of the tax. This is a non sequitur. When the Legislature has authorized the board of education, the duly constituted governing board of the school department, to fix the amount to be raised and has required the board of supervisors to levy the tax to provide the sum required, the Legislature has "provided for" the levy of the tax. We find no constitutional inhibition against the conferring of such powers on the board of education, although the full exercise of the power of taxation may necessitate the joint action of both boards—the determination of the amount by one board, and the levy of the tax by the other.

Counsel for respondents and for amicus curiæ rely on McCabe v. Carpenter, 102 Cal. 469, 36 P. 836, as direct authority against the petitioners. But such is not the fact. That case involved the validity of the act of March 20, 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 182), which provided for the levy of the school tax "estimated by the county superintendent of schools," and it was made the duty of the "proper authorities," upon receiving the estimate, "to levy such a rate as will produce the amount estimated." Section 4. It was held that this was an unlawful delegation of legislative authority to an executive officer. That was all that was involved in that case. It was there said, however:

"Looking to the provisions in the general school law, in regard to the discretion of county superintendents, and trustees of school districts, we find they have a wide range of discretion in regard to expenditures. The trustees have, however, no voice in making this estimate; they are not even required to furnish any data for it."

Following the McCabe Case, a similar question was presented in People v. Lodi High School District, 124 Cal. 694, 57 P. 660. In that case the provisions of section 1670 of the Political Code, as amended in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 293), were under review, where it was provided that the high school board, among other things, should furnish to the board of supervisors an estimate of the cost of the construction of buildings and conducting the school for the school year. Subdivision 15 of the section provided that when the estimate had been submitted it should be the duty of the tax levying body to levy a tax "sufficient in amount to maintain the high school." It was contended that the decision in the McCabe Case rendered this provision unconstitutional, but it was very properly held that, when the duty of the board of supervisors was to levy a tax "sufficient to maintain the high school," a discretion was vested in the board of supervisors to determine the sufficiency of the amount, and that the estimate of the school board was advisory only.

The case of Board of Education of City of Woodland v. Board of Trustees, 129 Cal. 599, 62 P. 173, is also relied on by the respondents. It was there held that the board of education of a city organized under the general municipal corporations act must be regarded, not as an independent public entity, but as a component part of the municipality wherein the legislative power is vested in another body. The court was at pains in that case to point out that the decision was to be restricted to a determination of the status of the school departments in cities organized under general law, and not to the status of school departments governed under the provisions of the Political Code. Further, that under the Code system the city territory, with its inhabitants, constitutes a school district, a corporate body, or quasi municipality, distinct from the municipality itself.

Counsel for respondents concedes that the cases relied upon by him arose before the amendment to the Constitution in 1920 and the enactment of section 1612a of the Political Code in 1921, but contends that the principles enunciated in the old cases are applicable to the present situation. We deem the recent legislation, both constitutional and statutory, of controlling importance, and are satisfied that such recent legislation is applicable to the school department of the city and county of San Francisco. Other cases cited and other points made by the respondents and by counsel for amicus curiæ have been noted, but it is deemed unnecessary to discuss them. The cases cited are either distinguishable on the facts or arose before the recent pertinent legislation, and we find nothing in the additional points made which would warrant a different conclusion herein. That the Legislature fully intended to invest the board of education of municipalities with the full power to determine the amount of money to be required for the needs of the public schools is further made manifest by the action of the Legislature in its recent amendment to section 1838 of the Political Code changing the word "may" to "must" in defining the duty of the board of supervisors in the matter of the adoption of the estimates of the board of education as to the amount of money required for the purchase of school lots or the building, purchasing or making alterations, additions, or repairs of school buildings. This section was evidently amended to make its provisions conform with the provisions of section 1612a of the Political Code.

[10] The recent constitutional and statutory provisions referred to were undoubtedly adopted on the theory that boards of education, being constantly in touch with school matters, are more conversant with the needs of the school departments and are in better position to judge of the required expenditures for school purposes. Whether placing the responsibility of determining the amount to be raised for school purposes directly on the shoulders of the boards of education and not on the boards of supervisors be the wiser policy may present a subject of legitimate controversy, but with that policy the courts have nothing to do except to see that constitutional bounds are not transcended. It is to be assumed that the boards of education will exercise proper regard for the rights of the taxpayers to the end that the burden of taxation be not unduly extended. The responsibility for fixing the amount to be raised by taxation for school purposes is with those boards, and for such responsibility the members thereof, it is assumed, may be held accountable to the electorate as provided by law.

Let the peremptory writ issue as prayed.

BROWN v. AGUILAR. (S. F. 11647.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1927.

1. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Court's findings for plaintiff suing on building contract, supported by evidence, held conclusive on appeal.

In action for balance due on contract for construction of a garage, court's findings in favor of plaintiff on questions of delay in completion, improper encroachment, and other variations from drawings and written specifications, supported by evidence, held conclusive on appeal.

2. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Court's finding of "substantial performance" of building contract, supported by evidence, held conclusive on appeal.

In action for balance due on contract for construction of a garage, court's findings that contractor furnished necessary labor and materials and constructed garage and fully performed all terms and conditions, and that slight changes in specifications were made by defendant, supported by evidence, held conclusive on appeal and to entitle plaintiff to recover at least on ground of "substantial performance," which means performance in good faith on all substantive terms of contract without willful departure therefrom and without omission of any of essential parts.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Substantial Performance.]

3. Pleading ⚡238(1)—Application to amend pleading may be denied, unless showing justification of exercise of discretion to grant it.

Application for leave to amend pleading is addressed to court's sound discretion, and may be denied where no showing is made to justify exercise of such discretionary power.

4. Pleading ⚡236(6)—Denial of fourth amendment to change admission in answer that certain person was defendant's architect and agent to draw plans for and supervise erection of garage held not abuse of discretion.

In action on building contract, refusal to permit fourth amendment to answer, changing admission therein that certain person was architect and agent employed by defendant to draw plans for and supervise erection of garage, was not abuse of discretion, in view of fact that same question had been previously presented on demurrer.

5. Pleading ⚡36(3)—Defendant, sued on building contract, held bound by admission in answer that certain person was her architect to draw plans for and supervise building.

Defendant, sued on building contract, was bound by admission in answer that certain person was her architect and agent to draw plans for and supervise erection of building.

6. Contracts ⚡346(7)—Excluding evidence that architect's certificates were result of gross mistake amounting to fraud, not alleged in pleadings, held not error.

In action on building contract, where there was no allegation of fraud or gross mistake in pleadings, exclusion of defendant's evidence that architect's certificates were issued without authority and by gross mistake amounting to fraud was proper.

7. Fraud ⚡41—Where actual or constructive fraud constitutes element of action or defense of affirmative nature, facts must be alleged.

Where fraud, either actual or constructive, constitutes element of action or defense which is of affirmative nature, facts must be alleged.

8. Contracts ⚡287(2)—Building contract held to authorize architect's issuance and delivery of certificates to contractor and to make them conclusive.

Under building contract requiring work to be done in conformity with plans, drawings, and specifications made by owner's architect, and providing that, when payment or installment was due and at final completion of work architect should give certificates in writing and that dealings between owner and contractor were to be transacted through offices of architect, whose decision as to interpretation of drawings or specifications was to be final and conclusive, architect was authorized to issue certificates which were conclusive on property owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by E. J. Brown against Minnie C. Aguilar on a contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dahlin & Jackson and Walter A. Dold, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. By the complaint in this action it is alleged that on June 29, 1922, plaintiff's assignor, a contractor, entered into a written agreement with defendant whereby said contractor agreed to furnish the necessary labor and materials required for the construction of a one-story brick and concrete garage in San Francisco, and said defendant agreed to pay to the contractor therefor the sum of $3,000; that said contractor furnished the necessary labor and materials and constructed said garage and fully performed all of the terms and conditions of said agreement on his part to be performed, "except such, if any, as were waived or changed by defendant; and that one Frank S. Holland, who was the architect and agent employed by defendant to draw plans for and supervise the construction of said garage, after the completion of said garage issued as such architect his certificate stating that the final payment was due under said agreement, and during the progress of said construction issued his certificate for the two progressive payments as provided in said agreement"; that defendant entered into possession of the garage and paid on account of said $3,000 the sum of $1,000, leaving a balance of $2,000 due, owing, and unpaid; that said contractor duly assigned said agreement and all rights thereunder to this plaintiff, wherefore plaintiff prayed judgment against said defendant in amount of $2,000.

Defendant filed an answer, counterclaim and cross-complaint, also first, second, and third amended answers. The articles of agreement signed by defendant and said contractor are set forth in full in paragraph I of the third amended answer. It is further alleged therein that said garage was not constructed in accordance with the terms, plans, or specifications of said agreement; that inferior and unsuitable materials were used; that the garage building was negligently and carelessly erected partly upon land of the next adjacent property owner, necessitating reconstruction or removal by defendant; that defendant, by reason of failure of said contractor to complete said building within the stipulated time, lost $450 in prospective rentals, covering a period of eighteen months.

Said pleading "admits that one Frank S. Holland, who was the architect and agent employed by defendant to draw plans for and supervise the erection of said garage, issued his certificate stating that the final payment was due under said agreement, and during the progress of said construction issued his certificates for two progressive payments as provided in said agreement," but it is alleged that said certificates were issued by said architect improperly and in error.

The court found for plaintiff on all points. It found that the garage was properly constructed, without encroaching upon the adjacent owner's property; that proper materials were used; that the delay in completion was excusable, being due to inclement weather and to obstructive action of labor organizations; that there was no evidence showing loss of prospective rentals; that said architect during the progress of said construction properly issued his certificate for the two progressive payments as provided in said agreement, and properly issued his certificate stating final payment was due; and that such slight changes as were made in the specifications were made by defendant, through said architect. Judgment was accordingly rendered for plaintiff in amount of $2,236.88.

[1] The first question is: Did the contractor fully perform, or at least substantially perform, said contract, so as to enable respondent to recover under the doctrine of substantial performance? Appellant sets forth much testimony in an effort to show delay in completion, improper encroachment, and many other variations from the drawings and written specifications. These are all questions of fact upon which we are bound by the findings of the trial court when supported by proper evidence. In other words, it is unnecessary for us to review the testimony at length herein. It is sufficient to state that there is evidence in abundance to support the findings, and each of them, and they are therefore conclusive upon appeal as to these matters.

[2] Furthermore, it would seem that there was indeed such a performance by the contractor of his obligations under the contract as would entitle respondent to recover under the doctrine of substantial performance. This doctrine is well stated in the following quotation from Connell v. Higgins, 170 Cal. 541, 556, 150 P. 769, 774, in which case a similar situation was involved:

"The criticism is that the jury were not informed what was meant by the term 'substantial performance,' and that they were therefore left to infer, if they chose, that, if the plant, as constructed, would do the work which the owner desired it to do, the plaintiff could recover as for completion, although it might, in many particulars, vary from the plans and specifications, or lack completion as the plans and specifications required. The defendant did not offer any instruction on this subject, as he might well have done. The definition of substantial performance is difficult to give in general terms. It is usually a question to be determined in each case with reference to the existing facts and circumstances. In 2 Elliott on Contracts, § 1607, it is defined as follows (page 912):

"Substantial performance means that there has been no willful departure from the terms of the contract, and no omission of any of its essential parts, and that the contractor has in good faith performed all of its substantive terms. If so, he will not be held to have forfeited his right to a recovery by reason of trivial defects or imperfections in the work performed. If the omission is so slight that it cannot be regarded as an integral or substantive part of the original contract, and the other party can be compensated therefor by a recoupment for damages, the contractor does not lose his right of action; and this rule is peculiarly applicable in a case where the other party has received the benefit of what has been done, and is enjoying the fruits of the work. It is the sound and settled rule that the right of a party to enforce a contract will not be forfeited or lost by reason of technical inadvertence, or unimportant omissions or defects. A substantial performance must be established, in order to entitle the party claiming the benefit of the contract to recover; but this does not mean a literal compliance as to the details that are unimportant. There must be no willful or intentional departure, and the defects of performance must not pervade the whole or be so essential as substantially to defeat the object which the parties intend to accomplish. Whether, in any case, such defects or omissions are substantial, or merely unimportant mistakes that have been or may be corrected, is generally a question of fact.' This we believe to be a correct statement of the law on the subject."

As above stated, this being a question of fact, and the court having found that said contractor furnished the necessary labor and materials and constructed said garage and fully performed all the terms and conditions of said agreement on his part to be performed, and having further found that the slight changes in the specifications were made by defendant, through her architect, and there being proper evidence to support such findings, they are conclusive upon appeal, and entitle respondent to recover on the ground of substantial if not complete performance.

Appellant's chief complaint, however, centers around the issuance of the above-mentioned certificates by the architect accepting said construction work as satisfactory under the agreement. If the architect did in fact have power to authorize the various changes in the specifications and in the character and selection of materials and labor and to extend the time within which the building was to be completed, and if the said certificates were properly issued by him, then indeed is every claim of appellant defeated.

Appellant contends that the court abused its discretion in refusing to allow her to file a fourth amendment to her answer changing the admission therein that Frank S. Holland was the architect and agent employed by her to draw plans for and supervise the erection of the garage. In refusing leave to amend a fourth time, it was recalled that the same question in a way had been previously presented on demurrer, that three subsequent amendments to the answer had been permitted, and the court also said:

"* * * I am all the more averse to allowing you to amend, first, on the broad, general proposition that, when counsel's attention was called to the faulty allegation, it was discussed plainly and clearly and at length, and he was given leave to amend, and did amend with the express view to clarifying the pleadings in that one regard, and if, after having done so, the pleading does not plead just what he sought to have it express, unless there is some overwhelmingly strong equitable consideration involved, he should be forced to stand on it. All the more is that so, where, as here, it is essentially a technical point. In other words, if this work was done as it ought to have been done under that contract, and if that work has not been paid for, then this plaintiff should recover, and no technical defense will be permitted to stand in his way, except in so far as the law is supposed to accept such defenses. I recognize the pleading, as does plaintiff's counsel, as being practically a statement or admission, whatever its form may be, that the architect mentioned was at all times the architect and agent, so to speak, of the defendant."

[3] An application for leave to amend is addressed to the sound discretion of the court and such application may be denied where no showing is made to justify the exercise of the court's discretionary power. 21 Cal. Jur. § 126, pp. 181, 182. The rule is stated in 31 Cyc. 422, as follows:

"As a general rule a party will not be allowed to file an amendment contradicting an admission made in his original pleadings. If it be proper in any case, it must be upon very satisfactory evidence that the party has been deceived or misled, or that his pleading was put in under a clear mistake as to the facts."

See, also, Bank of Woodland v. Heron, 122 Cal. 107, 110, 54 P. 537, and cases there cited.

[4, 5] We hold that here there was no abuse of discretion by the court, but that, on the contrary, he acted wisely in denying the application. Appellant is therefore bound by said admission of fact in her third amended answer. "While a pleader is not bound by allegations of evidence or conclusions of law, he is concluded by material averments of his pleading, and may not, as a rule, prove facts contrary thereto. * * * A pleader is likewise concluded by admissions in his pleading, unless they are withdrawn by amendment." 21 Cal. Jur. § 5, p. 16. See, also, Howard v. Throckmorton, 48 Cal. 482, 490, Brusie v. Gates, 96 Cal. 265, 268, 31 P. 111, and People v. S. & C. R. Co., 49 Cal. 420.

[6, 7] Appellant next complains of the court's refusal to permit her to adduce evidence to prove that the architect's certificates were issued without authority and by gross mistake amounting to fraud. This contention is likewise without merit, as it is a well-known rule that the facts constituting an alleged fraud must be pleaded. Here there is no allegation whatsoever of fraud in the pleadings, or of gross mistake. As stated in 12 Cal. Jur. § 62, pp. 800, 802:

"Fraud is never presumed. Whenever fraud constitutes an element of action or defense which is of an affirmative nature the facts must be alleged. One against whom charges of fraud are made is entitled to specific averments of the acts of which he is accused, so that he may admit or deny them, and thus present real issues. This is the rule whether the fraud relied on is actual or constructive. It is not, therefore, sufficient to allege fraud in general terms; such allegations are merely of conclusions which the pleader is not permitted to draw and which present no issuable facts."

[8] The only question remaining is whether, under the contract and the authority granted thereby, said certificates were properly issued by said architect and are binding upon appellant and conclusive. In this regard, the written contract, which is pleaded in hæc verba by defendant in her third amended answer, contains the following provisions: That the work is to be done "in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications for the same made by Frank S. Holland the authorized architect employed by the owner, * * *" and that "the work is to be done and the materials furnished in accordance therewith under the direction and subject to the approval of said architect; * * *" again "that, when each payment or installment shall become due, and at the final completion of the work, certificates in writing shall be obtained from the said architect, stating that the payment or installment is due or work completed, as the case may be, and the amount then due, and the said architect shall at said times deliver said certificates under his hand to the contractor, or, in lieu of such certificates, shall deliver to the contractor in writing, under his hand, a just and true reason for not issuing the certificates, including a statement of the defects, if any, to be remedied, to entitle the contractor to the certificate or certificates. And in the event of failure of the architect to furnish and deliver said certificates, or any of them, or in lieu thereof the writing aforesaid, within three days after the times aforesaid, and after demand therefor made in writing by the contractor, the amount which may be claimed to be due by the contractor, and stated in the said demand made by him for the certificate, shall, at the expiration of said three days, become due and payable and the owner shall be liable and bound to pay the same on demand;" and, lastly, "should the owner or architect, at any time during the progress of the work, request any alterations or deviations in, additions to, or omissions from, this contract or the plans or specifications, either of them shall be at liberty to do so, and the same shall in no way affect or make void this contract, but the amount thereof shall be added to, or deducted from, the amount of the contract price aforesaid, as the case may be, by a fair and reasonable valuation. And this contract shall be held to be completed when the work is finished in accordance with the original plans, as amended by such changes whatever may be the nature or extent thereof. * * * Paragraph 4 of the general conditions in the specifications provided:

"All dealings between the owner and contractor to be transacted through the offices of the architect, whose decision as to the character and selection of any materials or labor furnished, or interpretation of the drawings and specifications to be final and conclusive to both the owner and contractor."

Mr. Holland, the architect, testified that, at the time he issued the final payment certificate and delivered it, the work had been completed to his satisfaction according to the plans and specifications, and that whatever changes were made in the garage building were made at his suggestion and with his approval. His testimony was corroborated by that of other witnesses.

It will be noted that, although the contract does not state in so many words that the certificates of the architect are to be final and conclusive, yet such is clearly the import of the above-quoted provisions. The rule is stated in 9 Corpus Juris, 722, as follows:

"The decision, estimate, or certificate of an architect, engineer, or superintendent, in approving or disapproving the work as a performance of a contract, or in passing on questions relating thereto, is, in the absence of fraud, bad faith, or mistake, conclusive and binding on the parties, where the contract either in express terms provides that it shall be final and conclusive or in plain language shows that it was the intention of the parties that the person to whom the question is submitted should be the final arbiter thereof. * * *"

The case of Moore v. Kerr, 65 Cal. 519, 4 P. 542, involved a building contract which provided merely that the work was to be done "under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent appointed by said board." The court said:

"The work was done to his satisfaction, and it was so found. It does not appear that there was any fraud or mistake on the part of Perrott. His judgment is therefore conclusive, and the defendants are not allowed to go behind it. Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 177 [72 Am. Dec. 442]; Wyckoff v. Meyers, 44 N. Y. 145; Stewart v. Keteltas, 36 N. Y. 388; Hudson v. McCartney, 33 Wis. 340."

In the case of Dingley v. Greene, 54 Cal. 333, it was held that, where the contract provided that payments should be made on the certificate of the architect, his certificate was conclusive of the rights of all parties concerned, unless it could be shown that it was obtained by the owner by collusion or fraud. See, to the same effect, Gray v. Cotton, 166 Cal. 130, 134 P. 1145.

In the case of Connell v. Higgins, supra, the facts were similar to those in the case at bar. Connell and Higgins executed a written contract for the construction of a building and installation of a power plant therein; said contract providing that "the work should be done according to the plans and specifications and to the satisfaction of 'A. L. Haley, Architect, Inc.,' and one Martin, an engineer." There as here, the questions of unreasonable delay in completion of the structure, conclusiveness of the architect's certificates, and lack of substantial performance were involved. The court charged the jury that if they should find that the architect and engineer "correctly certified to the owner that the plaintiff had failed and refused to supply a sufficiency of properly skilled workmen, or material of the proper quality, as provided in said contract, or to pursue the work with promptness or diligence and that the plant was unsound and improper," and that such refusal and neglect afforded sufficient ground for the termination of the contract, then defendant was justified in terminating same and had a right to deduct from the unpaid portion of the contract price all expenses necessarily incurred by him in the completion of the work to make it conform to the contract. There was a conflict of evidence on the question whether or not Connell had neglected to supply skilled workmen and proper materials, and had prosecuted the work diligently. The court said:

"This instruction was clearly erroneous. The question of the effect of such a certificate under the provisions of this contract was considered in American-Hawaiian, etc., Co. v. Butler, 165 Cal. 504, 133 P. 280 [Ann. Cas. 1916C, 44]. At page 513 [133 P. 286], the court says: 'It is well settled that, where the parties to a building contract thereby authorize the architect, as arbiter, to determine and certify the existence of a fact when such fact becomes material to a proceeding under such contract, the certificate of the architect, duly made, that the fact exists, is conclusive upon the parties with respect to the thing to be done to which such fact relates, or as to which, under the proceeding, it is to affect the rights of the parties and that such certificate can be impeached as to such facts only for fraud, or for gross mistake amounting to fraud. Dingley v. Greene, 54 Cal. 333; Moore v. Kerr, 65 Cal. 519, 4 P. 542; City Street Imp. Co. v. Marysville, 155 Cal. 419, 101 P. 308, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 317. * * *' In the case at bar the certificate and notice were in proper form. The certificate could not be impeached by merely showing that it was incorrect. * * * The instruction practically said to the jurors that, if they believed from the evidence before them that the architect and engineer had not correctly decided the question, they were at liberty to disregard the certificate and to refuse to allow to Higgins the expense of completing the work to which he would have been entitled. Such, as we have seen, is not the law. The certificate is conclusive unless it is impeached by showing that it was made fraudulently or in bad faith, or under some mistake with regard to a material fact. * * * The court below should at least have instructed the jury that the certificate was conclusive, unless they found from the evidence that it was given fraudulently."

It cannot be doubted that by the terms of the contract in this case the architect was authorized to and did properly issue the said certificates, and under the above authorities it is also our opinion that said certificates are binding upon appellant and conclusive. Judgment affirmed.

STOWELL v. RIALTO IRR. DIST.
(L. A. No. 7866.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1927.

1. Waters and water courses §230(2)—Conveyance of pipe line and rights of way to irrigation district held consideration for bonds of district, regardless of prior contracts.

Where corporation, building distributing system and supplying water to irrigation district, became insolvent and was unable to proceed with contract, agreement between the district and company supplying such corporation with pipe, that corporation should deed pipes, pipe line, and rights of way to district, which would give its bonds therefor to receiver of corporation, to be turned over to company supplying pipe, was valid, and such transfer of bonds was founded on consideration, regardless of nature of previous contracts between corporation and district or such contracts as modified.

2. Waters and water courses §230(2)—Deed executed 10 days after delivery of bonds by irrigation district held part of same transaction and to constitute sufficient consideration for bonds (Irrigation District Act, § 12).

Where company supplying irrigation district with water and irrigation system became insolvent and could not complete contract, deed by its receiver of pipe line, pipes, and rights of way to district, executed 10 days after district's transfer of its bonds to receiver to be given to company supplying pipe, was part of same transaction, and was sufficient consideration for such bonds, which were not invalid on ground that consideration was construction work for district, contrary to Irrigation District Act, § 12 (St. 1887, p. 29).

3. Waters and water courses §230(2)—That property conveyed to irrigation district was not sufficient consideration for bonds held no defense to action on interest coupons.

Where corporation constructing irrigation system and supplying water for irrigation district became insolvent and could not complete work, and its receiver conveyed to district pipes, pipe line, and rights of way, in return for district's bonds to be paid to furnisher of pipe, alleged fact that property which corporation conveyed was of little value to it and was not worth amount of bonds transferred is no defense to action to collect interest on coupons of bonds.

4. Waters and water courses §230(2)—Failure of furnisher of pipe to join in deed conveying pipe line to irrigation district held not to invalidate transfer of bonds.

Where contract of furnisher of pipe with corporation constructing irrigation system for irrigation district made title of pipe pass to district when laid, failure of such furnisher of pipe to join with receiver of insolvent corporation in deed to district, in return for bonds which were transferred by receiver to furnisher of pipe, did not render such transfer of bonds invalid, and was no defense in action on interest coupons of bonds.

5. Waters and water courses §230(2)—In absence of default on contract to lay irrigation pipe, conveyance of irrigation district's bonds on resolution requiring completing contract held valid.

Including in resolution to transfer irrigation district bonds in return for deed to pipes, pipe lines, and rights of way, that furnisher of pipe should diligently continue laying pipe lines according to its contract cannot invalidate bonds and defeat action on interest coupons, in absence of showing default as to such condition, especially where district accepted deed and retained benefits thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Two actions by N. W. Stowell against the Rialto Irrigation District, tried together. From a judgment for plaintiff but denying plaintiff recovery on certain bond coupons, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Swanwick & Donnelly, Carroll Searls, and C. C. Haskell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SHENK, J. A former judgment of reversal in this case was set aside on petition for rehearing in order that further consideration might be given to the contentions of the defendant. Upon such further consideration we are unable to arrive at a different conclusion.

Two actions were brought by plaintiff, based on amounts claimed to be due on interest coupons detached from certain bonds of the defendant irrigation district. The defense was made on the ground that the issuance of said bonds was unauthorized by law; that the consideration, if any, for the issuance thereof, was insufficient, inadequate, and unlawful, in that said consideration consisted in the doing of construction work for the district in violation of section 12 of the Irrigation District Act (Stats. 1887, p. 29), that the plaintiff was not a holder of said bonds in good faith, or in ordinary course of business without notice of the facts constituting the alleged invalidity, and that payment of certain of said coupons was barred by the statute of limitations. The two cases were tried together by agreement of the parties, and a single record is now presented. The court found for the plaintiff on all of said coupons excepting those barred by the statute of limitations and excepting also the coupons detached from 54 bonds of the par value of $27,000. As to these 54 bonds, the court found that the issuance thereof was unauthorized and void under the statute, and that the plaintiff, at the time he acquired the same, had notice and knowledge of such invalidity. The plaintiff appeals from that portion of the judgment which denies recovery on the coupons attached to the 54 bonds.

The record is presented in a bill of exceptions, wherein it is the sole claim of the plaintiff that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of the court adverse to his present contentions.

The Rialto irrigation district was organized on October 13, 1890, pursuant to provisions of said Irrigation District Act as originally enacted and as subsequently amended and supplemented. As the result of an election held for that purpose on November 15, 1890, bonds of the district in the total sum of $500,000 were authorized. On December 10, 1890, the district entered into an agreement with the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company, wherein the district agreed to issue and deliver to the Semi-Tropic Company all of said bonds as consideration for 1,000 inches of water and a distributing system. Before the covenants of this contract had been fully performed by the Semi-Tropic Company, and under date of December 22, 1890, another agreement was entered into between the same parties modifying the agreement of December 10, 1890, in minor particulars. Again on May 26, 1892, the same parties executed another agreement modifying the previous contracts and confirming the same as modified. The contract of December 10, 1890, was involved in a former appeal in this case, Stowell v. Rialto Irrigation District, 155 Cal. 215, 100 P. 248. It was there held that the bonds issued pursuant to the 1890 contract were, in fact, given as payment for water and pipe lines purchased and were valid in the hands of the original holder. Under date of June 12, 1893, the district and the Semi-Tropic Company entered into an agreement formally abrogating and canceling the previous agreements in so far as they remained unexecuted. The new contract specified that the Semi-Tropic Company should transfer to the district certain water and water rights and complete the distributing system as therein provided; that, if the Semi-Tropic Company should fail to perform its covenants under the contract, the district could, on 30 days' notice, in writing, perform the contract and charge the cost thereof to the Semi-Tropic Company; that, if said company should perform its contract, as agreed, then the district would turn over the balance of said $500,000 issue of bonds to the company; that all questions arising between the parties as to the sufficiency of the pipe lines to be constructed or as to the measurements of water, should be submitted to a board of arbitrators, consisting of three competent engineers, one to be appointed by the district, one by the Semi-Tropic Company and the third by the two so chosen, and the determination of the board was to be final and conclusive; that the remaining bonds of the $500,000 issue be forthwith deposited with W. S. Hooper, cashier of the San Bernardino National Bank, as trustee, for said parties, the same to be held by him in accordance with the terms of said agreement and be delivered to the Semi-Tropic Company on the order of the boards of directors of the respective parties. Three days after the contract was made, to wit, on June 15, 1893, Mr. Hooper received 314 of said bonds. Subsequently on orders he delivered the 54 bonds in question to the plaintiff. These 54 bonds were delivered to the plaintiff on October 8, 1894, under circumstances hereinafter to be related.

On June 4, 1892, the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company entered into an agreement with the Stowell Cement Pipe Company, wherein the latter company agreed to furnish a good and serviceable pipe of cement concrete of specified size, dimensions, and price, and lay the same in ditches to be constructed by the Semi-Tropic Company, for which the latter agreed to pay the Stowell Company 60 per cent. of the contract price when the pipe was made and 40 per cent. when the pipe was laid. Considerable work was done under this contract for which the Stowell Company accepted as payment bonds of the district at par in the hands of the Semi-Tropic Company in lieu of cash, as provided in said contract. In the month of February, 1894, W. M. Sheldon was appointed receiver of the Semi-Tropic Company in an action entitled San Francisco Savings Union v. Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company, pending in the superior court in and for San Bernardino county. On August 16, 1894, the board of directors of the district adopted the following resolution:

"That on order of the president and secretary of this board, W. S. Hooper be and he is hereby authorized to deliver to W. M. Sheldon, receiver of the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company, such an amount of the bonds of this district as a committee to be appointed may determine, said bonds to be delivered by said Sheldon to Stowell Cement Pipe Company as payment for pipe already laid in this district and accepted.

"Provided that this district shall receive a good and sufficient deed and title to all pipe lines in and out of the district (not already deeded), laid by said Stowell Cement Pipe Company, for the use and benefit of this district. Said W. M. Sheldon, receiver, and said Stowell Cement Company shall join in executing said deed; and provided further that this district shall receive a perfect deed and title to rights of way for all pipe lines already laid, or that may be laid for the use and benefit of this district through the lands of the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company, and all rights of way now owned by them. And be it further resolved that W. M. Sheldon, receiver, be requested to continue to completion the contract existing between the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company and Stowell Cement Company, for the laying of pipe lines for the use of this district; and be it further resolved that, on the order of the president and secretary of this board, W. S. Hooper be and he is hereby authorized to deliver the bonds of this district to W. M. Sheldon, receiver, to be by him turned over to the Stowell Cement Company in amounts at par value and at times as this board shall direct. This resolution shall be operative only on condition that the Stowell Cement Company shall diligently continue the laying of pipe lines in this district to completion, as per their contract with the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company."

The minutes of the district of date June 5, 1894, disclose the following:

"N. W. Stowell of the Stowell Cement Pipe Company made a statement of the account between the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company and the Stowell Cement Pipe Company and asked for a settlement with the district. On motion, a committee consisting of Robinson, Dyer, and Hunton were appointed a committee to investigate on the matter and report back to the board."

The minutes of the district of October 6, 1894, include the following:

"The committee appointed to investigate the Stowell Cement Pipe Company's account reported that they found the count correct, and on motion were discharged. The following resolution was read: Resolved, that, on order of the president and secretary, W. S. Hooper be and he is hereby authorized to deliver to W. M. Sheldon, receiver of the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company, the bonds of the district in the amount of $27,000 at par value, detaching all coupons, * * *" then overdue.

On October 4, 1894, the receiver of the Semi-Tropic Company filed in said superior court a petition wherein he alleged the indebtedness of the Semi-Tropic Company to the plaintiff in said action in the sum of $280,000 secured by a mortgage on 16,700 acres of land belonging to the Semi-Tropic Company, 7,000 acres of which were situated within the boundaries of the irrigation district; that the Semi-Tropic Company was unable, for want of money, to comply with its contract of June 12, 1893, with the district or to insist upon compliance by the Stowell Company under said contract of June 4, 1892; that the district was desirous of having further pipe furnished and laid by the Stowell Company to the end that all the lands within the district might be furnished with conduits and pipes for conducting water to the lands of the district, and was desirous of availing itself of the terms of the contract between the Semi-Tropic Company and the Stowell Company for the furnishing and laying of pipe and thus avoid advertisement for bids and consequent delays; that the additional work would be of the value of $15,000, and that the district desired to furnish bonds of the district at par in payment thereof to the receiver, the same to be delivered to the Stowell Company in payment for said work; that both the district and the Stowell Company and the receiver were willing to relieve the Semi-Tropic Company of all responsibilities under the latter's contracts; that it would be greatly to the interest of the Semi-Tropic Company and its general creditors to have the lands included within said district, and particularly about 1840 acres of said Semi-Tropic Company's lands still unpiped, piped for water by the Stowell Company; that the Stowell Company would not furnish or lay pipe thereon without the delivery of bonds unto it through the receiver; that the receiver desired to convey to the district all of the right, title, and interest of the Semi-Tropic Company in and to all of the pipe and pipe lines situate within the district, and that these pipes and pipe lines had been made and laid for the sole use and benefit of the district; that the receiver desired to convey to the district all of the right, title, and interest of the Semi-Tropic Company in and to the Raynor ditch and flume, which were acquired by the Semi-Tropic Company solely for the benefit of the district, and which were and are not subject to the lien of said mortgage; that in October, 1890, the district purchased from the Semi-Tropic Company certain water and tunnel rights in the Lord ranch; that the district has water which it desires to discharge through the aforesaid pipes for the irrigation of lands owned by the Semi-Tropic Company; that the district is willing to maintain and care for said pipes and conduits at its own expense after the same have been conveyed to it and to accept a conveyance to it of the said pipe and pipe lines and said interest in the Lord ranch; that the district is cognizant of said petition and is willing to relieve the Semi-Tropic Company and the receiver of all liability in the premises and that the Stowell Company is cognizant of the petition and consents thereto and is likewise willing to relieve the Semi-Tropic Company of all liability upon the granting of said petition. The receiver prayed for an order authorizing him "to make the conveyances hereinbefore particularly mentioned" and to transfer to the Stowell Company whatever bonds he may receive from the district "in payment for the pipe and the laying of piping within and upon the lands of said" district by the Stowell Company and for such other relief as might be deemed proper in the premises. On the day after the foregoing petition of the receiver was filed, to wit, on October 5, 1894, the court made an order reciting that the statements in the petition were true, and ordering that the receiver transfer to the Stowell Company whatever bonds he may receive from the district "in payment for piping and the laying of pipe within and upon the lands of said Rialto irrigation district by said Stowell Cement Pipe Company." The order further authorized the receiver to convey to the district, by good and sufficient deed, all of the right, title, and interest of the Semi-Tropic Company in and to the pipe and pipe lines situated within the boundaries of the district or leading from the water sources thereto and all of the right, title, and interest of the Semi-Tropic Company in and to the Raynor ditch and flume and the Lord ranch.

Thereafter, and on October 8, 1894, the president and secretary of said district, pursuant to a resolution of the board of directors adopted on the same day, authorized W. S. Hooper to deliver to said receiver bonds of said district then in his possession under the contract of June 12, 1893, in the amount of $27,000 par value. These bonds were on the same day delivered to the plaintiff in this action, who concededly was the directing head and dominating spirit of the Stowell Company. On the 18th day of October, 1894, the receiver, on behalf of the Semi-Tropic Company, signed a deed conveying to the district the pipe, pipe lines, easements, and other real property authorized to be conveyed by order of court of October 5, 1894. This document was duly acknowledged and was later recorded at the request of the district. The contract of June 12, 1893, was assigned to Mr. Stowell on November 9, 1894, who thereafter, on January 2, 1895, entered into an agreement with the district modifying said contract in certain particulars and entering upon new and additional covenants and agreements with the district to furnish material and do construction work. For aught that appears in the record, Stowell was not remiss in the execution of his part of the contract, as modified and re-executed. However, it was determined in Rialto, Irrigation District v. Stowell (C. C. A.) 246 F. 294, that a large number of the bonds of the district, issued to Stowell under the contract of January 2, 1895, were issued for construction work, and were therefore void in his hands under the inhibitions of the statute. When the contract of January 2, 1895, was executed, a settlement on account of pipe theretofore made and laid was had between the plaintiff and the district, in which the $27,000 in bonds involved herein was taken into account as an item of payment from the receiver of the Semi-Tropic Company to the plaintiff.

[1] The principal problem presented for solution in this case is whether there was a lawful consideration for the 54 bonds running from the Semi-Tropic Company to the district. Section 12 of the Irrigation District Act prohibits the issuance of bonds except for cash or property purchased. The trial court concluded that the bonds in question were issued in payment of work done under the contract which had been abrogated and canceled by agreement of June 12, 1893, and were therefore void under section 12 of the act, as being founded upon an illegal or unauthorized consideration. The only conflict in the evidence is as to whether plaintiff's claim arose for work done prior to June 12, 1893, or subsequent thereto. The trial court found, on what is assumed to be sufficient evidence, that the claim arose for work done by the Stowell Company prior to June 12, 1893, and was therefore for work done under a contract that was not in existence at the time of the delivery of the 54 bonds. It is very clear from the record that the Stowell Company furnished the material and performed the work, amounting to and somewhat exceeding in value the par value of the $27,000 in bonds received by it, and that the work was done and the material was furnished prior to the time the Stowell Company, the predecessor of the plaintiff, received the bonds from the receiver of the Semi-Tropic Company, which was, of course, the same as receiving the bonds from the company itself. There was no statutory or other impediment restricting the right of the Semi-Tropic Company to contract with the Stowell Company for payment for work done and materials furnished in bonds of the district which the Semi-Tropic Company might rightfully have in its possession. So all question of a valid and sufficient consideration for the transfer of the bonds to the Stowell Company by the Semi-Tropic Company or its receiver may be dismissed as having been fully shown in plaintiff's favor.

As to the consideration flowing from the Semi-Tropic Company to the district, it is deemed of no controlling significance whether the plaintiff's claim against the Semi-Tropic Company arose before or after June 12, 1893. A legal consideration for the issuance of said bonds is shown by what transpired on and shortly prior to October 18, 1894. It appears from the evidence, without conflict, that on June 5, 1894, Mr. Stowell appeared before the board of directors of the district and made a statement of his account with the Semi-Tropic Company and asked for a settlement so that he might receive payment from that company. Obviously he could not demand settlement with himself directly from the district for the reason that there was then no contractual relation between himself and the district. His claim was against the Semi-Tropic Company. As a result of his appearance before the board, a committee was appointed by the board, consisting of three of its members, "to investigate on the matter and report back to the board." The resolution of the board of date August 16, 1894, authorizing W. S. Hooper, on the order of the president and secretary of the board, to deliver to the receiver of the Semi-Tropic Company bonds in an amount to be determined after the report of the committee appointed to ascertain the amount of pipe already laid by the Stowell Company and unpaid for, upon condition of the receipt of a deed conveying to the district all pipe and pipe lines and rights of way owned by the Semi-Tropic Company in the district's distributing system; the petition of the receiver of October 4, 1894, for leave of court to make the deed required by the district under said resolution and including the Raynor ditch and flume and the Lord ranch; the granting of the petition on October 5th; the report of the committee of the district board of October 6th, certifying to the board the correctness of the Stowell Company's pipe and working account, and the resolution of said board on the same day authorizing Mr. Hooper to deliver to the receiver the $27,000 in bonds which was less in amount than the Semi-Tropic Company owed the Stowell Company for pipe already laid; the delivery of said bonds to the plaintiff for the account of the Stowell Company on the order of the district and of the receiver of the Semi-Tropic Company on October 8th, and the execution of the deed by said receiver to the district of date October 18, 1894—all constitute a part of the same transaction wherein the bonds were transferred to the receiver in consideration of the property conveyed by said deed, a transaction authorized by section 12 of the Irrigation District Act. It is therefore apparent that there was a legal consideration for said bonds in the hands of the original holder, namely, the Semi-Tropic Company, or its receiver, regardless of the nature of the contract of December 10, 1890, as modified, or the contract of June 12, 1893.

[2, 3] The defendant district urges that the deed of October 18, 1894, should not be considered a part of the same transaction or as consideration for said bonds, because it was delivered to the district and recorded some 10 days after the delivery of the bonds to Mr.

Stowell. The contention is without substantial merit, as the record plainly shows that the execution of the deed was but a culmination of all the prior transactions. It may properly be argued that it would have been better if the officers of the district had required the delivery of said deed before the bonds were delivered, as the resolution of the board plainly contemplated, but there was no difficulty in identifying the deed to be received or the bonds to be delivered therefor. Ever since delivery of the said deed, the district has been in full enjoyment of the title and possession of the property thereby conveyed. The defendant contends that the record shows that the property thereby conveyed was not of the value of said bonds; especially is it urged that the petition of the receiver for leave to convey the same discloses that said property was of very little value to the Semi-Tropic Company and of no market value. Even so, the value of said property to the district may have been all that the directors of the district plainly considered it was worth when they authorized the $27,000 in bonds to be delivered in exchange for the same. The record does not show what the value of the property thereby conveyed was to the district. The district may have made a bad bargain. That fact, if it be a fact, would be no defense under the circumstances here shown. Ham v. Grapeland District, 172 Cal. 611, 618, 158 P. 207.

[4] The defendant makes the further point that the resolution of the board of date August 16, 1894, provided that the Stowell Company should join in executing the deed, and that it did not do so. No reason is advanced why that company should have so joined in order effectively to pass the title. Whatever interest the Stowell Company had in the pipe passed to the Semi-Tropic Company upon the laying thereof, and such was no doubt taken into consideration by the officers of the district when they accepted and recorded the deed.

[5] It is also insisted by the defendant that the resolution of August 16 provided that it would be operative only on condition that the Stowell Company should diligently continue the laying of pipe lines in said district to completion in accordance with its contract with the Semi-Tropic Company. The answer to this contention is that the record does not disclose any breach of said contract by the Stowell Company or by Stowell himself after the contract of June 12, 1894, was assigned to him. Without a showing that there was a default of some sort, we are not justified in permitting the inclusion of the condition in the resolution to defeat the consideration for the deed, especially where, as it now appears, the district has accepted the deed and is retaining the benefits thereof.

The determination that said bonds were valid in the hands of the original holder renders it unnecessary to pass upon the further contention of the defendant that the plaintiff is not a bona fide holder without notice.

Since the findings of the trial court to the effect that the consideration for the issuance of said 54 bonds was illegal is without support under the uncontradicted evidence, the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

GOLDEN GATE FERRY CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA.★
(S. F. 12388.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 27, 1927.

Rehearing Granted Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Ferries ⇨15—Company adding second vehicular ferry route to former passenger route held not required to obtain certificate of public convenience, being within exemption (Public Utilities Act, § 50 [d], as amended by St. 1923, p. 836).

Where a company had previously maintained one vehicular ferry route, it was not required to obtain a certificate of public convenience and necessity for adding a new vehicular service on a route formerly carrying passengers only, since it was held within the exemption of Public Utilities Act, § 50 (d), as amended by St. 1923, p. 836, providing that no such certificate should be required of any corporation or person which was actually operating vessels in good faith at the time the act became effective.

2. Ferries ⇨31—Company operating vessels under exemption of statute requiring certificate of public convenience may amend tariff schedules to cover commodities not before transported (Public Utilities Act, § 15, and § 50 [d], as amended by St. 1923, p. 836).

Company operating vessels under exemption of Public Utilities Act, § 50 (d), as amended by St. 1923, p. 836, providing that companies operating vessels in good faith at the time the act became effective would not be required to obtain a certificate of public convenience and necessity, may amend its tariff schedules on file so as to cover commodities not before transported, and hence company formerly furnishing only passenger ferry service on one of its routes could file, in compliance with Public Utilities Act, § 15 (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 26), amended schedules and tariffs covering vehicular ferry service.

Certiorari by the Golden Gate Ferry Company, to review an order of the Railroad Commission of the State of California declaring that the Southern Pacific Company is not required to secure a certificate of public convenience and necessity for adding additional facilities to its ferry service. Writ denied.

RICHARDS, J. This is an application for a writ of review. The petitioner, the Golden Gate Ferry Company, alleges that it was and now is engaged in the business of operating a public ferry for which tolls are charged for the transportation of passengers and self-propelled and other vehicles on, over, and across the waters of the San Francisco Bay; that it is the owner and in the possession of a franchise granted by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco authorizing the establishment, operation, and maintenance of a public ferry between points in the said city and county of San Francisco and the city of Alameda, county of Alameda; that on the 26th day of March, 1926, petitioner filed its application with the Railroad Commission of the state of California, pursuant to the provisions of section 50 (d) of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 18, and amendments thereto), requesting said commission to issue and grant to petitioner a certificate of public convenience and necessity to operate vessels between the city of San Francisco and the city of Alameda; that a hearing was had thereon by said commission, but no decision or order has as yet been made or rendered therein; that on or about September 3, 1926, the Southern Pacific Company, a railroad corporation, commenced the operation of a public vehicular ferry between a point within the city of San Francisco and a point within the city of Alameda; that in commencing said vehicular ferry service between said points, the Southern Pacific Company for the first time put into operation between said cities an entirely new, different and distinct type of vessel; namely, that type of vessel which is designated as a vehicular ferry; that vessels of such construction and type had never theretofore been operated by said Southern Pacific Company between any points in San Francisco and Alameda; that on July 15, 1926, and prior to its operation of said vehicular ferry between San Francisco and Alameda, the Southern Pacific Company filed with the respondent commission an amendment to its tariff schedules naming rates for vehicular ferry service between, among other points, San Francisco and the Alameda Pier; that said amendment was the first filing by the Southern Pacific Company of any rate for vehicular ferry service between any point in San Francisco and any point in Alameda; that prior to said amendment the Southern Pacific Company had no rate on file with the respondent commission or any tariff applicable to the transportation of vehicles between any point in San Francisco and said Alameda Pier, or any other point in Alameda; that said Southern Pacific Company has never received or petitioned for or in any manner sought from the respondent commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity to operate vessels in vehicular ferry service between San Francisco and the Alameda Pier or any vehicular ferry service between the city of San Francisco and the city of Alameda; that there has never issued to the Southern Pacific Company, nor to any of its lessors or subsidiaries, any such certificate of public convenience and necessity as required by the provisions of section 50 (d) of the Public Utilities Act, and said Southern Pacific Company is without lawful right, authority, or privilege to operate said or any vessels for automobiles or rather vehicular ferry service between the city of San Francisco and the said city of Alameda; that the Southern Pacific Company had not for a period of 32 years prior to September 3, 1926, engaged in the transportation of vehicles between any point in the city of San Francisco and the city of Alameda; that the respondent commission, of its own motion, instituted a proceeding having for its purpose an investigation into the construction of facilities and the rendering of a vehicular ferry service by the Southern Pacific Company between said two points without first having obtained a certificate of public convenience and necessity; that the respondent commission permitted the petitioner herein to intervene in said proceeding as an interested party; that petitioner has been and now is an interested party in said proceeding and in the action, determination, and decision therein; that the respondent commission, on the 17th day of December, 1926, made, rendered, and filed its opinion and order, concurred in by a majority of its members, declaring, in effect, that the Southern Pacific Company was and is not required to secure a certificate of public convenience and necessity under the provisions of section 50 (d) of the Public Utilities Act authorizing it to inaugurate a vehicular ferry service between the city of San Francisco and the Alameda Pier; that thereafter and within 20 days from the making of said order and decision the petitioner herein filed with the respondent commission its petition for rehearing, which said petition was denied on January 6, 1927; that the majority opinion and order of the respondent commission declaring that the Southern Pacific Company was and is not required to secure a certificate of public convenience and necessity, under section 50 (d) of the Public Utilities Act, for the operation of a vehicular ferry service between the city of San Francisco and the city of Alameda, is illegal, void, and in excess of the jurisdiction of the respondent commission. Wherefore the petitioner prays that this court enter its decree and judgment annulling and setting aside the majority opinion and order of the respondent commission referred to above.

[1] The sole question presented in this proceeding for a review of said order revolves about the interpretation to be given to section 50 (d) of the Public Utilities Act, as amended in 1923. Stats. 1923, pp. 834, 836. The section reads:

"No corporation or person, their lessees, trustees, receivers or trustees appointed by any court whatsoever, shall hereafter operate or cause to be operated, any vessel between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state, without first having obtained from the railroad commission a certificate declaring that present or future public convenience and necessity require or will require, such operation, but no such certificate shall be required of any corporation or person which is actually operating vessels in good faith, at the time this act becomes effective, between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state under tariffs and schedules of such corporations or persons, lawfully on file with the Railroad Commission."

It is contended by the Southern Pacific Company that its operation is and has been such as to bring it within the exemption contained in section 50 (d); that is to say, it is urged by said company that on August 16, 1923, the effective date of section 50 (d) of the Public Utilities Act, it was operating vessels in good faith between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state and more particularly between the city and county of San Francisco and the Alameda Pier, under tariffs and schedules lawfully on file with the respondent commission. In view of the existence of these facts it is urged by the Southern Pacific Company that it may properly operate and maintain, by virtue of the exemption provision found in section 50 (d), a public vehicular ferry service between said points without first acquiring from the respondent commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity.

Petitioner contends, on the other hand, that the operation of a vehicular ferry service by the Southern Pacific Company between San Francisco and the Alameda Pier does not fall within the exemption provided for in said section 50 (d), for "that section exempted any existing operator from the necessity of obtaining a certificate of public convenience and necessity for any operations being conducted in good faith on that date, or for the exercise of any rights being exercised on that date, but did not exempt any operator from securing a certificate of public convenience and necessity for the commencement of any new operations not theretofore being conducted or for the exercise of any rights not theretofore being exercised."

The respondent commission contends in its brief filed herein that:

"The Public Utilities Act of this state provides that no certificate shall be required from any corporation or person which on August 16, 1923, was actually operating vessels in good faith between points exclusively on the inland waters of this state under tariffs and schedules lawfully on file with the Railroad Commission. The evidence herein, in our opinion, shows that the Southern Pacific Company was, on that date, so operating between its Alameda Pier and San Francisco, and we therefore submit that no certificate was requisite before it might commence the operation here in question by transporting vehicles, as well as passengers, between these points."

We are unable to accept the interpretation placed upon section 50 (d) by the petitioner. The majority opinion of the respondent commission would seem to be correct in declaring that:

"The operative right possessed by the Southern Pacific Company, by virtue of the exemption contained in section 50 (d) of the Public Utilities Act, is not limited to the class of service covered by the tariffs lawfully on file with the commission on the effective date thereof, and that the said company may properly amend its tariffs to include therein rates for vehicular service, as has been done in this case."

[2] The Legislature by its employment of the broad language found in section 50 (d) has evinced an intention to exempt from the requirement of securing a certificate of public convenience and necessity all ferries actually operating vessels in good faith at the effective date of said section. Had it been desired to confine the exemption found therein to the class of service theretofore rendered by a ferry company, it would have been an easy matter for the Legislature to have expressed such intention. In the absence of language so confining said exemption we are of the opinion that the Southern Pacific Company properly filed with the respondent commission, in compliance with the provisions of section 15 of the Public Utilities Act, its amended schedules and tariffs covering vehicular ferry service between San Francisco and the Alameda Pier and thereafter properly commenced the carriage and transportation of vehicles and their contents between said two points. In other words, it is our opinion that a corporation or person possessed of a right to operate vessels between given points, under the exemption of section 50 (d), may properly amend the tariff schedules on file so as to cover commodities not theretofore transported. This conclusion would seem to be in harmony with the changing conditions of commerce. Any other construction of the exemption provision found in section 50 (d) would be narrow and unreasonable. This exemption provision was placed in the act, unquestionably, for the benefit of established ferry companies operating vessels between points on the inland waters of this state and to obviate the necessity of their having to acquire a certificate of public convenience and necessity.

The early development of ferry service between the city and county of San Francisco and the county of Alameda tends to support the conclusion announced herein. By the year 1887 the Southern Pacific Company had purchased practically all of the stock of three independent groups of railroads theretofore operating in Alameda county. As a result of such purchase the Southern Pacific Company acquired the right to control and operate all of said railroads, together with any ferry service maintained in connection therewith. The ferry operations so acquired by the Southern Pacific Company included both vehicular and passenger ferry service between San Francisco and the Oakland mole, San Francisco and the Alameda Pier, and San Francisco and the foot of Broadway, Oakland—this latter ferry being commonly known as the Creek route. In 1894 the passenger boats of the Southern Pacific Company operating between San Francisco and the Alameda Pier discontinued the carrying of vehicular traffic and the Creek route ferry was thereupon required to transport all vehicles destined for the city of Alameda. Thereafter and in the year 1912 the Southern Pacific Company likewise restricted the amount and character of vehicular traffic to be carried on its boats running between San Francisco and the Oakland mole, thus again augmenting the vehicular traffic passing over its Creek route ferry. This gradual expansion and enlargement of the vehicular ferry service over the Creek route together with the restriction of the vehicular ferry service on the passenger boats of the Southern Pacific Company placed the burden of carrying the major portion of vehicular traffic destined for Oakland or Alameda upon the Creek route ferry. It is true, however, that the Southern Pacific Company in 1923 again established a daily vehicular ferry service between San Francisco and the Oakland mole.

From the foregoing, it is readily apparent that the Creek route ferry has, for a number of years, served, indifferently, vehicular traffic, and, of recent years, particularly automobile traffic, traveling between the city of San Francisco and the contiguous cities of Oakland and Alameda. This ferry traverses a narrow estuary, known as San Antonio creek, the center line of which constitutes a common boundary between the said contiguous cities of Oakland and Alameda. City of Alameda v. City of Oakland, 198 Cal. 566, 246 P. 69. Said Creek route ferry has therefore, for a great many years, undertaken to serve both Oakland and Alameda without distinction, and we therefore attach no particular significance to the fact that the east bay terminal of said ferry happens to be situated upon the Oakland side of said estuary. If such terminal had early been established upon the opposite and Alameda side of said estuary, the Southern Pacific Company undoubtedly would not be required to secure a certificate of public convenience and necessity as a prerequisite to a change of terminal to another point on the Alameda side of the estuary. The dual service rendered by the Creek route ferry therefore warrants the conclusion that the Southern Pacific Company need not procure a certificate of public convenience and necessity before establishing an automobile ferry service between San Francisco and the Alameda Pier. In other words, we are of the opinion that the exemption provision in section 50 (d) is such as to authorize the establishment and operation by the Southern Pacific Company of a vehicular ferry between said two points without first having to secure such certificate of public convenience and necessity. The Southern Pacific Company had on file with the respondent commission a rate schedule covering the transportation of vehicles to and from Alameda by way of its Creek route ferry. In view of this fact, we are unable to perceive of any reason which would prevent it from amending said rate, as was done here, so as to provide for the transportation of a part of its vehicular traffic on a ferry operating directly to and from its Alameda Pier.

This determination is not at variance with the rule announced in the case of Motor Transit Co. v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 573, 209 P. 586, which case is strongly relied on by the petitioner herein. The language of the exemption clause there considered clearly indicated that its provisions were to be confined solely to the service theretofore rendered by the utility, for it was provided that:

"No such certificate shall be required of any transportation company as to the fixed termini between which, or the route over which, it is actually operating in good faith at the time this act becomes effective."

No such restrictive language appears in the exemption provision herein concerned.

The conclusion we have reached renders it unnecessary that we consider the other contentions advanced by the parties.

The application is denied and the decision and order of the respondent commission affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; PRESTON, J.; SHENK, J.

LANGDON, J. I dissent. It is undisputed that for a period in excess of 32 years immediately preceding September 3, 1926, Southern Pacific Company operated no vessels between any point in Alameda and any point in the city and county of San Francisco except for the transportation of passengers carried on its trains. Prior to 1894 said company operated vessels which were used to transport vehicles between its Alameda Pier and a point in San Francisco. In December, 1894, however, the plank road along the Alameda Pier was torn up and since that time and until a new road was built in 1926, no service was offered to the public by Southern Pacific Company for the transportation of vehicles between any point in Alameda and any point in San Francisco. It is apparent, therefore, that whatever service the Southern Pacific Company or its predecessors may heretofore have offered to the public in the way of vehicular transportation between Alameda and San Francisco was abandoned. It would seem to follow that after such service was abandoned, the obligation to render it ceased and the right of the public to insist upon it was terminated. A similar situation was presented in the case of Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 577, 160 P. 828, 2 A. L. R. 975. There railroad service between two points had been discontinued for about 20 years. A complaint was filed with the Railroad Commission to require the re-establishment of that service. The commission made an order requiring the railroad company to re-establish the service. Upon appeal, it was held that the commission acted beyond its jurisdiction, the following language being used:

"Nor is the fact that a railroad line had once existed between Fallbrook and Temecula a factor of any moment in the present inquiry. No question is made of the authority of the Railroad Commission to compel a railroad company or other public utility to restore a service which it has been furnishing. Here, however, the line between Fallbrook and Temecula had been destroyed for about 20 years before the action of the commission was invoked, and, indeed, before the enactment of the law upon which the commission relies for its authority to act. It is expressly found that 'that portion of the line was left abandoned and service discontinued. It has remained abandoned ever since.' In view of this fact, it cannot be doubted that any obligation of the predecessor of the Santa Fé Company to maintain and operate the line from Fallbrook to Temecula had long since ceased (Public Service Com. v. Philadelphia, etc., Ry. Co., 122 Md. 438 [89 A. 726]) and that no such obligation ever rested upon the Santa Fé Company itself. The duty to maintain the line was dependent upon the right to maintain it, and this right was lost by abandonment (Home Real Estate Co. v. Los Angeles Pac. Co., 163 Cal. 710 [126 P. 972]), without regard to the question whether it had been forfeited under the provisions of section 468 of the Civil Code.

The case must therefore stand precisely as it would if there had never been any connection between these two points."

Likewise in the instant case, it would appear that vehicular service between the points in question having been abandoned by Southern Pacific Company and its predecessors, there was no obligation upon the part of the company to render it and no right in the public to insist upon receiving it.

How, then, can it be said that a certificate of public convenience and necessity was unnecessary to inaugurate this service because the Southern Pacific Company was "actually operating vessels in good faith under tariffs and schedules lawfully on file with the Railroad Commission?" Does this language of the Public Utilities Act mean to exempt a corporation, operating vessels in any type of service on the inland waters of this state, from securing a certificate, or does it mean to exempt a corporation that is operating a similar service to the one sought to be inaugurated, or does it mean to exempt a corporation that is operating, at the time the act became effective, a service which is later to be continued? The language of the majority opinion holds that the first alternative is the proper construction, but, later, attempts to characterize the new service inaugurated by the Southern Pacific as closely similar to the service previously rendered between different points and to make the differences between the two of no significance.

I am of the opinion that the third alternative is the one which was intended by the Legislature, i. e., that a corporation is exempted from obtaining the certificate if it was, at the effective date of the act, actually operating a service in all respects substantially the same as the service to be rendered after the act became effective. Since it is apparent that the section of the act under consideration is not clear and definite in expressing any of the above suggested alternatives, it becomes the duty of this court to construe the same with reference to the purposes sought to be served and the public policy underlying the legislation. The entire act evinces a determined purpose to give to the Railroad Commission power to regulate transportation on the inland waters of the state by granting or refusing certificates of public convenience and necessity, and to so construe the section we are considering as to exempt any person or corporation from applying for such a certificate, if it has been operating any type of vessel in any type of service before the act became operative, would leave with the Railroad Commission but a semblance of power. To construe the section so as to exempt a corporation from securing a certificate to carry freight if it has previously carried passengers over the same route, or to exempt it if it has previously carried freight over a different route, but one comparable in some of its features to the new route sought, would be to give an elasticity to the language, and the action to be taken under it, which would result in confusion and litigation and incompetency on the part of the commission. The safe, definite rule, and the one supported by the reason and purpose of the Public Utilities Act, would seem to be to construe the language, "operating vessels in good faith," to mean operating them in good faith in the essential and inherent features of the service sought to be continued after the effective date of the act. It seems apparent from the admitted facts that the Southern Pacific Company was not operating such a service at the date mentioned. A different type of vessel is to be used by the Southern Pacific Company from that used at the date of the act, a different route is to be taken, and a different class of service rendered.

As respondent clearly presents in its brief herein, the filing of a tariff amendment to the Creek route vehicular tariff is not the addition of a commodity to the Alameda passenger tariff. The tariff, which was amended, covered no service whatever between any point in the city of San Francisco and any point in the city of Alameda. At the time of the tariff amendment, the Southern Pacific Company was engaged in the operation of vessels between Alameda Pier and the ferry building in San Francisco for the transportation only of passengers transported over its railroad. It had no tariff on file for the transportation of any freight of any kind whatever. The operation of a vehicular ferry has no connection with the operation of a railroad service. It is in no way an adjunct of the railroad operation. A vehicular service could just as well be rendered by a corporation which had no rights whatever to operate a railroad. The Southern Pacific Company, in another action, successfully maintained this contention before this court. Southern Pac. Co. v. Richardson, 181 Cal. 280, 184 P. 3.

The majority opinion of the commission, approved by this court, opens the door to a stretching of this section of the Public Utilities Act until it becomes a means of promoting the very evils it was designed to remedy. By this ruling, the commission has curtailed the powers vested in it by law to determine the public convenience and necessity of future service to be rendered by transportation companies. Whatever ambiguity there may be in the section under consideration, the purpose of the act is too clear to warrant a construction which will weaken the Railroad Commission's control of public utilities.

PEOPLE v. GAYLE. (Cr. 2988.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1927.

1. Forgery $\S$ 12(2)—Convictions for forgery will be upheld, notwithstanding signatures forged are to unenforceable obligations.

The fact that signatures alleged to have been forged were to unenforceable obligations will not prevent conviction for forgery.

2. Forgery $\S$ 7(1)—Test of what instruments may be subject of forgery is whether it is possible to defraud by means of forgery.

The true test of whether an instrument may be the subject of forgery is whether or not by reason of the forgery or utterance of the instrument it is possible to defraud.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 29—Forging contract for real estate sale and check as payment are two separate offenses, though instruments were forged at same time.

Forging a contract for the sale of real estate and check purporting to be payment, so that forger might obtain commissions from apparent sale, are two separate offenses, though the instruments were forged at the same time.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 29—Passing or uttering at same time contract for real estate sale and check as payment constitutes but one offense.

Passing or uttering at same time contract for sale of real estate and check purporting to be payment therefor, so that agent might collect commissions, constitutes one offense only.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1144(16)—Where defendant was charged with forging six instruments and jury brought general verdict of guilty, appellate court assumes they found defendant guilty of falsely making and counterfeiting all the instruments.

Where defendant was charged separately in six counts with making, forging, altering, counterfeiting, uttering, publishing, and passing three checks and three contracts, and the jury brought a general verdict of guilty, the appellate court assumed they found defendant guilty of falsely making and counterfeiting all the instruments.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 878(2)—General verdict of guilty on six counts charging making, forging, altering, etc., six instruments without specifying acts done, and no objection made, held supported.

Where defendant was charged separately in six counts with making, forging, altering, counterfeiting, uttering, publishing, and passing three checks and three contracts, and the jury brought a general verdict without specifying which of the acts done were found as to each instrument, and no objection was made on ground of erroneous form or insufficiency of the verdict, and the evidence supported conviction for making and counterfeiting all the instruments, though uttering or passing of check and corresponding contract at the same time would have constituted but one offense, the conviction on the general verdict was upheld.

7. Forgery $\S$ 37—Instruments alleged to have been forged held admissible, whether or not they were enforceable.

On trial for forgery, instruments alleged to have been forged held admissible, whether or not they were unenforceable obligations, since whether an instrument is legally enforceable is immaterial to whether a person can be guilty of a crime of forging it.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 1144(16)—Where district attorney adopted theory that defendant caused forgery, though not personally signing, appellate court on appeal from conviction must presume jury believed district attorney's theory.

In prosecution for forgery, where the district attorney in argument stated that the prosecution did not adopt the theory that the defendant actually wrote the forged signatures, but claimed that he caused and procured the forgery, the appellate court, on appeal from a conviction, must presume that the jury reached its verdict in accordance with that theory, especially in view of trial court's instruction that they should find defendant guilty if he caused or procured the forgery.

9. Forgery $\S$ 21—Person causing or procuring forgery is guilty of forgery (Pen. Code, $\S$ 971).

Person causing or procuring a false name to be signed to an instrument, or aiding, abetting, encouraging, or assisting another to so forge the instrument, is guilty of forgery, in view of Pen. Code, $\S$ 971, providing that all persons concerned in committing felony, whether they directly commit the offense, or aid and abet, are punishable as principals.

10. Forgery $\S$ 8—Whether signatures are forgeries of names of existing or fictitious persons is immaterial.

In prosecution for forgery, whether signatures alleged to have been forged were of names of existing persons or were names of fictitious persons is immaterial.

11. Witnesses $\S$ 274(2)—It was proper to ask witnesses testifying to defendant's good reputation on forgery trial whether they had heard of defendant's jail sentence.

It was proper on forgery trial, on cross-examination, to ask witnesses who testified to defendant's good reputation whether or not they thought defendant's reputation was good after they had heard that defendant had been arrested and sentenced for petit larceny.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 722½—District attorney's remark in argument on forgery trial that defendant's reputation was good notwithstanding jail sentence held proper, where defendant's witnesses testified to good reputation, though they had heard of arrest and sentence for larceny.

District attorney's remark in argument on forgery trial that defendant's reputation was good, though he had served a sentence of 30 days in jail held proper, where on cross-examination some of defendant's witnesses, testifying to good reputation, said that they had heard that defendant had been arrested and sentenced for petit larceny.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Carl R. Gayle was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Faucett & Ring, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, J. Defendant was charged by information containing a number of separate counts, with the making, forging, altering, and counterfeiting of certain checks and contracts. The jury found him guilty of the crime of forgery, and from a judgment entered upon that verdict and from an order denying his motion for a new trial he has appealed.

The outstanding facts appearing in the record are that the defendant was a real estate salesman in Los Angeles, Cal., and was attempting to sell property owned or controlled by persons doing business under the name of Clear Lake Beach Company. He handed to said company three purported contracts of sale of lots in its subdivision. These contracts were signed, respectively, by Warburton, McLendon, and Martin, as purchasers, and by the defendant, as agent of the Clear Lake Beach Company, and each was accompanied by a check of the supposed purchaser for the first payment upon the land. Upon turning these contracts and checks over to his company, the defendant collected commissions upon two of them, amounting to $155. Later all the checks were returned by the banks upon which they were drawn, marked "No account," and the purported purchasers could not be located at the addresses given or elsewhere.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that as the contracts in question purported to be contracts for the sale of land in an unrecorded tract, and therefore were not enforceable at law, there could be no crime of forgery with reference to unenforceable obligations. This contention is disposed of by the case of People v. Munroe, 100 Cal. 664, 35 P. 326, 24 L. R. A. 33, 38 Am. St. Rep. 323, which considers the earlier cases relied upon by appellant and comes to the conclusion that—

"To declare the law to be that all contracts which are not enforceable, because against the policy of the law, are not the subject of forgery, would be offering a carte blanche to the professional forger of which he would not be slow to take advantage, and hereafter he would confine himself to the manufacture of spurious paper in the nature of contracts against public policy."

[2] The true test, as laid down in the case last cited, is whether or not it is possible to defraud by reason of the forgery or utterance. This rule has been followed in subsequent cases. People v. James, 110 Cal. 155, 42 P. 479; People v. McGlade, 139 Cal. 66, 72 P. 600.

[3-6] It is also contended that there is a fatal variance between the pleading and proof. Defendant was tried upon six counts of the information. These counts charged, separately, the making, forging, altering, counterfeiting, uttering, publishing, and passing of the three different checks and their corresponding contracts. Appellant's contention is that there were only three separate transactions; that each check was connected with a contract and the two were one inseparable transaction; and that, at most, the defendant could only be charged with three offenses and not with six. The form of the pleading is supported by the authority of People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, 513, and under the authority of People v. Ryan, 74 Cal. App. 125, 239 P. 419, the false making and forging of two separate instruments, although done at the same time, are separate and distinct offenses, although the passing or utterance of several forged instruments at the same time constitutes but one offense. Here the defendant was charged with the forgery of six separate and distinct instruments. A general verdict was returned which meets the situation here and we must assume, in support of the same, that the jury found the defendant guilty of falsely making and counterfeiting all of the instruments. No question was raised at the time of the return of the verdict as to its form or sufficiency in not indicating which of the acts charged as forgery had been committed by defendant with reference to each of the instruments. Had such an objection been made, the court, probably, would have returned the verdict to the jury and directed a reconsideration of it, as provided by section 1161 of the Penal Code. The jury was justified in finding that the defendant had falsely made and counterfeited all the instruments, for while the handwriting expert produced by the prosecution did not state, positively, that the handwriting upon all the documents was that of defendant, nevertheless, the jury had a right to come to a conclusion independent of this expert opinion evidence, as it had an opportunity to examine the documents alleged to have been forged and the exemplars of the handwriting of defendant which were also in evidence and to make its own deductions therefrom.

[7] The basis of appellant's objection to the admission of the forged contracts and checks in evidence, i. e., that the contracts were void and not the subject of forgery, has been discussed hereinbefore.

[8] It is also vigorously contended that the prosecution made no claim that defendant had actually written the signatures upon any of the instruments, and therefore the verdict and judgment are improper. This contention is made because of certain language used by the district attorney in presenting his case to the jury. In reviewing the evidence, the district attorney correctly stated that Mr. Carlson, the handwriting expert called by the prosecution, had been unwilling to state positively that the handwriting upon the three checks was the handwriting shown by the exemplars of the defendant's handwriting, but that he had been of the positive opinion that the three checks were signed by the same person. The district attorney called attention to the fact that, if the three checks were signed by the same hand, then it was apparent that defendant had not made bona fide sales of the three lots, and that the prosecution did not adopt the theory that defendant actually wrote the forged signatures, but that it was claimed by the prosecution that somebody, at the instigation of Gayle and with his knowledge and consent and acting upon his advice, wrote the checks, and that thereafter defendant took them to the company and received his commissions, and that it was all done as a part of defendant's definite scheme and plan. In accordance with this theory of the case, we must presume the jury reached its verdict, for the trial court gave an instruction to the effect that, if the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant caused or procured to be signed the name of another person as alleged in the information, or aided, abetted, encouraged, or assisted another to sign the name of said person thereto, knowing he had no authority so to do, they should find the defendant guilty.

[9, 10] This instruction stated the law, for all persons concerned in the commission of a felony, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, though not present, are punishable as principals. Section 971, Pen. Code. Whether the signatures in question were forgeries of names of existing persons or whether they were names of fictitious persons is immaterial under our present law. People v. Whitaker, 68 Cal. App. 7, 228 P. 376; People v. Jones, 12 Cal. App. 129, 106 P. 724; People v. Lucas, 67 Cal. App. 452, 227 P. 709.

[11, 12] The only other matter that requires discussion upon this appeal is the assignment as prejudicial error of a remark made by the district attorney in his closing address to the jury. Defendant had called witnesses who testified that his reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity was good. Upon cross-examination, they were asked if they had heard that defendant had been arrested for petit larceny and had served a sentence in jail as a result thereof. Some of them answered in the affirmative. In commenting upon the testimony of these witnesses, the district attorney remarked to the jury that defendant's reputation was good, although he had served a sentence of 30 days in jail. Objection was immediately made and the district attorney modified his remark by stating that he was merely making the remark in connection with defendant's reputation. The trial court then and there instructed the jury that the remark was not evidence of the fact itself. As restricted by the district attorney and by the trial court, the statement was unobjectionable. It was proper to ask the witnesses who had testified to the good reputation of defendant whether or not they entertained their opinions after having heard that defendant had been confined in jail for petit larceny and when it appeared from their replies that they had heard of the incident mentioned and, nevertheless, thought defendant's reputation was good, it was proper for the district attorney to remark upon the incongruity of the testimony.

No further discussion of the points raised upon appeal is necessary. No substantial or prejudicial error appears in the record and the guilt of the defendant appears therefrom beyond a reasonable doubt.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ETIENNE v. KENDALL. (S. F. 11529.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1927.

1. Corporations $\S$ 121(5)—Evidence held to sustain findings that representations of seller of mining stock as to tonnage of mine and cost of extracting minerals were mere statements of opinion.

In action to rescind contract for purchase of shares of stock in mining corporation on ground that defendant falsely represented tonnage of ore in mine and cost of extracting minerals, evidence held to sustain findings that defendant's statements were opinions only and were treated as such by plaintiff.

2. Contracts $\S$ 94(1)—Truth of any one of material misrepresentations alleged in complaint for rescission will entitle aggrieved party to judgment.

If any one of material misrepresentations, upon which complaint for rescission of contract is based, is true and other elements entitling party to rescission are present, party aggrieved is entitled to judgment.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1170(3)—Admission in answer of some of misrepresentations alleged, by failure to deny misrepresentations separately in action for rescission, held not ground for reversal where plaintiff was not prejudiced (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

In action to rescind contract for purchase of mining stock on ground of misrepresentations, admission of some of misrepresentations by answer which failed to deny each representation separately held not ground for reversal of judgment for defendant, under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, where defect in pleadings was not called to attention of trial court and where plaintiff received fair and impartial trial and was not prejudiced.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1170(3)—To avoid judgment for error in pleadings, appellant must show miscarriage of justice resulted (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

When attack upon judgment is based upon error in pleadings, burden is on appellant to demonstrate that error complained of has resulted in miscarriage of justice, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1170(3)—Court may not reverse judgment for defect in pleadings without considering entire case, including evidence (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing no judgment shall be set aside for error as to any matter of pleading unless miscarriage of justice resulted, appellate court must examine entire case, including evidence, before reversing for defect in pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Victor Etienne, Jr., against Zeb Kendall. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. For opinion of District Court of Appeals, see 258 P. 435.

J. P. O'Brien, of San Francisco, for appellant.

William H. Metson and W. G. Deal, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This cause was transferred to the Supreme Court after decision and judgment in the Second Division of the District Court of Appeal of the First District, on petition of the appellant, who contends that the decision is in error in holding, first: That the representations made by the defendant were merely statements of his opinion, and not of facts; and, second, that the plaintiff treated the answer of the defendant as raising an issue as to the falsity of the representations charged. Upon a further consideration of the matter we are satisfied that under the facts of this particular case the opinion written by Mr. Justice Nourse, and concurred in by Mr. Justice Sturtevant and Mr. Presiding Justice Koford, disposed of those matters correctly.

The opinion is, therefore, adopted as the opinion of this court:

"Plaintiff sued for the rescission of a contract for the purchase of shares of stock in a mining corporation, alleging fraudulent misrepresentations as an inducement to the execution of the contract. Judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

"The complaint alleged that on November 21, 1921, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into a written agreement wherein the plaintiff agreed to purchase and the defendant agreed to sell 250,000 shares of the capital stock of the Consolidated Virginia Mining Company, a corporation, for the total purchase price of $152,005; that upon the execution of the agreement the sum of $20,822.25 was paid by the plaintiff to the defendant in cash and at the same time plaintiff delivered to the defendant his promissory note for the balance, secured by the shares of stock covered by the purchase and also by other collateral; that for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to enter into said agreement the defendant represented to him that the said corporation 'contained known ores and minerals and ore bodies situate in the so-called 'Old Bonanza stopes,' in said mine, and between the 1,500 and 1,600 foot levels, in said mine, amounting to 2,000,000 tons of ores and minerals, that were valued at from $20 to $25 per ton; that all of said ores, minerals and ore bodies, could be mined, extracted, and reduced at a cost not exceeding $3 per ton; and that within a very short time thereafter the stock of said corporation would greatly increase in value and large dividends thereon would be paid; 'that the representations so made, by the defendant, to the plaintiff, as aforesaid, were and are untrue, and were then known to the defendant to be false and untrue, and the said representations were fraudulently made, by the defendant, with the intent to mislead and deceive the plaintiff, and to induce him to enter into the agreement, aforesaid;' that the plaintiff, believing and fully relying upon said representations, was induced to enter into said agreement because of them; that the plaintiff did not discover the falsity of said representations until about July 30, 1923, and that upon discovering the facts which entitled him to rescind said agreement he immediately gave notice of rescission thereof to the defendant; that the defendant for many years past has been a stock broker and engaged in the business of promoting, operating and dealing in mining properties, but that the plaintiff was practically unfamiliar with the business of mining or the manipulation of the stocks of mining corporations. The answer alleged that for some time prior to the execution of the agreement the plaintiff had become interested in the purchase of mining stocks of corporations operating in the vicinity of the Consolidated Virginia and had urged the defendant to sell to him some of the stock of the latter company believing that because of renewed activity of operations in that locality the stock of the Consolidated Virginia would enhance in value; that the plaintiff had been to Virginia City, Nev., where the properties of these corporations were located, and had familiarized himself with the Consolidated Virginia mine and with other properties in the immediate neighborhood; that the stock was sold to the plaintiff at the latter's solicitation and upon the basis of quotations then made on the San Francisco Stock Exchange. The answer further denied that the 'defendant estimated or represented to the plaintiff the amount or value of said ores described in said complaint, or at all, or made any representations or inducements that led the plaintiff to purchase any of said stock, or at all.' The answer further denied that the defendant 'represented to the plaintiff that the Old Bonanza stopes in said mine between the 1,500 and 1,600 foot levels contained ore amounting to 2,000,000 tons; that said ore was valued at $20 to $25 per ton; that said ore minerals and ore bodies could be mined and extracted at a cost of $3 per ton; that dividends would be paid; or at all made any representations or extended any inducements to plaintiff of any nature relative to the purchase by the plaintiff of any stock in said company.'

[1] "On this appeal it is contended on behalf of appellant that the decision is not sustained by the evidence; that the decision is against law; that the decision does not sustain the judgment; and that the judgment is erroneous and against law. Although on the face of the briefs it appears that four separate points are raised in the attack upon the judgment, there is but one, as all four points advanced are really an attack upon the nature of the denials in the answer. In reference to the first three charges of fraudulent representations—the tonnage in the Bonanza stopes, the value thereof and the average cost of extracting and treating the ore therefrom—the trial court found that the respondent did inform the appellant that the old Bonanza stopes contained approximately 2,000,000 tons of ore of a value of $20 to $25 a ton, but that in this connection the appellant knew that the respondent had no information as to the amount of the tonnage or the value of the ore, but was merely giving an estimate or opinion based upon information given him by others, and that there was no evidence that the ore in said stopes did not amount to said quantity or that it was not of said value. The court expressly found that it was not true that there was not 2,000,000 tons of ore in said stopes of the value of $20 to $25 per ton. It was further found that the respondent told the appellant that with improved facilities for treating ore at the mine the ore taken from said stopes could be extracted and reduced at a cost of about $3 per ton, and that under such circumstances large profits would result from the operation of said mine and that the dividends to be paid upon said stock would greatly increase. In this connection, however, it was found that these statements were also opinions only, were understood as such by the appellant, and were not treated by him as representations of fact. These findings were amply supported by the evidence. The properties of the Consolidated Virginia had been operated for a period of about 50 years prior to the execution of the contract. The old Bonanza stopes were known to have contained much valuable ore, but because of a fire which occurred therein in the year 1878 they had been bulkheaded off and had not been mined. The opinion had been freely expressed by those familiar with the conditions of the mine that these stopes would run 2,000,000 or more tons of ore of a value of $20 to $25 a ton. The problem which confronted those interested in the operation of the mine was to extract this ore, and the appellant and others interested in the affairs of the company entered upon this project in anticipation of procuring this large body of ore. However, some time after the execution of the contract, when the stopes were opened for the purpose of extracting the ore, operations were stopped because of a recurring fire. There is really no conflict in the evidence which goes to support these findings of the trial court. In fact, the appellant frankly stated that he had no information as to the quantity of ore or its value or as to the cost of extracting and treating it if the proposed new mill and improved facilities were put in operation.

[2, 3] "As we have said, the real ground advanced by the appellant on this appeal is that, because of the character of the denials in the answer, the falsity of representations charged in the complaint was admitted, that, therefore, the findings should have been in accord with the admissions of the pleading rather than upon the evidence adduced at the trial, and, consequently, the decision is against law and does not sustain the judgment. The theory of the appellant is that as the complaint alleged misrepresentations in respect to the quantity and quality of the minerals contained in the Old Bonanza stopes and the cost of mining and reducing said ores and alleged that each of said representations was false and known to be false by the defendant, while the answer denied these allegations in the language of the complaint and did not deny in the disjunctive that each alleged representation was false or that the respondent knew each to be false or that each of such representations was made with intent to mislead and deceive appellant, or that appellant acted or relied upon any one of said representations or was misled or deceived by any one of them, the answer must be treated as an admission of any one of the alleged false representations. From this it is argued, in accordance with the well-settled rule, that if any one of the material representations upon which the complaint for rescission is based is true and the other elements entitling a party to a rescission are present the party aggrieved is entitled to judgment. 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) § 880.

"If the appellant had moved for judgment upon the pleadings upon the ground of respondent's failure to specifically deny the allegations of the complaint noted there would be some merit in his attack upon the answer. However, he was not content to do this, but proceeded to trial upon the theory that the issues were properly presented. This trial commenced on December 26, 1923, and after a number of witnesses were called, was continued to January 10, 1924, for further hearing. At this time other testimony was heard and another adjournment to January 24, 1924, was taken, at which time further testimony was taken all on the subject of the issues raised by the complaint, that is to say, the truth or falsity of the representations upon which the appellant relied and the truth or falsity of his allegations of lack of knowledge or means of knowledge of the conditions of the mine and the quantity and value of the ore bodies located therein. Throughout the trial no objection was made to the admission of any of this evidence, and no suggestion was made until the opening brief was filed on this appeal that any of the facts alleged in the complaint were admitted by the answer.

[4, 5] "The cause having been tried upon the theory that the issues were properly pleaded, we are now asked to reverse the judgment for the sole reason of an error in the answer which was not suggested to the trial court at any stage of the proceeding. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution provides that: 'No judgment shall be set aside * * * for any error as to any matter of pleading * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.'

"Under the terms of this section when the attack upon the judgment is based upon an error in the pleadings, it is incumbent upon the appellant to demonstrate before the appellate court that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. But even in such a case the appellate court may not reverse the judgment except upon an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence. Where, therefore, upon an examination of the evidence, the appellate court is satisfied that the error complained of has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, but that in fact, it has not affected the substantial rights of the appellant in any particular it would be a distinct violation of this section of the Constitution to reverse the judgment solely upon the ground of the error occurring in the pleadings. Our examination of the record here discloses that the appellant suffered no prejudice because of any defect in respondent's pleading, but that to the contrary the pleading was treated as having fully tendered the issues to be tried by the trial court, and that after a fair and impartial trial of those issues the trial court found against the appellant upon substantial evidence, which in all essential matters was uncontradicted."

For the foregoing reason, the judgment is affirmed.

In re FISHER'S ESTATE. (L. A. 8906.)

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1927.

1. Wills ⚡52(1)—Law presumes testator was sane, and contestant must show incapacity when will was executed.

Court will presume that testator was sane, and the burden is on contestant to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the testator was of unsound mind at time when he executed will.

2. Wills ⚡53(2)—Evidence of testator's mental condition before and after execution of will is admissible as bearing on capacity at time of execution.

In a will contest, where testator is claimed to have been of unsound mind, evidence of his mental condition both before and after execution of will is relevant and admissible as shedding light upon his mental capacity at the time when he executed the will.

3. Wills ⚡53(7)—Evidence of use of liquors alleged to destroy testamentary capacity before and after execution of will and of effect thereof is admissible if revealing capacity when will was executed.

In will contest, where testator is claimed to have been of unsound mind when he executed will because of long and intemperate use of alcoholic liquors, evidence of his use thereof both before and after the execution of the will and of the effect upon his mind is admissible so far as it tends to reveal his mental condition at the time of the execution of the will.

4. Wills ⚡52(1)—Intemperate use of liquors, however long continued, raises no presumption of testamentary incapacity.

Fact that testator habitually indulged in intemperate use of alcoholic liquors raises no presumption that the habit destroyed testamentary capacity, no matter how long the habit is shown to have continued, but proof of incapacity by reason thereof is necessary.

5. Wills ⚡53(3)—Where testator is claimed to have lost testamentary capacity from use of alcoholic beverages, evidence of commitment to state hospital for inebriety is admissible (Pol. Code, § 2185c).

In will contest, where testator is claimed to have lost testamentary capacity from habitual intemperate use of alcoholic beverages, evidence that testator was committed to state hospital for inebriety, under Pol. Code, § 2185c, providing for commitment of persons addicted to intemperate use of stimulants so far as to have lost the power of self-control or who are subject to inebriety, held admissible in proof of intemperate use of liquors.

6. Wills ⚡53(3)—Commitment of testator to state hospital for inebriety two years before execution of will held not too remote on question of testamentary capacity (Pol. Code, § 2185c).

In a will contest, where testator's use of alcoholic liquors was claimed to have destroyed his testamentary powers, his commitment to state hospital for inebriety two years before execution of will, under Pol. Code, § 2185c, held not too remote to be shown.

7. Wills ⚡55(1)—Testator's commitment to state hospital for inebriety is not prima facie evidence of permanent impairment of mental faculties (Pol. Code, § 2185c).

Mental disorder is presumed to continue only where it has become settled, and fact that testator was committed to state hospital for inebriety under Pol. Code, § 2185c, is not even prima facie evidence that use of alcoholic liquors caused permanent impairment of mental faculties.

8. Wills ⚡52(4)—That testator committed to state hospital for inebriety was victim of liquor habit when committed raises no presumption that habit persisted thereafter (Pol. Code, § 2185c).

In a will contest, where testamentary capacity is attacked on ground of intemperate use of alcoholic liquors, fact that when testator was committed to state hospital for inebriety under Pol. Code, § 2185c, he was a victim of the liquor habit raises no presumption that the habit persisted thereafter.

9. Wills ⚡384—Excluding evidence of testamentary incapacity held harmless, where if admitted proof would still have been insufficient to sustain finding of incapacity (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Where testator's use of alcoholic liquors was claimed to have destroyed his testamentary capacity, exclusion of evidence of commitment to state hospital for inebriety under Pol. Code, § 2185c, and of other competent evidence of incapacity, held harmless error under Const. art.

6, § 41½, where, giving the fullest effect to the excluded evidence, the facts shown would still have been insufficient as a matter of law to sustain a finding of incapacity.

10. Wills ⚡324(2)—Evidence held not to show as a matter of law that decedent was testamentarily incompetent.

Evidence held insufficient as matter of law to show that use of intoxicants by decedent had rendered him testamentarily incompetent.

11. Evidence 498½—Court has wide discretion in determining whether witness can express opinion respecting sanity as intimate acquaintance (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10).

Trial court is vested with a wide discretion in determining whether witness has qualified himself to give his opinion respecting the mental sanity of another by reason of being an intimate acquaintance within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10.

12. Evidence ⚡474(4)—Policeman who saw testator frequently in course of duties held qualified as intimate acquaintance to give opinion of sanity (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10).

Where police officer in course of duties saw testator, addicted to use of alcoholic liquors, off and on almost every evening during May, 1919, and made him go home, arrested him on one occasion, and saw him less frequently in 1920, he was qualified to express his opinion as to testator's sanity in 1919 as an intimate acquaintance, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. D. Murphy, Judge.

Application by the Security Trust & Savings Bank of the City of Los Angeles for the probate of the holographic will of Harry C. Fisher, deceased, opposed by Hart C. Fisher. From an order admitting the will to probate contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Fogel & Beman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Meserve & Meserve and Clifford E. Hughes, all of Los Angeles (Timon E. Owens, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This is an appeal from an order admitting the will of decedent to probate. The Security Trust & Savings Bank of the city of Los Angeles filed a petition in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles for the probate of the holographic will of Harry C. Fisher, deceased, wherein it was named as executor. Said will was produced subsequent to the issuance of letters of administration to Hart C. Fisher, father of the decedent. The said father opposed the admission to probate of said will, which was dated August 12, 1919, alleging that said Harry C. Fisher was not of sound mind at the time he executed the purported will; that the instrument was not entirely written, dated, and signed in the handwriting of decedent; and that if executed at all by decedent it was procured by the undue influence of Josephine Anderson, his aunt, who was named as a beneficiary therein. At the hearing contestant introduced no evidence whatsoever in support of his charges that the instrument was not entirely written, dated, and signed by the decedent and that it was procured by the undue influence of decedent's aunt, but relied wholly upon decedent's unsoundness of mind as a ground of opposition to the admission of the will to probate. The contest being heard by the court without a jury, it found against contestant on all three issues and accordingly decreed that the will was entitled to be admitted to probate and directed that letters testamentary be issued to petitioner.

Contestant asserts that the trial court committed reversible error in refusing to permit him to introduce in evidence the record in a proceeding in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles taken under the provisions of section 2185c, Political Code, wherein decedent was committed to a state hospital for inebriety for a period of two years commencing June 21, 1917. It is contestant's contention that the order of commitment was a judicial determination that decedent was of unsound mind on the date of the order; that the presumption is that insanity judicially established continues until restoration to capacity, and that the evidence introduced by petitioner was insufficient to rebut the presumption of incompetency. It is further contended that the court erred in refusing to permit the witnesses offered by contestant to testify as to decedent's soundness of mind.

[1-4] The presumption of law is that a person is sane, and the burden is always upon the contestant to show affirmatively by a preponderance of evidence that the testator was of unsound mind at the very time of the execution of the will. Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45, and cases therein cited; 26 Cal. Jur. 635. Evidence of the testator's mental condition both before and after the execution of the instrument is relevant and admissible for the light that it sheds upon the soundness of his mind at the time of the execution of the will. Estate of Perkins, supra; In re Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 49 P. 172, 711; Estate of Barr, 69 Cal. App. 16, 230 P. 181. It appears from the testimony adduced on behalf of proponent, as well as from that of contestant, that decedent for several years before his death was addicted to the excessive use of alcoholic liquors and possessed confirmed habits of intoxication. Contestant makes no claim that decedent suffered from mental disability or unsoundness of mind as the result of any other cause or condition. Where the point is made that a decedent was of unsound mind at the time he executed his will because of long use of alcoholic liquors, evidence of such use both before and after the execution of the will and of the effect thereof upon his mind is admissible in so far as it tends to reveal his mental condition at the time of the execution of the will. The intemperate use of alcoholic beverages, if continued for a sufficient length of time, may destroy testamentary capacity. Nevertheless, in the absence of proof that the intemperate use has actually destroyed testamentary capacity, no presumption will be indulged, however long continued the habit is shown to have been, that it has thus been destroyed.

[5-8] Contestant offered in evidence the records in a proceeding in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles in which decedent was committed to a state hospital for a period of two years commencing June 21, 1917, in pursuance of the provisions of section 2185c, Political Code. The trial court ruled that such record was inadmissible, on the theory that it related to decedent's condition at a time too remote from the date of the execution of the will, in 1919, and on the further ground that a commitment for inebriety is not an adjudication of mental incompetency. Section 2185c, Political Code, provides for the arrest and commitment to a state hospital by the judge of the superior court, after an examination and hearing in open court, of persons who are "so far addicted to the intemperate use of narcotics or stimulants as to have lost the power of self-control," or who are "subject to dipsomania or inebriety." Where a claim is made that an excessive addiction to alcoholic liquors for a period of years preceding the execution of the will has destroyed a testator's mental powers, we are of the opinion that the record of a commitment under section 2185c is admissible in proof of the intemperate use of such liquors, and the fact that the acts of intemperance for which the commitment was made took place at a period two years before the execution of the will did not render the record inadmissible on the theory that the acts therein recited were too remote to be weighed as evidence. The commitment in such cases is based on a determination that the subject is one who, when under the influence of liquor, loses the power of self-control, and that he is so frequently in such a condition as to require confinement. It is not, however, even prima facie evidence that the use of alcoholic liquors has caused a permanent impairment of the mental faculties and a loss of self-control which persists after the temporary effects of the liquor have passed away, nor will it be presumed from the fact that the subject of the commitment was a victim of the liquor habit at the time of the commitment that such habit persisted thereafter. It is only in those cases where the mental disease has become settled that the mental disorder is presumed to continue.

[9] If it be conceded that the record of the commitment proceedings was admissible in the instant case, its exclusion did not prejudice contestant's case and does not constitute reversible error, for, giving the fullest effect possible to said record and the evidence introduced by contestant as to testator's indulgence in the excessive use of alcoholic stimulants and to the evidence which, it is charged, was erroneously excluded, the proof would be wholly insufficient as a matter of law to sustain a finding of mental incompetency. Practically all of the facts as to the effect of the inordinate use of alcoholic liquors upon decedent were shown in evidence.

The witness Webb, who since 1916 has been chief of police of the city of Santa Monica, where decedent resided for a time, testified that in the course of the performance of his duties he had come in contact with decedent at various times between 1916 and the date of his death, when decedent was arrested for drunkenness; that he had been arrested on an average of "probably two or three times a year"; and that he had talked to decedent on the streets on "an average of once every two or three months," on which occasions he gave evidence of having been drinking, but was not sufficiently intoxicated to be arrested; that to his knowledge he had never seen him when he was sober. The witness also stated that he did not recall having seen him at any time during the year 1919, in which year the will was executed, and that the records of his department did not show that he had been in custody during that year. Appellant contends that this witness was qualified to testify as to the decedent's condition of mind under the rule permitting an intimate acquaintance to testify respecting the mental sanity of a person, the reason for the opinion being given (section 1870, subd. 10, Code Civ. Proc.), and that the trial court erred in sustaining objections to certain questions put to this witness. As a matter of fact said witness was permitted to testify to all matters within his knowledge, over the objection of opposing counsel. The following excerpt from the testimony of said witness shows the extent and basis for his knowledge on the issue of decedent's soundness of mind:

"The Court: He has already said he was incompetent. Let's find out what was the reason. What did you mean by 'incompetent'? That a man can't transact business at any time? Do you think he was continually insane? A. Well; he was continually intoxicated, I would say, under the influence of liquor.

"Q. That is not what you are asked at all. A. And at times we brought the man in, he talked like a wild man.

"Q. That is not the question here. The question at issue here is whether he was insane or sane. A. I can't testify to that, because I am not a medical man.

"Q. The question is whether in your judgment the man was sane or insane. A. In my judgment, your honor, I would say the man was insane.

"Q. All the time? A. No; I wouldn't state that. Mr. Meserve (Attorney for Petitioner): You mean he was insane when he was drunk? A. Yes; I would say he was insane drunk.

"Q. Insane drunk? A. Yes; and he wasn't competent.

"Q. That was due entirely to the use of liquor just before that time, when he got drunk? A. To the continual use of liquor; yes, sir.

"Q. Now, you kept him there in the jail until he got sober, didn't you? A. Yes.

"Q. And when he would get out he would be sober? A. Yes.

"Q. And then he wouldn't be insanely drunk when he was sober? A. Well; I would say the man—he was very intemperate. When we let him out—we continually had trouble with Harry Fisher.

"Q. Let's just get down to it. You stated you were chief of police. You kept him in jail until he was sober? A. Yes.

"Q. When you turned him out he was sober, wasn't he? A. Yes.

"Q. And he wasn't insane when he was sober, was he? A. No."

[10] This evidence is wholly insufficient to show that the use of intoxicants by decedent had rendered him testamentarily incompetent. The witness testified that he saw decedent once every two or three months, and on the occasions when he arrested him, which was two or three times a year, and that he never saw him sober except when he was released from jail. Proof that decedent was "incompetent" or "insane" when so intoxicated that it was necessary to arrest him or upon occasions when, in the words of the witness, he "only needed another drink to put him down and out," is entirely insufficient to show that decedent never enjoyed lucid intervals during which he was competent to execute a will. The witness himself testified that the decedent was not released from jail until sober and that he was not insane when sober.

The court also refused to permit the witness Davis, a police officer of the city of Venice, to state whether decedent was competent and of sound mind in 1919, on the ground that it had not been shown that said Davis was qualified as an intimate acquaintance. Davis stated that in the course of his duties he saw decedent "off and on almost every evening" during May, 1919; that he made him go home, put him on the car and talked to him "just long enough to get him across the line into Santa Monica"; that he arrested him on one occasion; and that he saw him less frequently in 1920.

Proponent's objections to the testimony of C. K. Pierce, a patrolman connected with the Santa Monica police department, were sustained by the court after said witness stated that he had never met decedent until August, 1921, two years after the will was executed. Although, as pointed out above, evidence of a testator's mental condition subsequent to the execution of the will is generally admissible, the court, in sustaining the objection to Pierce's testimony, no doubt acted under the apprehension that said witness' acquaintance with decedent was similar in nature to that of Officers Webb and Davis, and that any testimony which he might offer would relate to decedent's state of mind when his condition and conduct were such as to require the attention of officers of the law. Contestant made no offer to prove any other or different matters by said witness.

Wallace Braden, the only witness offered by contestant in addition to the three police officers to establish testator's unsoundness of mind, was shown to have resided in the flat next to that where decedent lived during 1916 and 1917. Said witness stated that after decedent moved away he saw him "some time during 1918" and in January or February, 1919, and on the day before his mother died, in May, 1919. The court sustained proponent's objection on the ground that the witness had not qualified as an intimate acquaintance and refused to permit him to state whether decedent was of sound mind. Thereupon counsel for contestant said: "That is all." No attempt was made to show that the witness had ever talked to decedent, or that they had had dealings with each other as neighbors, friends or acquaintances.

[11, 12] While the court is vested with wide discretion in determining whether a witness has brought himself within the intimate acquaintance rule. Section 1870, sud. 10, Code Civ. Proc.), we are of the opinion that some of the witnesses, particularly witness Davis, who were not permitted to express an opinion, were qualified to do so as to the mental sanity of decedent. The facts upon which their opinions must have been predicated were, however, fully stated to the court, and it is quite evident that an expression of opinion by them would not have been of sufficient added weight to have established testamentary incapacity at the very time the will was executed. If the case was a close one upon the evidence, a more serious question would be presented.

Neither contestant, who was the testator's father, nor the testator's brother, testified as to his sanity. Testator's aunt, a beneficiary under the will, with whom he resided a large portion of the time after the death of his mother and to the time of his own death, testified that testator was sane and competent and that he had not been intoxicated in her presence at any time during the summer of 1919. Herbert M. Haskell, a disinterested witness and an attorney who practiced law in this state for a number of years and later became a banker, testified that the testator consulted him soon after his mother's death as to the requirements for a valid will and as to whether it would be legal if drawn by himself; that he was competent at that time to make a will; that he saw him from six or seven to a dozen times during the ensuing two or three months and discussed with him literary subjects, and that decedent was a well-informed man; that he was of sound mind and competent to make a will, and that he did not observe a single thing in any of the conversations he had with him that would indicate that he was of unsound mind; that he was a clean-cut looking young chap who looked a good deal like a college man; and that he was rather favorably impressed with him personally.

The contestant was not prejudiced by the error of the court in refusing to admit the record of commitment in evidence nor by the ruling excluding the opinions of the witnesses above referred to. Every fact which from necessity must have formed the basis of the commitment and likewise the basis of the "reasons" of said witnesses had they been permitted to express an opinion, were fully before the court. The former habits of testator were not shown to have affected or influenced his testamentary act. "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of * * * the improper admission or rejection of evidence * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Article 6, § 4½, state Const. If the opinions of said witnesses were based upon the facts as detailed by them, the expression of their opinions thereon doubtless would not and should not have changed the decision as to the testamentary capacity of testator.

Judgment affirmed.

RIVERSIDE COUNTY v. TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. (L. A. 8250.)★

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Agriculture ☞11—County's unlawful entry by mistake on lands not included in notice to abate nuisance does not invalidate lien, where service was properly performed (Pol. Code, §§ 2322, 2322a, as amended by St. 1917, pp. 627, 631, §§ 1, 2).

That county made unlawful entry by mistake on lands not included in notice to abate nuisance, admitting that such entry would have been premature had it been made on lands specifically designated in notice, does not afford ground for invalidation of lien on lands on which service was performed, as provided by

Pol. Code, §§ 2322, 2322a, as amended by St. 1917, pp. 627, 631, §§ 1, 2.

2. Agriculture ☞11—Premature entry will not bar county's right to foreclose lien on landowner's failure to abate nuisance after statutory notice (Pol. Code, §§ 2322, 2322a, as amended by St. 1917, pp. 627, 631, §§ 1, 2).

Premature entry and partial performance would not, of itself, bar county as lien claimant from foreclosing lien on failure of landowner to abate nuisance within time prescribed by statutory notice, though county would lose claim for compensation for services prematurely performed, in view of Pol. Code, §§ 2322, 2322a, as amended by St. 1917, pp. 627, 631, §§ 1, 2.

3. Agriculture ☞11—Land not included in notice to owner to abate nuisance held properly excluded from burden imposed on land included.

Where street divided defendant's land and that on one side was not mentioned in notice to owner to abate nuisance, it was properly excluded from burden imposed on tract lying across street and included in notice.

4. Agriculture ☞11—Eradication of noxious weeds and extermination of ground squirrels for benefit of tract of land are presumed beneficial to its several parts (Pol. Code, §§ 2322, 2322a, as amended by St. 1917, pp. 627, 631, §§ 1, 2).

It must be presumed that services performed for benefit of entire tract of land by eradicating noxious weeds and exterminating ground squirrels, under Pol. Code, §§ 2322, 2322a, as amended by St. 1917, pp. 627, 631, §§ 1, 2, were beneficial to its several parts.

5. Agriculture ☞11—County held not entitled to enforce lien for extermination of ground squirrels (Pol. Code, §§ 2322, 2322a, as amended by St. 1917, pp. 627, 631, §§ 1, 2).

County held not entitled to enforce statutory lien for extermination of ground squirrels, under Pol. Code, §§ 2322, 2322a, as amended by St. 1917, pp. 627, 631, §§ 1, 2, where board of supervisors of county or other governing body did not determine in advance which of alternative systems or methods of procedure should be selected for extermination of such animal pests.

6. Agriculture ☞15—County's unenforceable claim for exterminating ground squirrels may be deducted from judgment to enforce lien for eradicating noxious weeds.

Where county was not entitled to enforce statutory lien for extermination of ground squirrels, such claim, being entirely separable from claim for eradication of noxious weeds, may be deducted from judgment to enforce lien for eradicating such weeds without injury to landowner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

Action by the County of Riverside against the Title Insurance & Trust Company to enforce a statutory lien for the eradication of noxious weeds and extermination of ground squirrels. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Rehearing denied: WASTE, C. J., and SIENK, J., voting for a rehearing.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2 (252 P. 776).

Woodruff & Shoemaker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Loyal C. Kelley and Albert H. Ford, Dist. Atty., both of Riverside, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal was taken by the defendant, Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, from a judgment entered in favor of the county of Riverside decreeing the foreclosure of a lien upon defendant's real property as security for the payment of a charge of $1,260.71, including interest and costs, on account of expenses and costs incurred by said county in the abatement of a nuisance after notice to and failure or refusal on the part of defendant to exterminate, destroy and eradicate from the soil of said real property a certain noxious weed known as Russian thistles, and ground squirrels, a common animal pest. Sections 2322, 2322a, c. 508, Stats. 1917. By the second amended complaint filed in the court below it was alleged that defendant, corporation, was the owner of a tract of land situated in the county of Riverside, this state, particularly described as "lots 1 to 12, inclusive; lots 29 to 50, inclusive; lots 67 to 84, inclusive; lots 114 to 119, inclusive; lots 124 to 125, inclusive, of Fairhaven Farms, West Riverside, as shown by map on file in Book 6, page 2 of Maps, Records of Riverside County." The 60 lots above enumerated contain 5 acres each, totaling 300 acres, and lay north of Limonite street, while the remaining 50 acres, which according to the map on file are subdivided into 10 lots of 5 acres each, lie south of said street, 8 of which abut thereon. The court found that said 300 acres lying north of said street, notwithstanding the legal subdivisions into which they had been mapped, constituted a single tract or parcel of land. As a matter of fact, no contention is made that there are any physical lines or marks or objects separating one lot from another in said 300-acre tract against which the lien herein is asserted. It appears that Limonite street which forms the southern boundary of said 300-acre tract was not merely a platted street, but it was actually in use as a thoroughfare. It also appears that a portion of the exterior limits is partially marked by a fence. But we do not regard this as a circumstance of great moment, inasmuch as said lots are specifically referred to by numbers in both the notice to abate the nuisance and in the notice of lien. The argument of appellant is that the entire acreage of said Fairhaven Farms tract constitutes one entity and no part is severable from another and that an entry upon any one lot is an entry upon the whole. Therefore, it is argued, the entry by the county upon the 10 lots south of Limonite street having been made without authority of law, for the reason that it was made before the expiration of the 10-days' period allowed by law to the owner to abate the nuisance, the proceedings taken by the horticultural commissioner commanding the owner to exterminate said ground squirrels and destroy the Russian thistles growing on said lands are invalid in toto and must fall, even though the services prematurely performed were rendered upon said 10 lots which were neither included in the notice to abate the nuisance nor in the notice of lien filed thereafter. The rule of in invitum which generally applies in cases of this class does not carry with it such far-reaching nullifying power. It is true that the county by its agent did enter upon said 10 lots south of Limonite street and performed service thereon on the assumption that it was acting under authority of law, but its acts were wholly unauthorized, and the court so found and refused to allow the county's claim for services performed on said 10 lots so entered upon. We are not able to see, as appellant seems to see, how an unauthorized entry and performance of services upon lands not sought to be charged with a lien can affect or nullify the right of lien upon a specifically described tract of land in the absence of a material defect in procedure or the violation of some substantial right of the owner of said specifically described body or tract of land. As observed above, the services charged against appellant's lands began on July 24, 1919, a period incontrovertibly beyond the time fixed by statute as a limitation upon the owner's right to avail himself of the privilege of abating the nuisance.

[1] The fact that the county made an unlawful entry by mistake upon lands not included in the notice to abate a nuisance, admitting that said entry would have been premature had it been made upon the lands specifically designated in the notice, does not afford the slightest ground for the invalidation of the lien upon the lands upon which service was performed as provided by law. The notice to abate the nuisance was posted on the same day that notice was deposited in the mail, to wit, July 8th, on the 300-acre tract at a place near Limonite street where it was most likely to give notice to the owner and the public. The services charged against said 300-acre tract were reckoned from and included July 24, 1919, which was 2 days after the expiration of the period when the right to enter said lands and perform the duty imposed upon the owner accrued to the county.

[2] We do not understand that a premature entry and partial performance would, of itself, constitute a bar to the right of the lien claimant to foreclose its lien upon the failure of the owner to perform within the time prescribed by a statutory notice. In such a case the county would lose its claim for compensation for services prematurely performed, but a premature entry and partial performance would not ipso facto invalidate the lien for services thereafter rendered within the period allowed by law. By the notice 10 days were granted to the landowner, dating from July 8, 1919, to abate the nuisance. The work for which compensation was allowed was for labor done after the expiration of the 10-day period. This was alleged, proved, and found by the court. Subdivision 7, § 2322a, Political Code, provides that the expense of abating the nuisance shall become a lien on the property from which said nuisance has been removed. "* * * Notice of such lien shall be filed and recorded in the office of the county recorder * * * within 30 days after the right to the said lien has accrued and a copy" mailed to the owner. The notice of lien was filed within the statutory time. It contains an error as to the exact date the labor was performed, but so far as the requirements of the statute are concerned it need not have done more than to give notice that a lien was claimed on the described premises for the abatement of the nuisance filed within 30 days after the right to the lien accrued. The important question is that notice of lien should state that a lien is claimed, and that notice has been filed within 30 days after the lien accrued. The notice to abate the nuisance was duly posted and served, making allowance for the full statutory time that appellant was entitled to by reason of its place of business being 60 miles distant from Riverside, before the services sued on were commenced.

[3] In its petition for a hearing by this court appellant contended that the 70 lots described in the second amended complaint were contiguous, thereby forming a whole. We above pointed out the severability of the 10 lots south of Limonite street from the area on the northerly side of said street, but be that as it may, said 10 lots were not included by description or mention in any way in the notice to the owner to abate the nuisance and were not proceeded against by the action nor were they regarded as in any way contributing to said nuisance. This would be a sufficient reason for excluding them from the burden imposed upon the tract lying north of said street.

[4] If the argument of appellant as to the contiguity of the plotted lots forming one parcel or tract of land be sound, then it must follow that its claim of exemption of 16 of said plotted lots included in the 300-acre tract, upon which it is claimed no labor was actually done, must fall. Viewed upon the ground none of said 16 lots were distinguishable from any other lots contained in the area. It must be presumed that services performed for the benefit of an entire tract were beneficial to its several parts. Especially is this true where, as here, the subject-matter both animate and inanimate, is ambulatory in character.

[5] The court made a separate finding that the expense incurred in exterminating ground squirrels on said premises, amounting to the sum of $15, was incidental and secondary to the destruction of Russian thistles. Under the authority of County of San Benito v. Wapple, 188 Cal. 423, 205 P. 673, this finding cannot stand. It was therein held that by the amendment of chapter 4b, Political Code, § 2322 et seq. (Stats. 1917, p. 627), providing for an alternative system of proceedings for the destruction of ground squirrels, in view of the dual system provided by statute, vesting horticultural commissioners and local boards of health or health officers, respectively, with the power of providing for the destruction of ground squirrels and charging the lands infested by them with a lien for the expense of so doing, it was a necessary condition precedent to the action of said horticultural commissioners or local boards of health that the board of supervisors of the county or other governing body determine in advance which of the alternative systems or methods of procedure should be selected for the extermination of said animal pests. In the instant case this requirement was not observed. The amended complaint contains an allegation, doubtless in an attempt to comply with the suggestion made in the above-cited case, and the court found, that the extermination of said ground squirrels was incidental and secondary to the destruction of Russian thistles. There is no evidence in the record, however, which seems to justify the finding that the destruction of one pest was the primary, and the other the secondary, object of the horticultural officer.

[6] There is absent from the amended complaint herein any averment that the proceedings taken by the horticultural commissioner or his deputed representative were preceded by any action on the part of the board of supervisors of the county of Riverside authorizing either of said officers to initiate the proceedings as to the extermination of ground squirrels. This finding and branch of the case is clearly severable from the other dealing with the destruction of Russian thistles and the latter branch remains unaffected by expunging from consideration said finding.

The foregoing disposes of the important points made by appellant, which, in our judgment, demand special consideration. Others discussed by counsel have been considered.

In conclusion, it is proper to state that the instant case is before us for hearing after decision by the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division 2, 252 P. 776, Mr. Justice Sturtevant writing the opinion. Upon a reconsideration of the arguments of counsel we are of the opinion that the conclusions reached by said District Court of Appeal are sound and properly indicate the judgment that should be rendered. The judgment therefore will be modified by deducting $15 from the principal amount contained in the judgment, and as so modified the judgment will stand affirmed. It is further ordered that respondent recover its costs.

PEOPLE v. MOUSE. (Cr. 1502.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 12, 1927.

As Modified, Oct. 17, 1927. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Criminal law ⚡97(1/2)—State has jurisdiction over all offenses committed within state, unless deprived of authority by United States Constitution or legislative enactment.

State of California has jurisdiction to punish all persons committing offenses against its penal laws within state, unless deprived of such authority by Constitution of United States or by express legislative enactment.

2. Criminal law ⚡97(4)—State is not precluded from possessing concurrent jurisdiction in case where United States government has jurisdiction (24 USCA § 137).

More fact that United States government has jurisdiction in given case does not itself preclude state government from also possessing concurrent jurisdiction; Rev. St. U. S. § 4835 (24 USCA § 137 [U. S. Comp. St. § 9279]), not being applicable.

3. United States ⚡3—Maintenance of national soldiers' home held not one of purposes for which lands, when taken, come, ipso facto, within exclusive jurisdiction of United States government (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8).

Under Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, limiting use of land required by United States government for erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings, maintenance of National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Sawtelle is not one of purposes for which lands, when taken, come, ipso facto, within exclusive jurisdiction of United States government.

4. United States ⚡3—Jurisdiction of United States is not exclusive over land purchased for purposes not named in Constitution, unless expressly so declared (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8).

When land is purchased by the United States government for purposes not among those named in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, jurisdiction of the United States is not exclusive unless expressly so declared.

5. United States ⚡3—Land over which Congress can exercise exclusive jurisdiction must not only be ceded by state, but must be accepted by Congress (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8).

For Congress to have power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over land purchased by it as provided by Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, such land must not only be ceded by particular state, but there must be an acceptance of same by Congress.

6. United States ⚡3—Creation of national soldiers' home by act of Congress does not make it part or representative of United States government.

More fact that National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, a corporation, was created by Congress, does not imply that such entity is part or representative of United States government.

7. United States ⚡3—State does not necessarily waive jurisdiction over land owned by national soldiers' home, organized under act of Congress, but not shown to be owned by United States (St. 1897, p. 51).

Ownership of land by National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, organized under act of Congress, not shown to be in the United States, does not necessarily result in waiver by state government of jurisdiction over such land, as provided by St. 1897, p. 51, expressly limiting cession of exclusive jurisdiction to lands held by United States government for "military purposes or defense."

8. United States ⚡3—Maintenance of national soldiers' home held not within purpose of law providing for cession of exclusive jurisdiction by state to lands occupied by United States for military purposes (St. 1897, p. 51).

Under St. 1897, p. 51, expressly limiting cession of exclusive jurisdiction by state to lands held, occupied, or reserved by United States government for military purposes, maintenance of National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers did not fall within scope of such law.

9. Criminal law ⚡97(4)—State court properly assumed jurisdiction over offense committed by inmate of national soldiers' home within its domains; federal government not having exclusive jurisdiction thereafter.

Where land occupied by National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, organized under act of Congress, was not conveyed to federal government or accepted by it, federal government did not have exclusive jurisdiction over such land, and state court properly assumed jurisdiction over offense against penal laws of state committed by inmate of home within its domains.

10. Sodomy ⚡6—Evidence held to authorize conviction of defendant for committing infamous crime against nature.

In prosecution for committing infamous crime against nature, evidence was sufficient to authorize jury to convict defendant.

11. Criminal law ⚡1023(8)—Appeal does not lie from order denying motion in arrest of judgment.

Law does not provide for appeal from order denying motion in arrest of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

William M. Mouse was convicted of an infamous crime against nature, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Catherine A. McKenna and J. Irving McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was charged by information consisting of two counts with having committed the infamous crime against nature, a felony, in the county of Los Angeles, on the 20th day of November, 1926, and on the 1st day of January, 1927. Thereafter, and on February 10, 1927, the appellant pleaded guilty to the first count of the information and applied for probation, whereupon the trial court continued the pronouncing of judgment and sentence as to the first count, and plea to the second count until the 24th day of February, 1927. Upon the date last mentioned, the defendant was permitted to withdraw his plea of guilty, and to enter a plea of not guilty, to the first count, his trial was set for March 8, 1927, as to both counts, and he was then tried by a jury and was convicted of having committed both offenses as charged. Motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were presented and denied, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and from each of said orders.

It appeared that one of the offenses alleged to have been committed by appellant occurred within the boundaries of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Sawtelle, and that the other was committed outside its grounds. Appellant was an inmate of the home, and the principal contention of appellant is that the superior court of the state of California was without jurisdiction to try him for any offense committed within the domain of the soldiers' home, because it is insisted the government of the United States has exclusive jurisdiction to punish for all offenses committed therein.

[1-9] There can be no doubt that the state of California has jurisdiction to punish all persons committing offenses against its penal laws within the state, unless deprived of such authority by the Constitution of the United States or by express legislative enactment. In citing authorities in an attempt to establish his theory, appellant has, we think, overlooked certain important considerations. The mere fact that the United States government has jurisdiction in a given case does not in itself argue against the state government also possessing a concurrent jurisdiction; hence the citation of section 4835 of the United States Revised Statutes (Barnes' Federal Code, § 8821 [24 USCA § 137; U. S. Comp. St. § 9279]) is of little value. The maintenance of a soldiers' home is not one of the purposes named in article 1, § 8, of the Constitution, for which lands, when taken, come, ipso facto, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States government, and, when land is purchased by the general government for purposes not among those named, the jurisdiction of the United States is not exclusive unless expressly so declared. In re Kelly (C. C.) 71 F. 545. In order that Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over land purchased by it, as provided by section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, such land must not only be ceded by the particular state, but there must be an acceptance of the same by Congress. In this case the record fails to show any acceptance by the federal government of the property involved or any conveyance to the general government by the state. Deeds were introduced in evidence showing a conveyance by John P. Jones and Arcadia B. de Baker to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, a corporation. However, in passing it might be said that section 8 of article 1 apparently has no application to the maintenance of a home for disabled soldiers, but it expressly limits its uses to those for the "erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings." The mere fact that the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, a corporation, was created by an act of Congress does not imply that such entity is a part, or is representative, of the United States government. Nor does the ownership of land by said corporation necessarily result in a waiver by the state government of jurisdiction as provided by the Statutes of 1897, at page 51. This law expressly limits its cession of exclusive jurisdiction to lands held, occupied, or reserved by the government of the United States for "military purposes or defense." Here the purposes do not fall within the scope of this law nor is the ownership shown to be in the United States. That ownership by the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, a corporation, is not the same as by the government of the United States was held in Re Kelly, supra, which authority is decisive of this appeal. In the matter of upholding the jurisdiction of the state courts the present case is even stronger than that presented by In re Kelly, since there the land was conveyed directly to the government, which in turn conveyed to the corporation, whereas here there is no evidence tending to show that the state or the United States had any direct or indirect part in the conveyance, or that the state renounced, or the United States accepted, any interest in the lands, or jurisdiction over offenses committed thereon.

[10] The only remaining point advanced by the appellant is an asserted insufficiency of evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment, but there is no merit in this contention, and it is apparently not urged with great confidence. Two young boys testified to the acts alleged in the information, an eyewitness to one of the offenses testified that he saw it committed, and an officer swore that appellant admitted one of them at the time of his arrest. Upon the trial, the defendant denied his connection with either offense, and produced several character witnesses. From all of this evidence the jury, under the instructions of the trial court, determined that the defendant was guilty in each instance. Upon the record thus presented, the judgment and orders appealed from will not be disturbed.

[11] No provision is made by law for an appeal from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment.

The judgment and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

VENTURA COUNTY v. BARRY, County Assessor. (Civ. 5718.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 3, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 31, 1927.

1. Statutes $\S$ 170—Repeal of special act relating to assessor's fees in certain county did not revive as to such county former general law (Pol. Code, $\S$ 4252, par. 6, and $\S$ 4290).

The repeal of a special act (Pol. Code, $\S$ 4252, par. 6) relating to assessor's fees in a certain county, by St. 1925, p. 70, did not automatically revive as to such county the general statute on the same subject (Pol. Code, $\S$ 4290), which had been repealed as to said county by the enactment of the special statute.

2. Taxation $\S$ 310—Special law relating to fees in certain county repealed general law as to that county in so far as laws were inconsistent (Pol. Code, $\S$ 4252, par. 6, and $\S$ 4290).

Special law (Pol. Code, $\S$ 4252, par. 6) relative to the fees of the county assessor in a certain county held to repeal the provisions of a general law (section 4290) relating to the same subject, in so far as the two were inconsistent.

Application by the County of Ventura for a writ of mandate to be directed to Jasper Barry, Assessor of Ventura County, to require him to pay into the county treasury the fees collected, under Pol. Code, $\S$ 4290, on unsecured personal property taxes. Writ granted.

James C. Hollingsworth, of Ventura, for petitioner.

Clarke & Bowker and Walter E. Barry, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. The question involved in this application for a writ of mandate is whether or not the respondent is entitled to collect fees in accordance with the provisions of section 4290 of the Political Code, to wit, 6 per cent. of the total amount received by him as such assessor as unsecured taxes levied on personal property taxed within Ventura county.

Respondent's contention is that, although the amendment in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 1209) to section 4252 of the Political Code swept away the provisions contained in section 4290 of the Political Code, in so far as fees and commissions of the assessor on personal property taxes collected is concerned in Ventura county, the subsequent "repeal" of section 4252 of the Political Code (by amendment [St. 1925, p. 70] omitting certain provisions thereof) would have the effect of reviving or reinstating section 4290 of the Political Code so as to enable such assessor to retain the 6 per cent. claimed by him on unsecured personal property tax collections.

[1] We are of the opinion that section 4290 of the Political Code has never been revived or re-enacted since its repeal, in so far as it affects such assessor, by the 1923 amendment to section 4252 of the Political Code. As was said in People v. Hunt, 41 Cal. at page 439:

"The repeal of an act repealing a former act does not revive the former act, or give it any force and effect. This result can be accomplished only by the re-enactment of the former act. The repeal of the act of 1864 [St. 1863-64, p. 243] by section 3 of the act of 1868 [St. 1867-68, p. 448] worked the same result as would an act directly repealing the act of 1864."

See, also, Thomason v. Ruggles, 69 Cal. 465, 11 P. 20.

[2] Section 4290 of the Political Code is a general act, while section 4252 is an act affecting Ventura county only, therefore this is a case where a general act has been repealed by an act of more limited application, and the law is as stated in 23 California Jurisprudence 708, $\S$ 92:

"* * * The more general provisions of a prior general act are considered as superseded and repealed by a valid special act subsequently approved, relating to the same subject-matter, so far as the two are necessarily inconsistent, although the special act contains no words of repeal."

In other words, under the act of 1923, section 4290 was superseded, and therefore repealed, by reason of paragraph 6 of section 4252, because in said act of 1923 the following words were used:

"All commissions or fees now or hereafter allowed by law shall be paid into the county treasury."

In 1925 the Legislature did not pass a general county government act affecting Ventura county, but did by its statutes of 1925 make many changes by way of amendment in various provisions contained in the County Government Act as then set forth in the Political Code. Paragraph 6 of such amending act eliminated the provisions which we have heretofore quoted from the act of 1923 with reference to the assessor, and there were no provisions therein repealing or amending section 4290 of the Political Code.

We therefore hold that the part of the act of 1923 hereinbefore quoted did not suspend only, but did actually repeal, section 4290 of the Political Code as the same applied to Ventura county, and that section 4290 did not thereafter become effective merely by the failure of the Legislature to incorporate the provisions hereinbefore quoted of the act of 1923 in any later legislation or by the adoption of a reenactment of the act of 1923 omitting the portion hereinbefore specifically quoted.

The demurrer is therefore overruled, and the peremptory writ of mandate is ordered issued out of this court commanding respondent to pay the sum of $8.85 to the county treasury of Ventura county, Cal., as such.

HOGAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 5997.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 20, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 19, 1927.

Mandamus ⇨31—Mandamus to require submission of cause which has never been under submission for trial court's final decision will be denied.

Where clerk's docket showed, long after trial court directed cause to be briefed, that one defendant filed amended answer to second amended complaint and later filed notice of motion, after due service on petitioner's attorney, that on day on which writ of mandate was applied for she would move for order permitting filing of amended answer to complaint, cause had not been under submission for trial court's final determination and writ of mandate to require judge to submit cause for decision will not lie.

Original petition by Walter L. Hogan for a writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and Hon. Walter Perry Johnson, Judge thereof. Writ denied.

See, also, 74 Cal. App. 704, 241 P. 584.

Thomas T. Califro, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The application herein for a writ of mandate is denied. Neither the transcript of the minutes of the trial court nor of the entries in the clerk's docket show that said cause was ever ordered submitted for determination and decision. On the contrary, it appears from said docket entries and from the files in said cause that on February 28, 1927, which was long after the trial court had directed that the cause be briefed, Sue R. Merriman, one of the defendants in said action, filed an amended answer to the second amended complaint, and on August 27, 1927, filed a notice of motion, after due service of the same on petitioner's attorney, that on September 2, 1927, which was the day on which the writ herein was applied for, she would move said court for an order permitting the filing of an amended answer to the complaint. Whether or not this latter motion related to the amended answer filed on February 28, 1927, is not made clear.

However, in view of these latter proceedings, it is evident that the cause has never been under submission for final determination and decision. Therefore the writ applied for will not lie.

MCDOWELL v. WILLIS et al. (Civ. 4486.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 19, 1927.

Brokers ⇨52—Contract for exchange of property, not signed by all parties in interest, held not to give right to commissions thereunder.

Where real estate broker knew that contract for exchange of property was not signed by two parties who had interest therein, such contract was not complete, and he could not, in reliance thereon, collect commissions provided for therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Action by Nat McDowell against J. Willis and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George H. Stone, of San Diego, for appellant.

George L. Flagg, of San Diego, for respondents.

PEAIRS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the above-named defendants, who had signed a proposed agreement for exchange, reading as follows:

"This agreement witnesseth: That J. Willis, Maria A., Theresa S., and Frances W. Griebnow, owners of the following described * * * first piece of property situate, lying and being in California, county of Imperial, * * * all of which we desire to exchange for the following second piece of property owned by S. R. Clark and wife, situate, lying and being in California, county of San Diego, city of San Diego. * * * Terms: Each property to be delivered free and clear of all incumbrance. Nat McDowell is hereby authorized to act as our agent in negotiating an exchange. * * * And it is further agreed with said Nat McDowell that, when he has secured an acceptance of the proposition to exchange the above-described property on the above terms, we then pay the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars as commission for such services. * * * J. Willis, Frances W. Griebnow. Witness to signatures: Nat McDowell, Dated at San Diego, Calif., this 13th day of February, 1923."

The acceptance reads as follows:

"This agreement witnesseth: That S. R. Clark, of San Diego, Calif., owner of the second piece of property described within, hereby accepts the proposition of exchange made herein, and upon the terms therein stated, * * * and then to furnish bargain and sale deed conveying title to said property to J. Willis, Maria A., Theresa S., and Frances W. Griebnow or assigns or their representatives. And I further agree to pay Nat McDowell five hundred ($500.00) dollars commission for said exchange. Dated at San Diego, this 13th day of February, 1923, S. R. Clark, Nat McDowell. [Witness to signature.]"

It will be noted that Maria A. Griebnow (now Brown) and Theresa S. Griebnow did not sign the agreement, and the evidence shows that they refused to sign or concur in said exchange in any manner, and that plaintiff was aware of their interest in the property. The acceptance of S. R. Clark was clearly an agreement for all of the Willis and Griebnow properties, and not simply for the interest of J. Willis and Frances W. Griebnow therein, and, without the signatures of Maria A. Griebnow (now Brown) and Theresa S. Griebnow, plaintiff knew that he could not complete the deal, and the acceptor, S. R. Clark, knew that McDowell, the plaintiff, did not have complete authority.

The evidence further shows that Frances W. Griebnow paid plaintiff $200, and that J. Willis gave a check to plaintiff for $300, which were, by oral agreement, to be returned if the deal did not go through.

It was held by the judge of the superior court that the agreement set out above never became valid or binding on any of the parties thereto because not signed by all of the parties, and that defendants were therefore entitled to the money and check paid to the plaintiff by them, and to their costs.

The only point, therefore, to be decided is whether the said agreement binds the two defendants in this case. In this connection we call attention to the case of Mullarky v. Young, 9 Cal. App. 686, 100 P. 709, which case also cites from the case of Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 23 P. 695, and Olson v. Lovell, 91 Cal. 506, 27 P. 765. The case of Jennings v. Jordan, 31 Cal. App. 335, 160 P. 576, is also referred to. Other decisions cited either agree with the aforesaid citations or are not entirely applicable to this case. The following quotation from the case of Mullarky

v. Young, supra, at page 687 (100 P. 710), aptly applies to this case:

"But the correct position here is that the purported contract was not executed and therefore it never created any reciprocal rights and obligations. It related to the conveyance of real property, and under the statute it was required to be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged. But as the written instrument was signed by only two of the four parties to the agreement, it does not constitute a complete contract, and therefore it does not constitute the ground for a cause of action. This is clear from the exhibit. * * *"

In view of these decisions of our courts, and the incomplete authorization of the plaintiff, the judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte GILKEY. (Cr. 1552.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 19, 1927.

1. Habeas corpus ⇨10—Habeas corpus does not lie, where petitioner is not imprisoned or under actual restraint.

Writ of habeas corpus does not lie, where petitioner, or person on whose behalf the petition is filed, is not imprisoned or under actual restraint; it being necessary for him to be under such control or custody of person against whom petition is directed that his body can be produced at hearing.

2. Habeas corpus ⇨10—One admitted to bail may not test validity of order of commitment by habeas corpus.

Habeas corpus lies only where petitioner, or person on whose behalf petition is filed, is imprisoned, or under actual restraint, and one charged with felony, but admitted to bail, may not test validity of order of commitment by habeas corpus.

Original application by Dan Gilkey for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of Riverside County. Writ denied.

Welburn Mayoock, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. Pursuant to a complaint filed in the justice's court of Temescal township, county of Riverside, charging the defendant therein (petitioner here), with the commission of a felony, defendant was arrested, and, after examination, was committed and ordered to be held for trial on information to be filed in the superior court. The defendant, however, in accordance with the magistrate's order admitting him to bail, filed an undertaking of bail, and is not in actual custody. Nevertheless, he alleges that he has been held without probable cause, and that under these circumstances he is entitled to test by writ of habeas corpus the validity of the order of commitment.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that the writ of habeas corpus does not lie where the petitioner, or person on whose behalf the petition is filed, is not imprisoned, or under actual restraint; "in other words, he must be in such control or custody of the person against whom the petition is directed that his body can be produced at the hearing by the said custodian or restrainer." Palmer v. State, 170 Ala. 102, 54 So. 271. See, also, note to same case, Ann. Cas. 1912C, page 951.

The petition is denied.

IN re MAHONY'S ESTATE.

FLATLEY v. CONNER.

(Civ. 5842.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. Sept. 19, 1927.

1. Wills $\S$ 302(9)—Copy of record of probate of foreign will and decree admitting it to probate, duly authenticated, held to authorize admission of will to probate (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 456, 1323, 1324, 1906).

Evidence consisting of duly authenticated copy of record of probate of foreign will in foreign jurisdiction, containing copy of will and order or decree admitting it to probate, as required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1323, and showing facts required by section 1324, duly authenticated under section 1906, was sufficient to authorize admission of such foreign will to probate, under section 456, requiring party pleading to establish on trial facts conferring jurisdiction.

2. Wills $\S$ 302(9)—In probate of foreign will, certificate of presiding magistrate held not ineffective because of reference to letters testamentary and proof of will (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1323).

In probate of foreign will, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1323, letters testamentary and proof of such will are not required to be produced, so that certificate of presiding foreign magistrate was not rendered ineffective because of reference thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ellen Mahony, deceased. Petition by Charles S. Conner to probate the will of Ellen Mahony, deceased, opposed by Ellen Flatley. From a judgment overruling an objection to the admission of the will to probate, the contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas A. Sanson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles Cassat Davis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. The contestant appeals from a judgment, order, and decree overruling her objection to the admission to probate of the foreign will of the deceased, and admitting the same to probate, and appointing the petitioner administrator of the estate with the will annexed.

[1] The sufficiency of the proofs of the foreign probate is the sole question presented on this appeal. The petitioner produced and offered in evidence the duly authenticated copy of the record of the probate of the will of Ellen Mahony, in the High Court of Justice (probate), the district registry at Kilkeny, containing a copy of the will and the order or decree admitting the same to probate, as required by the provisions of section 1323 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Appellant in her written opposition to the probate of the document controverted the jurisdiction of the Irish court to admit the will to probate, and now calls attention to the fact that section 456, Code of Civil Procedure, provides in that event that "the party pleading must establish on the trial the facts conferring jurisdiction."

In support of this position appellant cites the case of Wickersham v. Johnston, 104 Cal. 407, 38 P. 101, as authority that the pleadings, petition, and proceedings which lead up to the order admitting the will to probate should have been included in the record. In (St. 1919, p. 165), section 1323, Code of Civil Procedure, was amended by changing the words in the first sentence, "When a copy of the will, and the probate thereof," to "When a copy of the will, and the order or decree admitting same to probate." So that the section now reads as follows:

"When a copy of the will, and the order or decree admitting same to probate, duly authenticated, shall be produced by the executor, or by any other person interested in the will, with a petition for letters, the same must be filed, and the clerk of the court must appoint a time for the hearing; notice whereof must be given as hereinbefore provided for an original petition for the probate of a will."

Section 1324, Code of Civil Procedure, requires the admission of such authenticated form of will to probate in this state, and reads as follows:

"If, on the hearing, it appears upon the face of the record that the will has been proved, allowed, and admitted to probate in any other of the United States, or in any foreign country, and that it was executed according to the law of the place in which the same was made, or in which the testator was at the time domiciled, or in conformity with the laws of this state, it must be admitted to probate, and have the same force and effect as a will first admitted to probate in this state, and letters testamentary or of administration issued thereon."

In the case at bar the facts required by section 1324, Code of Civil Procedure, are shown on the face of the record and by the copy of the will included therein.

Section 1906, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a judicial record of a foreign country may be proved by the attestation of the clerk or of the legal keeper of the record with the seal, together with a certificate of the chief judge that the person making the attestation is the clerk of the court or legal keeper of the record, that the signature is genuine, and that the attestation is in due form. The signature of the chief judge or presiding magistrate must be authenticated by the certificate of the minister or ambassador or a consul or vice consul or consular agent of the United States in such foreign country. Each of these requirements is complied with in the authenticated copy of the will and the order or decree admitting the same to probate. The record as specified in sections 1323 and 1324, Code of Civil Procedure, authenticated as prescribed in section 1906, Code of Civil Procedure, is the evidence required by the Code for the admission of a foreign will to probate. Section 1323, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1919, has been construed in Estate of Sankey, 199 Cal. 391, at page 398, 249 P. 517, where the court says:

"Our statute provides only for the presenting of duly certified copies of the will, and the decree admitting the will to probate."

On page 399 (249 P. 520), the court further says:

"If a lack of jurisdiction does not appear on the face of the record, on collateral attack, the jurisdiction will be presumed, even though the necessary facts conferring it do not affirmatively appear in the decree. Under such circumstances it will be assumed the parties were properly before the court, and that the proceedings were regular. 15 Cal. Jur. 68. In 1 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) p. 723, it is said: 'If the residence of the deceased within the territorial jurisdiction of the court at the time of his death is essential to give the court power to admit the will to probate, or to grant letters of administration of his estate, its adjudication of such fact cannot * * * be drawn in question collaterally.' In the Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 188, 81 P. 534, the court said: 'The determination of the probate court as to the residence of the deceased at the time of his death is final in all collateral proceedings.' Irwin v. Scriber, 18 Cal. 500; In re Griffith, 84 Cal. 107, 23 P. 523, 24 P. 381; In re Eichoff, 101 Cal. 605, 36 P. 11; Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 421, 73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441."

In the case at bar no lack of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record, but the necessary facts conferring it do affirmatively appear in the decree, which is sufficient to meet the requirements of section 456, Code of Civil Procedure, in the absence of any contrary showing.

[2] Appellant further objects that the certificate of the presiding magistrate could not have been attached to the record introduced in evidence because it refers to "letters testamentary" and "the proof of such will." The foregoing are not required to be produced by the terms of section 1323, Code of Civil Procedure, and would be considered surplusage. Estate of Sankey, supra.

It is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

WEISMAN et al. v. BOARD OF BUILDING AND SAFETY COM'RS OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 5263.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. Sept. 19, 1927.

1. Mandamus ⇨181(3)—Judgment on hearing in mandamus, where defendants building commissioners appeared by attorney and evidence was presented, held not default (Code Civ. Proc. § 1095).

Judgment rendered at hearing in a mandamus proceeding to compel board of building commissioners and chief inspector to issue a permit, where the defendants appeared by attorney and the judgment, rendered upon a hearing as prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1095, recited that the court reviewed the petition and heard and considered the evidence, held not a judgment by default, though defendants had made no appearance by answer or demurrer.

2. Mandamus ⇨12—Ordinance is a "law," within statute providing for mandamus to compel performance of act which law specially enjoins (Code Civ. Proc. § 1085).

An ordinance is a "law," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, providing that a writ of mandamus may issue against any inferior board to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station, or to compel board to permit petitioner to enjoy a right from which he is unlawfully excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Law.]

3. Mandamus ⇨182—Peremptory mandate, issued before formal judgment was filed but after oral pronouncement, held not prematurely issued (Code Civ. Proc. § 1095).

Peremptory writ of mandate, issued before formal written judgment was filed but after oral pronouncement of judgment, held not prematurely issued, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1095, providing that after judgment had been given the peremptory writ must issue without delay; sections 577-680½ concerning trial and judgment in civil actions being inapplicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action for a writ of mandate by Isadore Weisman and others against the Board of Building and Safety Commissioners of Los Angeles and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Charles B. MacCoy and Herman Mohr, Deputy City Attys., all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John J. Dillon, of Culver City, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. The respondents herein petitioned the superior court for an order to compel the board of building and safety commissioners of the city of Los Angeles and the chief inspector of that board to issue a permit to erect a building on certain real property situated in said city. Appellants, although given legal notice, made no appearance by answer or demurrer. However, at the time of the hearing on the petition, through their attorney, the city attorney of Los Angeles, they appeared in open court and stated that they had no defense. The court then duly viewed the papers, received evidence on the hearing of the alternative writ which had previously been issued, and gave judgment for the issuance of a peremptory writ as prayed. This hearing took place on the 11th day of August, 1925, and the court announced its judgment at that time. The formal judgment was not filed until the 19th day of the same month. In the meantime, and on the 17th day of August, appellants served and filed their notice of appeal "from the judgment, order, and decree, and from the whole thereof rendered in the above-entitled court on the 11th day of August, 1925, in favor of the plaintiffs in said action and against the said defendants."

[1] It is claimed that this judgment was granted by default. This obviously is not true. The judgment recites, and there is nothing in the record to impeach the statement, that the court reviewed the petition and "heard and considered the evidence." Furthermore, appellant appeared by attorney, and judgment was rendered upon the hearing as prescribed by section 1095 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Pereria v. Wallace, 129 Cal. 397, 62 P. 61.

Appellants quote authority that mandamus is not to be permitted to compel the performance of acts which could not legally be done. There is nothing in the record to show that such would be the case in this instance. The same answer makes it unnecessary to consider cases to the effect that mandamus will not issue where its result would be inequitable or unjust.

[2] Appellants argue that an ordinance is not a law, within the meaning of section 1085 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but this has no foundation. It was decided to the contrary in the early case of Pimental v. San Francisco, 21 Cal. 351. The same rule has been recognized in subsequent cases, among them City of San Luis Obispo v. Fitzgerald, 126 Cal. 279, 58 P. 699.

Finally, appellants argue that the peremptory writ of mandate was unlawfully and improvidently issued, because it preceded the entry of the formal judgment on the 19th day of August. Appellants themselves have treated the judgment as having been made on the 11th day of August, for their notice of appeal expressly states that it is taken from the judgment rendered on that day.

Appellants' argument in this behalf has no bearing upon the merits of the appeal. If the order made on the 11th of August directing the issuance of a peremptory writ is appealable and this appeal be regarded as taken therefrom, it is apparent that the complaint concerning the issuance of the peremptory writ does not affect the regularity or legality of the judgment. If, for the sake of argument, we accept appellants' contention that the peremptory writ was issued prematurely, the judgment would not be invalid because subsequently to its announcement the peremptory writ was thus improvidently issued; the writ might be quashed, but the judgment would be unaffected. On the other hand, if the only appealable judgment herein is the written one based upon the court's findings and entered on August 19, and if this appeal under the authority of Estate of Stone, 173 Cal. 675, 161 P. 258, be regarded as taken from this latter judgment, it would remain unimpaired by reason of the fact, if it be one, that the peremptory writ was issued too soon. In a word, neither the final judgment entered on August 19, nor the decision of the court announced on August 11, can be involved through an attack upon the writ of mandamus.

[3] There is a further reason why appellants' argument in this behalf has no merit. It is provided in section 1095 of the Code of Civil Procedure that in mandate proceedings, if judgment is given for the applicant, a peremptory writ must issue without delay. The purpose of mandamus is to provide a speedy remedy. The judgment was given; that is, rendered, on August 11th. It is mandatory that the peremptory writ issue "without delay"; that is, immediately. In this respect the practice provided by law in mandamus differs from that in civil actions, hence the sections of title 8 of part 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure do not control, and since the decision of a court when announced is a judgment (Schurtz v. Romer, 81 Cal. 244, 22 P. 657), a peremptory writ may and should issue immediately upon its rendition.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: THOMPSON, J.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. I concur in the judgment of affirmance. "It has been held by this court that there is a material difference between the rendition and the entry of a judgment. A judgment is rendered when it is announced by the court. It is entered when it is actually entered in the judgment book." Schurtz v. Romer, 81 Cal. 244, 247, 22 P. 657.

BLACKLEDGE v. McINTOSH. (Civ. 5957.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 19, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Nov. 17, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence on issue of sufficiency of delivery of deeds to pass title to defendants held conclusive on appeal.

In action for accounting and to cancel deeds, evidence that grantor after execution of deeds to daughter paid taxes, appeared in action involving one of pieces of property as legal owner, and made repairs and improvements upon another piece of property, and made returns for assessment purposes as legal owner, was not conclusive evidence that she retained title, but merely raised conflict of evidence on the issue of the sufficiency of delivery of deeds to pass title to defendants, as to which trial court's finding supported by evidence was conclusive on appeal.

2. Deeds ⇨208(3)—Evidence that mother gave daughter deeds held to show delivery thereof with intent to pass title.

In action for accounting and to cancel deeds, evidence that mother gave daughter deeds held to justify finding that there was sufficient delivery to pass title.

3. Appeal and error ⇨842(8)—Intent of grantor in executing and giving deeds to daughter held question for trial court.

In action for accounting and to cancel deeds, intent of grantor in executing and giving deeds to daughter was question of fact for trial court sitting without jury.

4. Deeds ⇨200—Testimony of son that deeds were in mother's possession at death held admissible only to assist court in determining mother's intention in giving deeds to daughter.

In action for accounting and to cancel deeds, testimony of son that deeds were in mother's possession at her death was only admissible to assist court, sitting as jury, in determining intention of mother at time she handed deeds to daughter, grantee therein.

5. Deeds ⇨179—Redelivery to grantor does not affect title by previous delivery.

Evidence of possession by grantor of deeds at time of her death could not defeat title conveyed if deeds had been effectively delivered.

6. Deeds ⇨60—Grantor's delivery of deed, absolute in form, to grantee personally, vests absolute title in grantee (Civ. Code, § 1056).

Under Civ. Code, § 1056, delivery by grantor of deed, absolute in form, to grantee personally, vests title in grantee, discharged of any condition.

7. Deeds ⇨60—Oral agreement that absolute deeds by mother to daughter should not be recorded until after mother's death, or that daughter should only have rents or income, held not to affect delivery (Civ. Code, § 1056).

Under Civ. Code, § 1056, any oral agreement or understanding of mother that her deeds, absolute in form, delivered to daughter, should not be recorded until after mother's death, or that daughter should only have rents or income of property so long as she remained single and was in need thereof, was immaterial as to effect upon delivery of deeds.

8. Evidence ⇨417(17)—Testimony of son that absolute deeds from mother to daughter were in mother's possession at her death held inadmissible to affect delivery (Civ. Code, § 1056).

Under Civ. Code, § 1056, oral testimony of son that at mother's death deeds, absolute in form, executed and delivered by her to daughter, were in mother's possession, was improperly admitted, it having effect of varying expressed terms of deeds.

9. Evidence ⇨385—Except as to showing consideration for deed, legal effect of written instrument cannot be varied by parol evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2).

Legal effect of written instrument cannot be varied or defeated in whole or part by parol evidence, except that parol evidence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2, is admissible to show true consideration of deed.

10. Deeds ⇨82—Deed, absolute in form, from mother to daughter, held to pass title without recording (Civ. Code, §§ 1213, 1217).

Since recordation of deed has no other function than notice to world, and, under Civ. Code, §§ 1213, 1217, unrecorded deed is valid as between parties thereto and those with notice, deeds, absolute in form, from mother to daughter, delivered to daughter, would pass title without recording.

11. Deeds ⇨124(1)—Deeds, absolute in form, from mother to daughter, passed fee-simple title, giving daughter absolute right to rents and profits (Civ. Code, §§ 697, 762, 1105).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 697, 762, 1105, deeds, absolute in form, from mother to daughter, delivered to daughter personally, passed fee-simple title, giving daughter absolute right to all rents and profits of property conveyed.

12. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 927(3)—In action for accounting as to personal property, in absence of showing disposition of such property, and appellant's complaint granting nonsuit will be assumed proper on appeal.

In action for accounting as to personal property and for cancellation of deeds, where appellant made no contention as to correctness of order granting nonsuit as to personal property, and no evidence appeared in record touching disposition of personal property, rule granting nonsuit will be assumed correct on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William D. Dehy, Judge.

Two actions by Gertrude R. Blackledge, plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of Ellen M. McIntosh, deceased, against May J. McIntosh, to cancel deeds and for an accounting, tried together. From a judgment of nonsuit as to accounting for personal property and for defendant as to the validity of the deeds, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Carson and Munson T. Case, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Milton M. Cohen and Jerome H. Kann, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. Two appeals are here presented under one record, an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of nonsuit in one case, and from a judgment in favor of defendant in the other.

Plaintiff brought one action as administratrix of the estate of her mother, Ellen M. McIntosh, deceased, to cancel certain deeds made by her mother to her sister, May J. McIntosh, the defendant. Plaintiff also brought another action, in the same capacity, against defendant for an accounting for certain personal property and the proceeds of the sale of certain other real property, which plaintiff alleged belonged to the estate of her mother, Ellen M. McIntosh, which had been sold by defendant and the proceeds retained by defendant.

The two cases were tried together by the court, sitting without a jury, with the result above mentioned.

This appeal involves the delivery of four deeds signed and acknowledged by Ellen M. McIntosh, as grantor, to May J. McIntosh, as grantee. The facts are briefly these: Ellen M. McIntosh was a widow, and since the death of her husband, which occurred some time prior to November, 1912, had lived with her unmarried daughter, May J. McIntosh, the defendant, and grantee in the deeds in question, in the city of Los Angeles. Ellen M. McIntosh owned several pieces of real property in the city of Los Angeles and one piece of real property in the city of Redlands, all of which she acquired by deed from her husband. She also owned an automobile, household furniture, and had some money in a savings bank.

Mrs. McIntosh had two other daughters, Gertrude R. Blackledge, the plaintiff herein, and Nettie A. Hewitt, and a son, Carl McIntosh. These three children were all married and resided in different places in southern California, outside the city of Los Angeles. Mrs. McIntosh was at all times on intimate and friendly relations with all of her children. All the children, likewise, had great love and respect for their mother. The children were also on intimate and friendly relations with one another. Mrs. McIntosh was greatly affected by the death of her husband and seemed to worry a great deal for fear she would have to live alone the balance of her life. All her children had married and left her home, except her daughter, May J. McIntosh, the defendant. Mrs. McIntosh stated to defendant within a week or two after her husband's death that if she (defendant) would remain single and live with her as long as she lived she would give her the property. Mrs. McIntosh made the same or similar statements to defendant on several other occasions, and she also stated to one or two of her intimate friends that she was going to deed the property to defendant. She also stated to another friend that she had deeded the home in which she and defendant were residing to defendant.

On the 8th of November, 1912, Mrs. McIntosh signed and acknowledged, before a notary public by the name of Schneider, three grant deeds to her daughter, May J. McIntosh, the defendant, purporting to convey to said May J. McIntosh three separate parcels of real estate in the city of Los Angeles. At the same time and before the same notary public, Mrs. McIntosh also signed and acknowledged a grant deed to her daughter, Nettie A. Hewitt, conveying to her the Redlands property.

The only testimony in the record relative to the actual manual tradition of these three deeds by Ellen M. McIntosh to the defendant is the testimony of said May J. McIntosh. She testified as follows:

"My mother brought them home (the three deeds) from Mr. Schneider's office. She said, 'Here, May, are the deeds that I promised you, and I want you to look them over.' I looked them over, and she said, 'What about them?' I said, 'They look all right to me.' Then I said, 'What shall I do with them?' And she said, 'Take good care of them, and on my death I want you to record them.' She handed them to me. * * * She had promised me these very soon after my father's death, within a week or two, and I think she was afraid she might be left all alone because she told me that if I cared to stay with her that she would give me deeds to the property. * * * I don't remember the time of day she gave me these papers, but I think it was around noon. I put them in the desk drawer, the desk that was in the living room. * * * It was a regular roll top desk. The drawer in which I put the papers was what we sort of used as a business drawer; I had mining stock and return checks and a few letters in that drawer. My mother did not tell me to deposit these deeds in any particular drawer or in any particular place. She says, 'It doesn't matter where you put them just so you take care of them.' We were living then at 4500 Melbourne avenue. The deeds remained there until I told my brother to take them out after her death. We lived in the Melbourne avenue property about nine months after the date on which I say I got the deeds from my mother. From there we went to 1030 Hyperion avenue. * * * When we moved to 1030 Hyperion avenue we moved the desk into Mamma's bedroom. * * * It remained there until after her death."

On June 5, 1913, Mrs. McIntosh signed and acknowledged another grant deed before the same notary public, purporting to convey to May J. McIntosh another piece of property in the city of Los Angeles. This last deed covered the home in which she and the defendant were at that time living, and with reference to the actual manual tradition of this deed defendant was also the only witness and her testimony was as follows:

"Several months later (meaning after she received the other deeds), she (her mother) came home with another one and she gave it to me and told me to put it with the other."

This testimony given by defendant concerning delivery of the deeds in question was corroborated to some extent by the witness Glen Williams, a friend and neighbor of Mrs. McIntosh. He testified that he had two different conversations with Mrs. Ellen M. McIntosh. In one of them Mrs. McIntosh said to him:

"I suppose that a lot of friends and neighbors are wondering why May does not get married, I am really responsible for May not getting married. I told May that if she would stay single as long as I lived that I would provide further."

In the other conversation Mr. Williams stated to Mrs. McIntosh that she had "a nice home," and Mrs. McIntosh replied:

"Yes; don't you think May ought to be happy with this? I have deeded it to her."

Ruth B. Hall, a friend and acquaintance of Mrs. McIntosh, testified to having several conversations with Mrs. McIntosh with reference to the property and with reference to the defendant. In one of these conversations, which took place about a year before Mrs. McIntosh died, Mrs. McIntosh stated to Miss Hall that "she felt responsible for having made Miss McIntosh (the defendant) dependent upon her for a living, and she had made arrangements so that she (May McIntosh) would not be dependent on others."

Nettie A. Hewitt, a daughter of Mrs. McIntosh, testified that she had a conversation with her mother prior to 1919, in which her mother stated:

"I don't know why I am telling you this Nettie, but I have just been to Mr. Schneider and made a deed to the Redlands property to you. The other deeds are in May's name and I have talked the matter over thoroughly with Carl."

Carl McIntosh, the son of Ellen M. McIntosh, deceased, was a witness for plaintiff and testified as follows:

"The signing or execution of these deeds first came to my knowledge about 18 months previous to my mother's death. * * * My mother said to me, 'Sonny, if anything should happen to me take those deeds and record them. I want May to have the income from these different properties. So long as she needs it and remains single and so long as she lives. * * *' These deeds came into my possession on the occasion of my mother's death. * * * I would say 3 or 4 days thereafter. I got them out of the drawer of the desk in her own private room. I knew they were there, because she had previously told me they were there. She told me this from time to time back as far as 18 months previous to her death and right down to within a very few weeks, possibly 2 or 3 weeks, immediately before her death. * * * I took the deeds from this drawer, in which my mother had indicated they were, and proceeded to place them in escrow with the Title Insurance Company in Los Angeles, with instructions to record the deeds. * * *"

The evidence in this case also shows that Mrs. McIntosh, after the execution of these deeds, paid the taxes upon the property herself and appeared in an action involving one of the pieces of property as legal owner thereof; collected rents from some of the properties; made repairs and improvements upon another piece of the property; made returns to the assessor for assessment purposes as the legal owner of the property, etc.

[1] All these facts, while tending to show a continuing claim of title by Mrs. McIntosh to the property theretofore conveyed to defendant, were merely circumstances to be weighed by the trial court against the affirmative evidence of delivery given by defendant. These facts, taken with the other facts testified to by defendant and her witnesses, did no more than raise a conflict of evidence on the vital issue of the sufficiency of the delivery of the deeds to pass title to the defendant, and, the trial court having resolved that conflict in favor of the defendant, such a finding will not be disturbed by this court where there is any substantial evidence to support it. Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 368, 224 P. 455; McCarthy v. Security Trust, etc., Bank, 188 Cal. 233, 204 P. 818; Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 757, 112 P. 544; Avery v. Avery, 42 Cal. App. 101, 183 P. 453.

The legal requirements to effect a valid delivery of a deed has often been stated by the Supreme Court of this state. In Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 638, 151 P. 3 (Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703), the Supreme Court states the rule as follows:

"It is essential to the validity of a transfer of real property that there be a delivery of the conveyance with intent to transfer the title, and the true test under which delivery is to be determined is in ascertaining whether in parting with the possession of the conveyance the grantor intended thereby to divest himself of title. If he did, there was an effective delivery of the deed. If not, there was no delivery. The solution of this question is grounded entirely on the intention of the grantor, and this essential matter of intention is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court from a consideration of all the evidence in a given case bearing upon the question."

See, also, Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 451, 33 P. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 73 P. 803; Estate of Cornelius, 151 Cal. 552, 91 P. 329; Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 757, 112 P. 544; Reed v. Smith, 125 Cal. 491, 58 P. 139; Black v. Sharkey, 104 Cal. 279, 37 P. 939; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 4 P. 473, 8 P. 46, 56 Am. Rep. 726; Denis v. Velati, 96 Cal. 223, 31 P. 1; Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 382, 224 P. 455.

[2-6] We think the evidence in this case meets all the requirements of the law and that it amply justifies the finding of the trial court, that there was a sufficient delivery of the deeds to pass title to defendant, when all the facts and circumstances of the case are considered. What the intent of Ellen M. McIntosh was in handing over the executed deeds to her daughter was a question of fact for the trial court under all the circumstances of the transaction, and the finding of the trial court that it was the intent of Mrs. McIntosh to pass an absolute title was a fair inference from all the facts. Appellant places great reliance on the testimony of Carl McIntosh to establish a want of intention on the part of Mrs. McIntosh to convey an absolute title to the property to May J. McIntosh. In the first place, the testimony of Carl McIntosh that the deeds were in the possession of his mother at the time of her death is flatly contradicted by the defendant. In the second place, Carl McIntosh never knew that his mother had made the deeds until about 18 months before her death, which was more than 6 years after they were executed and given to defendant. This evidence could only be admissible for the purpose of assisting the trial court in determining the intention of Ellen M. McIntosh at the very time she handed the deeds to defendant, and could in no way vary or defeat the title conveyed, if the deeds had theretofore been effectively delivered. The law is well settled, where a deed, absolute in form, is delivered by the grantor to the grantee personally, title vests in the grantee, discharged of any condition on which the delivery was made. Section 1056 of the Civil Code provides:

"A grant cannot be delivered to the grantee conditionally. Delivery to him, or to his agent as such, is necessarily absolute, and the instrument takes effect thereupon, discharged of any condition on which the delivery was made."

In Mowry v. Heney, 86 Cal. 471, 25 P. 17, the court said:

"Here was an absolute deed to the property delivered to the grantee. Its legal effect was to vest in the plaintiff the title to the property, free from any conditions."

In Devlin on Deeds, section 314, it is said:

"A deed cannot be delivered to the grantee as an escrow. If it be delivered to him it becomes an operative deed, freed from any condition not expressed in the deed. It is and will vest the title in him, although this may be contrary to the intention of the parties."

See, also, Hammond v. McCollough, 159 Cal. 639, 115 P. 216; Bias v. Reed, 169 Cal. 33, 145 P. 516; Elliott v. Merchants' Bank & Trust Co., 21 Cal. App. 536, 132 P. 280; Lewis v. Brown, 22 Cal. App. 38, 133 P. 331; Riley v. North Star Mining Co., 152 Cal. 549, 93 P. 194; Avery v. Avery, supra.

[7-11] The foregoing decisions afford ample authority for the holding that any oral agreement or understanding that Mrs. McIntosh may have had with her daughter that the deeds should not be recorded until after her death, or that the daughter should only have the rents or income from the property so long as she remains single and was in need of such income, is immaterial and could have no effect upon the delivery, because the deeds were absolute in form and could not be delivered to the grantee conditionally. Delivery to her is necessarily absolute, and the instruments took effect immediately, discharged of any condition on which delivery was made, not expressed in the instruments themselves. The effect of the evidence of Carl McIntosh would be to vary the express terms of the deeds by parol evidence. Evidence of this character cannot be allowed for any such purpose. The legal effect of a written instrument cannot be varied or defeated in whole or in part by parol evidence (Hendrick v. Crowley, 31 Cal. 475; Mowry v. Heney, supra; Winchester v. Winchester, 175 Cal. 391, 165 P. 965), except, of course, that parol evidence is admissible to show the true consideration in a deed (section 1962, Code Civ. Proc. subd. 2).

The above evidence, however, was not offered for the purpose of showing the true consideration. The deeds would pass title without recording. Recordation has no other function than that of notice to the world; and an unrecorded deed is valid as between the parties thereto and those who have notice thereof. Sections 1213 and 1217, Civ. Code; Burkett v. Doty, 32 Cal. App. 337, 162 P. 1042; Avery v. Avery, supra; Lewis v. Brown, supra. Therefore there is no merit in the contention of appellant that Mrs. McIntosh only intended that her daughter acquire a qualified estate in the property. No such intention is expressed in the deeds, and we have seen the deeds were grant deeds absolute in form and delivered by the grantor to the grantee personally. The legal effect of such a delivery is to pass a fee-simple title to the grantee. Sections 697, 762, and 1105, Civ. Code. With this fee-simple estate passed also the present absolute right to all the rents and profits of the property conveyed, free from any claim of the grantor thereto.

The cases relied upon by appellant only reaffirm the well-established rule that a deed must be delivered with the intention on the part of the grantor to pass a present irrevocable title to the property conveyed to be an effective delivery and whether such intention was shown depends upon all the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss in detail the further circumstances pointed out by appellant, which she claims support her contention that Mrs. McIntosh never intended to convey to her daughter an absolute title to the property. As we have already pointed out, these were mere circumstances to be weighed by the trial court against the affirmative evidence of delivery.

[12] No contention is made by appellant as to the correctness of the trial court's order in granting the nonsuit as to the personal property, and we are unable to find any evidence in the record touching the disposition of the personal property in question, so we must assume that the court's ruling granting the nonsuit was correct.

We think the judgment in both cases should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CRINELLA v. NORTHWESTERN PAC. R. CO. (Civ. 5836.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 14, 1927.

1. Carriers ⚡134—That no claim was filed held not to affect rule that showing delivery to carrier in good condition and to consignee in deteriorated condition constitutes prima facie case (Bills of Lading Act [49 USCA §§ 81-124]; Carmack Amendment, as amended by Cummins' Amendment [49 USCA § 20, pars. 11, 12]).

Provisions in bill of lading provided for or permitted by Bills of Lading Act (49 USCA §§ 81-124 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604aaa-8604w]), and Carmack Amendment, as amended by Cummins' Amendment (49 USCA § 20, pars. 11, 12 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa]), held not to imply that the fact that no claim was filed for damage to a shipment changes the rule that showing delivery to the carrier in good condition and delivery by the carrier to the consignee in a deteriorated condition constitutes a prima facie case.

2. Evidence ⚡159—Asking shipper if he had filed claim held not to call for secondary evidence.

In action against railroad for damage to shipment, asking shipper if he had filed claim held not to call for secondary evidence, since it was not the contents of the claim which were desired, but merely whether or not one had been filed.

3. Appeal and error ⚡882(21)—Appellant cannot claim record lacks material evidence erroneously kept out by his objection.

Appellant cannot claim that the record is deficient in lacking material evidence which had been erroneously kept out by his objection on the ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent.

4. Appeal and error ⚡231(1)—Objections must be specific, especially where they may be obviated.

Objections must be specific, especially where they are of such a nature that they may be obviated when attention is called to the defective nature of the testimony offered.

5. Appeal and error ⚡232(2)—Where appellant objected to evidence because it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, he cannot argue on appeal it was inadmissible because secondary evidence.

Where appellant had objected to a question because he claimed it called for evidence which was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, he cannot argue on appeal that such evidence was inadmissible because it was secondary evidence, since objection to offer of secondary evidence must be specific.

6. Carriers ⚡136—Whether shipment of grapes was unreasonably delayed held for jury.

In action against carrier for damage to shipment of grapes, whether there was unreasonable delay held for jury.

7. Carriers ⚡136—Whether shipment of grapes was properly iced held for jury.

In action against carrier for damage to shipment of grapes, whether the refrigerator cars in which they were shipped were properly iced held for jury.

8. Evidence ⚡67(3)—Condition of shipment of grapes at time of arrival held inferable from condition on third day following.

Condition of a shipment of grapes of a highly perishable nature at the time of arrival at destination could be inferred from its condition on the third day following.

9. Carriers ⚡89—That goods are partially damaged does not justify consignee in refusing delivery.

Consignee must accept delivery of goods, which are partially damaged, in order to minimize the damage.

10. Carriers ⇐89—Where shipment is damaged to extent that it is practically valueless, consignee may reject.

Where a shipment is damaged to the extent that it is practically valueless, considering the expense of acceptance and use and the purpose for which it was intended, the consignee may reject.

11. Carriers ⇐86—Where shipment offered consignee was apparently damaged, but from outward appearances extent of damage could not be known, consignee had right of inspection.

Where a shipment of grapes offered for delivery by the carrier to the consignee was apparently damaged, but from outward appearances it was impossible to know the extent of the damage, held, that the consignee was entitled to inspect the goods before accepting or rejecting them.

12. Carriers ⇐114—Where tendered delivery without inspection was insufficient discharge of carrier's obligation, its liability as common carrier continued until inspection.

Where the tendered delivery to the consignee of a carload of grapes without inspection was an insufficient discharge of the carrier's obligation, its liability thereafter until inspection continues as that of a common carrier, and not merely as that of a bailee.

13. Carriers ⇐86, 87—Duties of carrier to deliver and of consignee to accept shipment are reciprocal (Bills of Lading Act, § 8 [49 USCA § 88]).

The duty of a carrier to deliver a shipment and the duty of the consignee to accept are reciprocal, notwithstanding that Bills of Lading Act, § 8 (49 USCA § 88 [U. S. Comp. St. § 8604dd]), has no provisions concerning consignee's duty to accept.

14. Carriers ⇐86—That shipper and consignee of grapes were joint adventurers held not to affect consignee's right to inspect.

Fact that shipper and consignee were interested in a shipment of grapes as joint adventurers held not to make consignee's rights different than rights of ordinary consignee in respect to right of inspection.

15. Carriers ⇐137—Modification of instruction, that if consignee refused delivery carrier was not liable for resulting damage, by adding "without lawful reason" after "refused delivery," held not indefinite (Bills of Lading Act, § 8 [49 USCA § 88]).

Modification of instruction offered by carrier, that if consignee refused delivery carrier was not liable for resulting damage, by adding "without lawful reason" after the expression "refused to accept delivery," held not abstract and indefinite, notwithstanding there was no further instruction as to what constituted a lawful reason, especially where language followed words of Bills of Lading Act, § 8 (49 USCA § 88 [U. S. Comp. St. § 8604dd]), concerning carrier's duty to deliver in absence of "some lawful excuse."

16. Carriers ⇐136—Market value of shipment of grapes at point of destination held for jury.

In action against railroad for damage to a shipment of grapes, market value of the grapes at point of destination held question for jury.

17. Trial ⇐260(1)—Where refused requested instruction was given in substance, there was no error.

Where refused requested instruction was covered, in substance, by instruction given, there was no error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Peter Crinella against the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stanley Moore and R. W. Palmer, both of San Francisco, and Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Emmett I. Donohue, of Challis, Idaho, and G. P. Hall, of Petaluma, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an action by a shipper against a common carrier for damages for negligence in transporting two carloads of grapes from Fulton, Cal., to Buhl, Minn. The negligence alleged in the complaint was unusual delay and failure to properly ice the cars in transit, resulting in decay of the shipments. The trial was had by a jury. The verdict was for the plaintiff for $356.44 on the first car, and $1,800.13 on the second car. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The main contention of appellant is that plaintiff failed to prove that he filed a claim against the common carrier for the damage before bringing this action. It contends that where no claim for loss or damage has been filed, the usual presumption of negligence upon the part of the carrier does not exist, and from this (confusing presumption and inference, as it seems to us) it argues that the inference of the carrier's negligence and liability is not to be made merely from the proof of the shipment of the grapes in good condition and the arrival in bad condition, together with unreasonable delay, and that respondent must actually prove the negligent acts causing the damage. We quote from appellant's brief as follows:

"It is conceded that had respondent proved the filing of a claim with appellant covering the cars comprising the subject-matter of his action, there would have been incumbent upon him to prove: (1) That he delivered the grapes to the carrier in good condition; and (2) that they were delivered by the carrier to the consignee in a deteriorated condition. It would then have been the burden of the appellant to have proved that it had not been guilty of negligence in the transport of the cars, but that any damage thereto was attributable to either of the following causes: (1) The act of God. (2) The public enemy. (3) Public authority. (4) Inherent nature of the goods. However, by the failure of respondent to prove that he had filed a claim with appellant for damages to cars Nos. 1 and 2, the usual presumption of negligence upon the part of the carrier does not exist, and had no proper place in the consideration by court or jury of the instant case."

[1] It is not the appellant's contention that the shipper lost his right of action entirely by a failure to file a claim in writing, but that where no claim is filed the requirements of plaintiff's proof are different; and that here, in the absence of a claim filed, the plaintiff's evidence was insufficient to support a finding of negligence and, also, that the court's instructions given to the jury concerning a prima facie case were erroneous. These contentions are founded upon language used in the case of Barrett v. Van Pelt, 268 U. S. 85, 45 S. Ct. 437, 69 L. Ed. 857, interpreting language similar to the provisions of section 2b of the bill of lading or shipping receipt issued to the plaintiff herein. The section of the bill of lading referred to provides that claims for loss, damage or injury to property must be made within certain specified times, "provided that, if such loss, damage or injury was due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded, or damaged in transit by carelessness or negligence, then no notice of the claim or filing of claims shall be required as a condition precedent to recovery." These provisions of the bill of lading are provided for or permitted by acts of Congress and amendments thereto. Cummins' Amendment amending part of section 7 of Carmack Amendment, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 38, p. 1196; Carmack Amendment to the Act to Regulate Commerce, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 34, pp. 584, 595 (49 USCA § 20, pars. 11, 12; U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa); Bills of Lading Act, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 39, p. 533 (49 USCA §§ 81-124; U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604aaa-8604w).

This provision of the bill of lading and the law providing for it received interpretation in Barrett v. Van Pelt, supra, the effect of which was to eliminate the comma after the word "unloaded" and to strike out the final d in the word damaged, thereby clarifying the doubtful grammatical meaning of the proviso. The court thus held this proviso to mean that, in case the claim was based upon carelessness or negligence in respect to any of the things mentioned in the proviso, then no claim need be filed as a condition precedent to an action of damages against the carrier.

The authority relied upon by appellant does not have the sweeping effect for which it contends. While it may have the effect of holding that where no claim has been filed, an action against a carrier based upon negligence does not enjoy the benefit of presumed negligence, or liability without proved negligence, nevertheless, it does not purport to change the rule concerning what constitutes a prima facie case against a carrier in case of actual negligence. This question received further consideration by the United States Supreme Court in Chesapeake & Ohio R. Co. v. Thompson Manufacturing Co., 270 U. S. 416, 46 S. Ct. 318, 70 L. Ed. 659. What is there said disposes of the greater part of the appellant's contentions herein. We quote:
